Everyone believes that he wanted to kill Claudius, but he stopped short of killing him because he wanted to have a better one – in other words, to catch Claudius himself "in the blossoms of [his] sin" [I, v, 76]. Given how he presented himself there, he was not the right one.

It is the phallus that is at stake here. Which is why Hamlet can never reach it until the moment at which he has sacrificed – in spite of himself, moreover – his entire narcissistic attachment. It is only when he is fatally wounded, and knows that he is, that he can perform the action that lays Claudius low.

This is odd, obvious, and also inscribed, I would say, in all sorts of little enigmas of Hamlet's style.

Consider the moment at which he shoves Polonius – who for him is merely a "calf," a "capital . . . calf" [III, ii, 101–2], that he has in some sense offered up as a sacrifice to his father's manes and whose assassination barely affects him – into a closet under the stairs. Everybody asks him what is going on and he comes out with a few of his little jokes that are always so disconcerting to his enemies.

Everyone wonders if this is truly the whole story, whether what he says is what he means, for what he says tickles everybody's funny bone, but in order for him to say what he says he must know so much that they cannot believe it, and so on and so forth. This should sound rather familiar to us, given how subjects often reveal things to us.

Hamlet thus says the following things, which have remained up until now quite perplexing to commentators. "The body is with the king" – please note that he does not use the word "corpse," he says "body" – "but the king is not with the body" [IV, ii, 26–7]. I would ask you to simply replace the word "king" with the word "phallus" to realize that it is the phallus that is involved here. For the body is tightly bound up in this business of the phallus, but on the other hand the phallus is bound to nothing and always slips between your fingers.

418

Immediately thereafter, he adds, "The king is a thing –" "A thing, my lord?" his interlocutors ask [IV, ii, 27–8], completely shocked as they are whenever he comes out with one of his aphorisms, and Hamlet replies, "Of nothing" [29]. At which point commentators tend to calm down, thinking that it must be a quotation from the Psalms in which it is said that "Man is like a thing of nought." I think that in order to shed light on this it is better to rely on Shakespeare's own work.

An attentive reading of the Sonnets inclines me to believe that, in his own life, Shakespeare was imbued with a rather extreme and peculiar desire. Somewhere, in one of the sonnets, whose audacity we can hardly imagine – I am astonished that people can talk about them as though they were ambiguous – he speaks to his love object who, as everyone knows, was of the same sex as him, quite a charming young man, it seems, who appears to have been the Earl of Essex. Your looks leave nothing to be desired, he says to this young man; you look like a woman in every regard; there is but "one thing" that nature wanted to give you, God only knows why, and I unfortunately could not care less about this little thing: it is "to my purpose nothing." Too bad it delights women. And Shakespeare adds, oh well, as long as "Mine be thy love, and thy love's use their treasure."

The terms "thing" and "nothing" are used in their strict sense here, and they are indubitably part of Shakespeare's standard vocabulary. Yet this vocabulary is of but secondary importance here, after all. The question is whether we can fathom Shakespeare's creative position.

At the sexual level, his position can undoubtedly be called inverted, but it is perhaps not all that perverted at the level of love.

To enter into the path of the Sonnets will allow us to indicate a 419 little more precisely the dialectic of the subject with the object of his desire. In particular, we shall see what happens at moments when the object – disappearing and vanishing step by step by some pathway, the major one being the pathway of mourning – exposes the true nature of what corresponds to it in the subject for a while, a while that can last no more than an instant: what I will call appearances of the phallus, "phallophanies."

I will leave it at that today.

April 29, 1959

THE DIALECTIC OF DESIRE

XX

THE FUNDAMENTAL FANTASY

No pre-established harmony between desire and the world
Synchrony's privilege Desire and reality in Glover's work and in Hartmann's
Our experience with homosexuality
The dialectic grasped in its synchronic structure

We are thus talking about desire. The path I have been following this year, like any path, sometimes obliges me to take long detours. This is why I tried, during the break over the last two weeks, to re-center things in order to conceptualize anew the origin and aim of our work here.

This led me to come up with a clarification of the topic, which is also, I believe, designed for you, and which will be but yet another way for us to focus our attention in order to make headway in our research.

At the point we are at, let us try to articulate that with which we have a rendezvous. It is not simply the rendezvous of this Seminar, nor the rendezvous of our daily work as analysts. It is above all the rendezvous we have with our function as analysts and with the meaning of analysis.

If psychoanalysis were merely a therapeutic enterprise – like others that have appeared in the course of history – which is more or less founded and successful, we could not fail to be surprised by its longevity. There is no prior example of any theory or psychical orthopedics that has lasted for more than half a century.

What has allowed for the longevity of psychoanalysis, and of the role it plays beyond its use by physicians, that no one, in the end, dreams of disputing? We cannot fail to sense that it is the fact that psychoanalysis brings something with it that concerns man in a way that is simultaneously new, serious, and authentic – new in what it contributes, serious in its import, and authenticated by what? 424

Surely by something other than its often debatable and sometimes precarious results.

What is most characteristic here is, I think, the feeling people have that the thing I once called "the Freudian thing" is something that is being talked about for the first time. I would go further still, to the point of saying, regarding the authenticity of the thing, that its clearest manifestation, what attests to it every day, is the bountiful verbiage that surrounds it.

Indeed, what is striking, when you consider the massive production of psychoanalytic literature, is that its authors always strive to articulate the principle that guides their actions in analysis, without ever arriving, in the end, at anything that is closed, finished, or satisfying. This perpetual dialectical slippage, which constitutes the very movement and life of analytic research, attests to the specificity of the problem with which our research is connected.

Everything that our research includes that is clumsy, confused, or not terribly well founded, even in its principles, everything our practice contains that is equivocal – in which we always encounter what we intended to avoid, namely suggestion, persuasion, construction, and even initiation into mysteries – all of these contradictions in the psychoanalytic movement do no more than point out the specificity of the Freudian thing.

1

The Freudian thing is desire. That is how I am envisioning it this year at least, as an hypothesis, but one which is supported by the concentric progress of my previous work.

Nevertheless, in saying that the Freudian thing is desire, we perceive a sort of contradiction, insofar as the whole thrust of analysts' attempts at theorization seems to go in the direction of making desire lose the accent it originally had – and that it still has, as we cannot fail to note when we deal with it in our experience.

We cannot in any way view desire as functioning in a reduced or normalized way, in conformity with the requirements of some sort of preformed organic system that supposedly leads it down 425 pathways traced out in advance, and along which we would have to redirect it when it goes off course. On the contrary, ever since Freud began to develop psychoanalysis, desire has presented itself with the characteristic designated by the English word "lust,"* which means both covetousness [or: longing, convoitise] and lasciviousness [luxure]. The same word is included in the German term Lustprinzip [known in English as the pleasure principle], and you are aware that it is ambiguous insofar as it oscillates between pleasure and desire.

In psychoanalytic experience, desire presents itself at first as a problem [trouble]. It disturbs [trouble] our perception of the object. We see this in poets' and moralists' curses: desire denigrates, disorganizes, debases, and in any case undermines the object, going so far at times as to even dissolve he who perceives it – namely, the subject.

We find the very same perspective at the heart of Freud's position. Nevertheless, Lust, as it is brought to the fore by Freud, is formulated in a radically different way from everything that could have been said up until then about desire. The Lustprinzip is presented to us as being, at its very core, opposed to the reality principle. The original experience of desire seems to run counter to the construction of reality. The seeking [recherche] involved in it is blind in nature. In short, desire presents itself as a torment to man.

Now all those who had tried before Freud to spell out the meaning of the pathways taken by man in his quest had always adopted the principle that man seeks his own good. Over the centuries, philosophers never formulated a single moral theory in which the pleasure principle, whatever it may be, was not immediately defined as hedonistic. This means that man, whether he knows it or not, fundamentally seeks his own good, such that the errors and aberrations of his desire in practice can only be viewed as accidents.

Freud, on the other hand, proffers for the first time a theory of human nature whose principle fundamentally contradicts the hedonistic principle. An entirely different emphasis is given to pleasure, inasmuch as, in Freud's work, the very signifier is contaminated by the specific accent with which Lust, "lust"* – covetousness and desire – presents itself.

As opposed to what a harmonious and optimistic idea of human development might, after all, lead us to believe, there is no pre-established harmony between desire and the way the world works. 426 Desire is not organized or put together in that way, psychoanalytic experience teaching us that things go in an entirely different direction. As I have indicated here, psychoanalysis leads us down a path of experience whose very development makes us give up the emphasis on primordial instincts, invalidating it for us.

This means that the history of desire is organized in the form of a discourse that unfolds in the realm of the nonsensical [l'insensé]. This is the unconscious. The displacements and condensations in its discourse are undoubtedly the same as the displacements and condensations in discourse in general – in other words, metonymies and metaphors. But in this case they are metaphors that generate no meaning, and displacements that bring no being with them and in which the subject does not recognize anything that is displaced.

Psychoanalytic experience has advanced by devoting itself to the exploration of the discourse of the unconscious. The core dimension involved there is diachrony. Yet it is synchrony that constitutes the essence of the work we are engaged in here this year. I am attempting to reconceptualize the status of desire in order to situate it in the synchronic dimension.

Whenever we broach our experience – whether by reading the major account of it, the textbook* of the earliest experience of psychoanalysis, namely, The Interpretation of Dreams, or by considering a series of interpretations in any given analytic session – we realize that every interpretation involves a deferral [renvoi] from one wish to another in which the movement of the subject is inscribed, as well as the distance at which he finds himself from his own wishes. Although this mechanism of endless deferral never presents us with desire in anything but an articulated form, it nevertheless presupposes something that necessitates it at its core.

It is here that our strictly linguistic reference to structure comes into play. It reminds us that there can be no use of symbolism without there being primordially – that is, prior to any and all use of speech, which is known as discourse – a synchronism, that is, a language structure qua synchronic system. It seems to me that it is thus legitimate to hope that we will also manage to locate the function of desire in synchrony.

427 What we call man is therefore an x, a barred subject, insofar as he is the subject of logos and insofar as he constitutes himself as a subject in the signifier.

Where is desire situated in the synchronic relationship between the subject and the signifier?

It is enough to see what pathways psychoanalytic research, in its neglect of structural organization, is following today to sense just how necessary it is to re-elaborate or revamp the concept of desire, as we are doing, on this basis.

2

When, a few minutes ago, I mentioned the theoretical distinction made by Freud between the pleasure principle and the reality principle, did you realize that we had reached the precise point at which writers try to theorize analysis in the very terms that I said should be avoided because desire does not square with them?

It squares with them only to the degree to which these authors feel a need to believe that desire coincides with what everyone else thinks it is. They do everything possible to deduce their idea of optimal, or at least desirable, development from the notion that experience supposedly converges on maturation.

At the same time, if these writers could in fact formulate psychoanalytic theory in such terms and be content with the idea that the subject ontologically adapts to his experience of the world, this would mean they had abandoned all contact with their practice as analysts. The further they try to take this project, the more they make revealing mistakes – mistakes that reveal that they need to formulate things differently – and the more they arrive at paradoxes.

I will give an example, which I will take from one of the best analytic authors around, one who pays the most attention to formulating things correctly, not only regarding our practice but also regarding the sum total of our practice's initial data, and who also deserves credit for having striven to survey the notions and concepts we employ. I am talking about Edward Glover.

His work should be read because of the vast number of cases that 428
it summarizes. It is among the most useful to anyone who wishes to know what he is doing, which is still more indispensable in analysis than elsewhere. I will take up one of his many articles, one you must read, which came out in the International Journal of Psychoanalysis in October 1933, volume 14, number 4 [pp. 486–504]. It is entitled "The Relation of Perversion-Formation to the Development of Reality-Sense."

Many things in this article are worth discussing, if only the initial terms Glover provides in view of correctly broaching what he intends to show us. Specifically:

1 He defines "reality-sense" as "a faculty the existence of which we infer by examining the processes of reality-testing" [p. 486]. It is sometimes of great interest that things be formulated clearly.
2 He defines "efficient reality-testing" as the capacity, "for any subject who has passed the age of puberty, [. . .] to retain psychic contact with the objects that promote gratification of instinct, including here both modified and residual infantile impulse" [p. 486].
3 He defines "objectivity" as "the capacity to assess correctly the relation of instinctual impulse to instinctual object, whether or not the aims of the impulse are, can be or will be gratified" [p. 486].

These are his very important premises. You cannot fail to be struck by the fact that the author defines the term "objectivity" in a way in which it is not usually defined. This reminds us that not everything Freud said has been completely forgotten, because this definition of objectivity overthrows what hitherto seemed to us to be a category necessitated by our worldview.

On this basis, Glover undertakes a study of what is meant by perversion formations, understood most broadly, in relation to reality-sense. What is, in the end, the spirit of the article? It is to conceptualize perversion as a means by which a subject can deal with everything that does not fit for him into a coherent reality, including rips and things that flop.* Perversion is very precisely articulated by Glover as the "means of salvation for the subject to assure continuous existence to this reality."

This is quite an original viewpoint, since the upshot is that perversion becomes ubiquitous. Glover then tries to trace out 429 a developmental chronology, establishing a timeline on which psychotic disturbances are the earliest occurrences and neurotic disturbances come later. Between the two he situates drug addiction, which thus corresponds in his view to an intermediate stage. The point for him is, in short, to determine the chronological turning points or historically important developmental moments that give rise to different problems.

This point of view is open to criticism, as is every such attempt to provide a simple developmental timeline of analyzable complaints. As we cannot enter here into a detailed critique of the article, I will select a single paragraph that highlights the paradox that arises whenever people attempt to reduce the desire function or desire principle we deal with, to a preliminary, preparatory, not-yet-informed stage which involves adaptation to reality – whenever, that is, people attempt to reduce it to the first form of our relationship to reality. The principle that serves as Glover's point of departure, here as elsewhere, in developing his theory is, in effect, to classify perversion with respect to reality-sense.

I will simply indicate to you the consequences this principle brings with it by citing a short passage from his article, which differs from thousands of others in his writings only by the colorful, literary, paradoxical, and truly expressive form in which it is presented. Let me make it clear that this article was written during what one might call Glover's Kleinian phase, his work here having a great deal in common with Klein's system – in spite of the struggle against Klein he felt he had to engage in at the theoretical level.

In this passage, Glover is discussing the moment at which, he tells us, the subject's so-called paranoid phase gives way to the "reality system" that he calls "oral-anal." Glover describes the external world, in which children supposedly live, as something that "represent[s] a combination of a butcher's shop, a public lavatory under shell-fire, and a post-mortem room" – and Glover explains to us here that the point at that moment is to transform this world, which is rather tumultuous and catastrophic, "into a more reassuring and fascinating chemist's shop," one in which there is nevertheless a 430 little problem: "the poison cupboard is left unlocked" [p. 492].

This is quite cute and picturesque. But however implicit, profound, and buried children's experience may be, or we may assume it to be, there is nevertheless a problem in theorizing that children actually broach reality in the form of a butcher's shop, a public lavatory under shell-fire, or a morgue.

It is not because this formulation is initially shocking that we can rule it out, but at the same time we would be justified in doubting its accuracy. It obviously cannot coincide with the usual form of child development, especially when one views this development as characterized by the ways in which the subject adapts to reality.

At the very least, such a formulation necessarily implies the hypothesis of a twofold reality. In one form of reality we could locate behaviorism, but there would be another reality on whose eruptions in the subject's behavior we would then have to keep an eye. Otherwise stated, we are immediately obliged to restore the autonomy and originality of another dimension which is not primitive reality, but which is, right from the outset, something that goes beyond the subject's lived experience.

Once it is articulated, this contradiction becomes so obvious that I may need to apologize for having discussed it at such length. Nevertheless, it is so well disguised in certain people's work that it gives rise to a serious equivocation in the use of the term "reality." When we assume that reality undergoes a development parallel to that of the instincts – and this is the most widespread belief – we arrive at strange paradoxes that inevitably have repercussions on analytic practice.

If we assume that desire is already there – in other words, that it exists in reality – it becomes necessary to talk about it, not in a disguised form, but in its earliest form: instinct. The latter is supposedly involved in both evolution and in psychoanalytic experience. To say that desire is inscribed in a realm that is homogeneous with reality, that it is part and parcel of the same realm as reality, and that it can be thoroughly explained and taken up in terms of reality – these being formulations that we find nowadays in virtually all of psychoanalytic theory – implies the following paradox: what allows 431 the world to achieve its full objectivity is the maturing of desire. This proposition is part and parcel of the basic belief system of a certain form of analysis.

Here I would like to raise a question about what this means concretely. What is a world, to we living beings? What is reality in Hartmann's version of psychoanalysis, for example?

Hartmann gives full credit to the structuring elements that ego organization brings with it. This ego, he says, has adapted in such a way as to move about efficiently within constituted reality. Well I, too, would like to provide an image that conveys to you what we are talking about. To give you a concrete image of the most typical and developed form of world we are talking about, adult reality, I will liken it to the world of American lawyers.

For the world of American lawyers is not simply an important field in our universe, but is, it seems to me, currently the most elaborate world that we can define when it comes to our relationship with reality – or at least with what we call such. For we find there the complete gamut running from a certain violence – whose presence is essential, fundamental, and can always be required so that one cannot say that reality is in any way elided there – to subtleties of legal procedure that allow one to introduce into this world all sorts of paradoxical novelties, novelties that are defined by a relationship to the law that is essentially constituted by the detours required to obtain the most perfect violation of that very law.

Such is the world of reality. Now, what relationship can there be between this world and what one might call a "mature desire," in the sense of genital maturity?

The question can assuredly be answered in several ways, one of which is that of experience – namely, the sexual behavior of American lawyers. Now, nothing so far seems to confirm that there is an exact correlation between the optimal development of a world, all of whose activities are so well managed, and a perfect harmony 432 in relations with the other, inasmuch as these relations involve some success or concord at the level of love. Nothing proves it, and almost no one would even dream of maintaining it.

I am merely sketching out for you where the question arises. The question is based on the fact that there is a confusion here regarding the term "object."

There are, on the one hand, objects that are supposedly situated in reality, in the sense that I have just articulated it; and there are, on the other hand, objects that are inscribed in the relationship between the subject and the object, a relationship that at least latently implies knowledge. When people claim that the object matures as desire matures, what object are they talking about?

It is an object that is quite different from the one that we can actually situate in the place where an objective mapping allows us to characterize reality-based relations. We have long been familiar with the object we are talking about; it goes by the name of the object of knowledge, even if it is altogether veiled there.

This object has been the goal, aim, and endpoint of research for millennia. Such research is still there, behind the fruits it yielded when it became what we call "science," after having had to follow the pathways of the subject's rootedness in the world for a long time. It was undeniably on the basis of this rootedness, I mean at the philosophical level, that science was able to find its point of departure at a certain moment, even if science – like a child who becomes independent after having been nourished for many years – has now taken its distance from this form of reflection. We see traces of this original rootedness in the guise of the theory of knowledge.

In this realm, people came as close as they could to a profound identification between the two terms in the subject/object relationship. For them, knowing is related to a co-naturalness, and any attempt to grasp the object manifests something related to a harmony that has to exist.

Let us not forget that this is certainly but the result of a specialized practice, one that stands out in a history that gave rise to several branches. I will confine my attention here to our branch, that of Greek philosophy.

The attempt to pinpoint and promote what is known as the object involves a theoretical attitude which we would be completely wrong 433 to think that, now that results have been obtained, we can eliminate, as if this theoretical stance had no impact on its effect.

What did this attempt to know imply about the status of desire? We analysts are certainly able to raise this question, but it was not unnoticed by religious thinkers, and we can, here as elsewhere, merely follow in their wake. Inasmuch as religious practice has other aims than psychoanalysis, it has specified this desire as the desire to know, cupido sciendi. We merely add our own two cents' worth to this when we indicate that it has a more fundamental basis: some ambivalent drive like scopophilia or even oral incorporativeness.

Be that as it may, one thing is clear, which is that the development of knowledge, including the implicit notions about the object it brings with it, results from a choice. The establishment of every philosophical position has, throughout the ages, necessarily involved being recognized as a stance that involves sacrificing something. The entrance of the subject into the realm of what is known as pure research [recherche désinteressée], the fruit of which is objectivity – after all, attaining objectivity has never been defined in any other way than as grasping a certain reality from an unbiased [désintéressée] perspective – entails the exclusion, at least in theory, of a certain form of desire.

This is the perspective from which the concept of the object was developed. It is not pointless for us to reintroduce it here. After all, we know what we are doing, because this perspective is implicit in the presupposition of a virtual and latent correspondence – which must always be found anew or obtained – between the investigation of desire and the object that this investigation explores.

We have reason to distinguish, on the contrary, between the object that satisfies the desire for knowledge – the philosophical notion of which has been the fruit of centuries of elaboration – and the object of a desire.

It is owing to a confusion between these two notions that analysts 434 have been so easily led to posit a correspondence between a certain constituting of the object and a certain maturing of the drive.

Taking a stand against this, I have tried to provide you with a different formulation of the relationship between desire and its object, which I claim to be closer to our experience.

We are now going to turn to the true articulation, which I call synchronic.

3

The symbolic formula ($$ \lozenge a$) gives form to what I call the fundamental fantasy.

This is the true form of the supposed "object-relation," not the form in which it has been articulated up until now.

To say that we are talking here about the fundamental fantasy means nothing more than that, from a synchronic perspective, it gives desire its minimal supporting structure.

It contains two terms and their twofold relationship to each other constitutes fantasy. Their relationship is still more complex insofar as the subject is constituted qua desire in a tertiary relation to fantasy.

Today I will take up this tertiary perspective. Moreover, I will show that the subject's assumption [assomption] involves a. This is just as legitimate as to show that it involves the barred subject, given that desire is sustained in a confrontational relationship to ($$ \lozenge a$).

I believe that I have already taken things far enough here that it will not shock you, throw you off, or surprise you if I claim that object a is defined first of all as the prop that the subject gives himself inasmuch as he falters [défaille] . . . – I will interrupt myself here for a moment and begin by saying something approximate that may have some impact on you – . . . inasmuch as he falters in his certainty as a subject. Now I will give you the exact term, but it is not very intuitive, which is why I did not want to give it to you right away: inasmuch as he falters in his designation as a subject.

What is at stake here is based entirely on what happens in the Other, inasmuch as the Other is the locus of the subject's desire. Now, in the Other, in the Other's discourse which the unconscious 435 is, the subject is missing something [or: something is not available to the subject, quelque chose fait défaut au sujet]. We will come back to this later, we will come back to it as often as necessary, and we will come back to it right up to the end.

Owing to the very structure that establishes the relationship between the subject and the Other qua locus of speech, something is missing [fait défaut] at the level of the Other. What is missing there is precisely that which would allow the subject to identify himself as the subject of his own discourse. Insofar as this discourse is the discourse of the unconscious, the subject instead disappears in it.

In order to designate himself, the subject must consequently employ something that is taken at his own expense. Not at his expense as a subject constituted in speech, but at his expense as a real, live subject, at the expense of something which, taken by itself, is not a subject at all. The subject who pays the price necessary to be able to locate himself as faltering is thus brought into the dimension that is always present whenever desire is involved: having to pay for castration.

Stated otherwise, something real, which he has a hold on in an imaginary relationship, is raised to the pure and simple function of a signifier. This is the final and most profound meaning of castration as such.

Freud's essential discovery is the fact, which had been overlooked hitherto, that castration is involved as soon as desire manifests itself clearly as such. This fact opened up for us all sorts of historical perspectives, which people have translated in various mythical fashions, and which people then tried to reduce to developmental terms. This developmental approach – involving the diachronic dimension – was undoubtedly fruitful, but it cannot spare us the trouble of exploring the other dimension, the synchronic dimension, to see what the essential relationship involved there is.

The latter is the relationship between the subject and the signifying system [le signifiant], inasmuch as the subject cannot designate himself in it, or name himself as a subject in it. He must make up for this inability [défaut] through personal sacrifice [payer de sa personne], as it were. I am trying to be as evocative as I can be here, and thus am not always employing the most rigorous terms.

We can find an analogue of what happens next in the function of 436 certain symbols that linguists distinguish in the lexical system, which go by the name "shifter symbols."* I have already mentioned the personal pronoun "I," which designates the person who is speaking. At the unconscious level, the same is true for little a. This a, which is not a symbol but rather one of the subject's real elements, is what intervenes to support the moment, in the synchronic sense, at which the subject falters in attempting to designate himself [or: because he designates himself, défaille pour se désigner] at the level of the instance of desire.

I realize that mental gymnastics of this kind can be tiring to you. Which is why, in order to give you a break, I will illustrate this with terms from our concrete practice. I have said that a is the effect of castration. I did not say that it was the object of castration. The object of castration is what we call the phallus. What is the phallus?

We see it appear in what, last time, I called the artificial phallophanies of analysis. Here too, psychoanalysis shows itself to be an original, absolutely unique form of practice, for before it there was no form of alchemy, whether therapeutic or not, in which the phallus appeared. In the work of Hieronymus Bosch, there are all sorts of detached members. And there is the anything but fragrant flatus [gas] that Ernest Jones took as the prototype for the Holy Ghost. We have very clear images of all this, but you can note that we do not see the phallus very often. Yet we ourselves see it, and we also realize that it is not very easy to pinpoint exactly. This is but a tangent.

Our experience with homosexuality only became defined once we began to analyze homosexuals. At first, people did not analyze them. In 1905, Professor Freud could not go any further, as he tells us in The Three Essays on the Theory of Sexuality, than the notion that male homosexuality is based on the subject's narcissistic requirement that his object have a phallus, it being considered essential by the subject.

Then we began analyzing homosexuals. Have a look at the truly 437 exemplary work done by Felix Boehm, who was one of the first to have taken an interest in this. His work begins in the 1920s and continues up until 1933 and beyond that as well. I mentioned a number of other works on homosexuality when I spoke to you about the importance of the articles by [text missing here].

Such analytic work showed that homosexuality is far from being a primordial, instinctual requirement, and that it cannot be identified with a pure and simple fixation or deviation of instinct. People also realized that the phallus that plays a role, of one kind or another, in the mechanism of homosexuality is far from having the same status as other objects, and they identified it, perhaps too hastily, with the father's phallus. The latter was supposed to have its home in the woman's vagina, and to be feared because of that, which supposedly explains why the subject finds himself forced into an extreme position, that of homosexuality. We see there, in any case, a phallus of an entirely different import, with a thoroughly different function, and situated in an altogether different place than what had been mentioned earlier.

That's not all. After being overjoyed, as it were, that we now had the bull by the horns, we continued to analyze homosexuals and realized that the image of the phallus as an appendix that the subject at first believes women have, inasmuch as they are not yet castrated, is not the last word regarding this matter.

Indeed, in being looked at more closely, this image – which at a later date was brought into play in the psychoanalytic theorization of homosexuality – turned out to be what one might call an evagination, that is, the turning inside out of the vagina. In this fantasy – that we already encountered in the dream of the hat turned inside out whose analysis I went through with you at such length – the phallic appendix seems to be made from the externalization of the insides. Thus, in analysis, when one presents a homosexual the everyday dialectic of his desire, in a certain investigatory perspective, this turns out to be the final imaginary term with which he finds himself confronted.

The homosexual in question here is one of those who was analyzed by Boehm, and on this point I am relying heavily on his work, which is especially illustrative and confirmed by a great deal of 438 experience.

What can we say about this fantasy if not that the phallus presents itself here in a radical form, inasmuch as its function, in the end, is to show on the outside what is in the subject's imaginary inside?

We should almost not be surprised that a certain convergence is established here between the imaginary and symbolic.

What is found in the imaginary in an inside-out, extirpated, almost detached, but not yet detached position with respect to the inside of the body can be raised quite naturally to the function of a symbol, without for all that being detached from its radical insertion, which is such that it is felt to be a threat to the integrity of one's self-image.

4

I do not want to end today on the point I just made.

For it is not what will provide us with the meaning and function of little a as an object, most generally speaking.

Inasmuch as the subject is desire, he is always imminently threatened with castration. What props his position up is, as I told you, the object in fantasy, which is the most complete form of the object. I would now like to show you in what sort of synchrony this relationship can be articulated.

Let me underscore the word synchrony, for the necessity of discourse will force me to give you a formulation of it that is diachronic. The upshot being that you will be prone to confusing it with some sort of genesis. Yet it is nothing of the sort.

The relations between the letters that I am now going to write on the blackboard [see Table 20.1] are designed to allow you to situate little a in its proper place. It is insofar as the subject is in the presence of imminent castration that he is related to this object. I will provisionally designate this relation to the object as the price that must be paid [rançon] for the subject's position, because I must also emphasize what I mean by talking about this relation as desire's prop.

439 Table 20.1 Synchronic schema of the dialectic of desire

A	D
rS	D
A	S
a	$
A'
A"
A"'

How is the synchronic relationship generated? We begin from the earliest subjective position, that of demand. You see it indicated on the top line, on the right, by capital D. It is the manifestation, illustration, or example in the individual's behavior that allows us to grasp essentially how the subject is constituted insofar as he enters into the signifier.

The synchronic relationship in question is established according to a very simple algorithm, which is that of division. It is indicated by the vertical line. A horizontal line separating the levels is provided here, too, but there is nothing essential about it since it can be repeated at each level.

The subject's most primordial relationship is that involving demand addressed to the Other qua locus of speech. The Other figures here in the form of the letter capital A. It is on the basis of the relationship A divided by D that the dialectic begins whose remainder will give us the position of a, the object.

At the beginning of this process, the subject's need is primordially articulated in terms of a signifying alternative, and everything is established that later structures the subject's relationship to himself known as desire. The Other, who is someone real here, a real subject, rS, finds himself in a position – owing to the fact that he is called upon by demand – to transform demand, whatever it may be for, into something else, which is a demand for love, insofar as the latter purely and simply refers to the presence/absence alternative. This is why, in the second row, I place a bar on capital D. 440

Let me point out in passing that I could not fail to be surprised, touched, and even moved when I found in Shakespeare's Sonnets the literal term "present-absent," complete with a hyphen, at the point at which he was describing love relationships.

We thus see the subject constituted here insofar as the Other is a real person, the one through whom demand itself becomes laden with signification, the one through whom the subject's demand becomes something other than what it explicitly asks for, which is the satisfaction of a need.

There is no subject except to another subject – this is a principle we must maintain as having forever been true. Owing to the fact that the Other is primordially posited as he who, in the presence of demand, can play a certain game or not, the Other is already established as a subject and as a term in the tragedy that is going to be played out. In other words, the introduction of the subject or individual into the signifier takes on the function of subjectifying the Other, which is what leads me to write the letter capital S preceded by a lower case r below the letter capital A.

It is insofar as the Other himself is a subject that our subject is instated, and that he can establish himself as a subject in a new relationship to the Other – one in which he must get himself recognized as a subject by this Other, no longer as demand, nor as love, but as a subject.

Am I in the process of attributing here to some sort of larva all the dimensions of self-consciousness concocted by philosophical reflection? This is not what is involved. Or, better stated, this is involved but in a form that is truly concrete and real, instead of being hidden or veiled as it is in philosophy.

What guarantee can he find for the Other's function and functioning in reality, as responding to his demand? What can attest to the truth of the Other's behavior, whatever it may be? What is at the concrete foundation of the notions of truth and of intersubjectivity? What gives its full meaning to the term "truth"* in English, which simply expresses Truth with a capital T? Everything depends on what we call in French, in a breaking down of language that turns 441 out to be a product of the linguistic system, foi en la parole, "faith in speech." In other words, in what respect can we count on the Other?

This is what is at issue when I tell you that "there is no Other of the Other." What does this mean if it is not that no signifier exists that can guarantee any concrete, serial manifestation of signifiers. It is here that the term A barred comes in.

Under the pressure of the subject's demand for a guarantor, what happens at the level of the Other is primordially something related to a lack [Ⱥ] in relation to which the subject must situate himself. Let us note that this lack is produced at the level of the Other qua locus of speech and not at the level of the Other qua real. Nothing real on the Other's side [of the table] can make up for this, except by a series of additions, A', A", A"', that will never be exhausted.

The Other will manifest himself to the subject, over the course of his entire existence, through gifts or refusals. But that will never be situated anywhere other than in the margins of the fundamental lack that is itself found at the level of the signifier. The subject will be historically invested in all sorts of experiences with the Other, the maternal Other in this case, but none of that will be able to exhaust the lack that exists at the level of the signifier as such, which is the level at which the subject must situate himself in order to constitute himself as a subject and get himself recognized by the Other.

The subject himself is marked by this failure [défaillance] or non-guarantee at the level of the truth about the Other [or: level of the Other's truth, niveau de la vérité de l'Autre]. And this is why he will have to institute what I already tried to broach earlier in the form of his genesis – namely, little a. These two terms, S barred and little a, face each other in the fourth row of the table.

Little a is that something that turns out to be subjected to the condition of expressing the subject's final tension, the tension that is the remainder or residue, the tension that lies in the margins of all of these demands [or: latent within all of these demands, en marge de toutes ces demandes], and that none of these demands can exhaust. This something is destined to represent a lack and to represent it with a real tension on the subject's part.

This is the hitch [os], so to speak, in the object's function in desire. This is the price that has to be paid for the fact that the subject cannot situate himself in desire without castrating himself – in other words, without losing what is most essential about his life. Simone 442 Weil's remark, "To ascertain exactly what the miser whose treasure was stolen lost: thus we should learn much," already pinpointed what this form is situated around, it being one of the most exemplary forms of desire.

It is, naturally, in order to save his life that the miser keeps little a, the object of his desire, locked up in an enclosure – which, let us note, is an essential dimension. But owing to this very fact, this object turns out to be a mortified object. What is placed in a treasure chest is removed from the circuit of life, being subtracted therefrom, in order to be preserved as the shadow of nothing, and this is what makes it the miser's object.

Thus the French expression Qui veut garder sa vie, la perd, "he who wishes to save his life will lose it," is corroborated. Does this imply that he who consents to lose his life finds it anew as directly as all that? Not so fast. We will try to see next time where he finds it anew.

Our trajectory today shows us – and this is not the least contribution it makes – that the path the subject goes down to find his life anew will in any case present him with what he consents to lose: the phallus.

If the subject has mourned the loss of the phallus – which, as I have indicated, is a necessary stage – from then on he can only aim at the phallus as a hidden object.

Little a is an obscure, opaque term, part and parcel of a nothing to which it is reduced. It is beyond this nothing that the subject will seek out the shadow of that life of his which he at first lost.

The table on the blackboard gives you the contours of the functioning of desire. It shows you that the lost object, the object to be found anew, is not the one that the developmental perspective has proposed as the primal object of a primordial impression. It is part and parcel of desire's very nature to constitute the object in accordance with this dialectic.

We will pick it up there next time.

May 13, 1959

XXI

IN THE FORM OF A CUT

The subject's "Est-ce?" Real versus knowledge
On the subject's real Three examples of object a Breathing and the voice

We are going to pick up today where we left off last time. I had formalized a sort of operation for you in the form of a subjective division involving [or: in, dans] demand. We shall return to it, and this will lead us next to examine the formula for fantasy, inasmuch as it props up the pivotal relationship that I am trying to lay out this year in the functioning of psychoanalysis.

1

You may recall that I put the letters A/D on the board in order to designate demand's imposition or proposition [or: proposal, proposition] in the Other's locus, which I presented to you as the earliest ideal stage [see Table 20.1].

This is no more than a reconstruction, naturally. And yet nothing is more concrete or real. It is to the degree to which a child's demand begins to be articulated that the process begins – or at least I intend to show that it begins – by which the Spaltung [splitting] brought on by [du] discourse, that is expressed in the effects the unconscious has, forms.

Now I am going to write rA/S on the board. To the right, we have the subject's first position, grasped in the act of the first articulation of demand. Its necessary counterweight is the position of the real Other, rA, insofar as it is all-powerful in responding to this demand. This stage is essential if we are to understand the foundation of the first relationship to the Other, who is the mother here, where we find the first form of omnipotence. 444

Nevertheless, as I said, it is not by examining the Other, but rather by considering what occurs at the level of demand that we are going to extend the process of logical generation. I had expressed it to you last time with the letters rS/$\not$D. On the left, I introduced the Other as a real subject, whereas demand, which is initially demand for the satisfaction of a need, turns out to take on a different import as it becomes demand for love, and this is what is designated by the D shown here with a bar through it.

I no longer recall if it was in this form that I wrote it on the board. [The audience says yes.] Fine. It does not matter much, anyway, since this is designed to generate the entire palette of the subject's real experiences, which will be inscribed in a certain number of responses, whether gratifying or frustrating. Even though they are, of course, highly essential, inasmuch as a certain modulation of the subject's history is inscribed in them, they do not affect the formal, synchronic analysis that I am currently conducting here.

If we begin from an initial stage at which the Other is the real Other who responds to demand, we see that at the next stage, the subject questions the Other as a subject, our subject appearing to himself to be a subject inasmuch as he is viewed as a subject by this Other. The relationship, designated by A/S, is the first stage of the actual constitution of the subject.

This means that the subject is constituted in relation to another subject, one who speaks. He must get his bearings in the fundamental strategy that arises with the appearance of the dimension of language, and that begins with this dimension alone. Owing to the fact that the Other has become structured in language, she becomes the possible subject of a strategy, with respect to which the subject himself can be constituted as a subject recognized in the Other, as a subject to another subject.

On the one hand, there can be no subject who is not a subject to another subject; on the other hand, it is only as a speaking subject, as a subject of speech, that the first subject can be established as such. And since the Other is herself marked by the necessities of language, she is no longer a real Other; rather, she is established as the locus of the articulation of speech [or: locus in which speech is articulated]. The first possible position for a subject as such – a subject who can grasp himself as a subject, who can grasp himself as a subject in the Other, insofar as this Other thinks of him as a subject – is created in that locus. 445

As I mentioned last time, there is nothing more concrete than this. It is in no wise a stage in philosophical thinking; it is something primitive that is established in a trusting relationship. To what degree and up to what point can I count on the Other? What portion of the Other's behavior is reliable? What consequences can I expect from what she has already promised?

These are the questions around which one of the earliest conflicts in the relationship between the child and the Other revolves, even what is undoubtedly the earliest conflict, from the vantage point that interests us. This – and not pure and simple frustration or gratification – is the basis on which the principles of the child's history are built; this is the mainspring of what is repeated at the deepest level of his destiny; this is what commands his behavior's unconscious modulation. Psychoanalysis, and even our daily experience of psychoanalysis, teaches us that the question whether the subject can or cannot rely on some Other is what determines what we find to be most crucial in the patient's unconscious modulation, whether he be neurotic or not.

At this stage, the Other is a subject of speech [or: a speaking subject or one of speech's subjects, sujet de la parole], insofar as speech is primordially articulated. It is in relation to the Other thus defined that the subject himself is constituted as a subject who speaks, and not as some sort of primitive knowing subject – that is, not as the subject talked about by philosophers. The subject at stake here is posited as being observed by the Other and as being able to respond to him in the name of a shared strategy. He is the one who can interpret everything the Other articulates about her most profound intention and about her good or bad faith.

At this level – at which the subject is in abeyance – S is truly posited, if you will allow me a play on words, not only as the S written with a letter, but also as the Es of Freud's topography of the subject. This S is the id [Ça], and in an interrogative form. If you add a question mark, S is in fact articulated as Est-ce? ["Is it?" or "Is this?"] This is all the subject thus far formulates about himself at this level. He is here in statu nascendi, in the presence of the Other's speech [articulation], inasmuch as that speech responds to him.

In this speech, the Other responds to the subject beyond what 446 the latter formulated in his demand. If the subject wants to get his bearings [or: get ahold of himself, se saisir] in the beyond that speech brings with it [dans cet au-delà de la parole], he will thus have to take a step that brings him to the following stage: a/$ [see Table 20.1].

This subject is marked with a bar that primordially divides him from himself qua subject of speech. It is thus as a barred subject that he can, must, and intends to find the answer. But he does not find it, for at this level he encounters in the Other the hollow or empty space that I formulated by telling you that "there is no Other of the Other"; that no possible signifier can guarantee the authenticity of the series of signifiers; that there is nothing, at the level of the signifier, that guarantees or authenticates the signifying chain or speech in any way. This is why the subject depends so essentially on the Other's goodwill.

It is at this point that the subject brings in from elsewhere – namely, from the imaginary register – a part of himself that is involved in the imaginary relationship to the other. This is little a. It arises at the very place where S wonders what he truly is and what he truly wants.

What we call object a is undoubtedly the object of desire, but on condition that we make it clear that it does not, for all that, adapt to desire. It comes into play in a complex that we will call fantasy. The subject manages to prop himself up with this object at the moment at which he vanishes when faced with the signifier's failure [or: inability, carence] to answer for his place as a subject at the level of the Other.

At the level at which the subject attempts to reconstruct himself, to meet back up with himself in the demand he makes to the Other, and to authenticate himself as a subject of speech, the operation of division stops. For the quotient that the subject is seeking to reach remains in abeyance [or: suspended] in the presence of the appearance, at the level of the Other, of the remainder [object a] owing to which the subject himself pays the ransom for, and comes to make up for [suppléer] the deficiency [or: absence, carence] of the signifier that responds to him at the level of the Other. This quotient [$] and this remainder [a] remain in each other's presence here and prop each other up, as it were. Fantasy is nothing but the perpetual confrontation between barred S and little a.

The barred subject marks the moment of the subject's fading* in which the subject finds nothing in the Other that can clearly guarantee the subject, that authenticates him, that allows him to situate and name himself at the level of the Other's discourse – in other words, qua subject of the unconscious. It is in response to this moment that an imaginary element, the correlative term of fantasy's structure, arises to make up for [or: to stand in for, comme suppléant du] the missing signifier. I designate this element in its most general form as S's prop at the moment at which S tries to designate himself [s'indiquer] as the subject of unconscious discourse. 447

It seems to me that I need say nothing further on this point. I am going to say a bit more anyway to indicate what this means in Freud's discourse. Let us reconsider, for example, Freud's claim, Wo Es war, soll Ich werden, translated as follows: Là où C'était, là Je dois devenir [Where it (or id) was, I must come into being].

This is very precise. What is involved here is Ich [that is, the personal pronoun I], which is not das Ich, the ego. Ich is used here as the subject of the sentence. Là où C'était means where It/id [Ça] speaks – in other words, where just a moment before, there was something: unconscious desire.

It is there [where unconscious desire was] that I must designate myself, that I must be. This I is the goal, end, and terminus of analysis before it names itself, forms, and is articulated – assuming it ever does or is, because the soll Ich werden in Freud's formulation must be understood as dois-Je devenir [I must become]. The I is the subject of a becoming, of a duty [devoir] that is proposed to us.

Freud tells us in this sentence that we must reconquer the lost field of the subject's being. And he illustrates it with a lovely comparison to Holland and its peaceful draining of the Zuider Zee, of the submerged lands. What is at stake here is the field of the unconscious that we must win back in the course of the Great Work of psychoanalysis.

But a question arises: before this is done, what designates to us the place, là où Ça était [where It/id was], the place of the I that must come to light? The index of desire, precisely speaking. I mean of desire qua function and terminus of what is at stake in the unconscious, desire sustained by the coexistence and opposition of two terms, $ and little a.

At this edge where the unconscious begins, the subject loses himself. We are not just talking here about the absence of something that one might call consciousness. Another dimension begins here where it is no longer possible for the subject to know either who he is or where he is. Any and all possibility of naming himself ends here.

But at this terminus we also find the index [of desire]. The object right in front of the subject indubitably fascinates him. But this is 448 not its major function. Appearances to the contrary notwithstanding, this object is also what stops the subject from blacking out, from having his pure and simple existence wiped out.

This is what constitutes the structure of what I call fantasy. We are now going to see just how broadly the formula for fantasy can be applied. We are thus going to consider fantasy's synchronic function.

What does that mean?

What is involved is the place occupied by fantasy in the subject's self-references, his references to what he is at the level of the unconscious – not when he wonders about what he is, but when he is, in short, borne along [porté] by the question about what he is, which is the very definition of neurosis.

2

What is targeted at the moment of desire is, as I say, a naming of the subject that proves to be deficient [défaillante].

In fantasy, the subject is on the verge of this naming, and this is what defines fantasy's structural role.

This is a culminating point at which the subject undergoes – maximally, as it were – what one might call the virulence of logos, at which he registers the full alienating effect of his involvement in logos.

The fact that man is caught in the grips of logos – that is, in the fundamental combinatory that is its essential characteristic – undoubtedly raises a question: what does it mean for man to be necessary to the action of logos in the world? But it is for others to answer that question. What we must examine here is what the upshot of this is for man and how man deals with it. The first formulation that might come to mind is that he must really bear [soutenir] it, he must sustain it [soutienne] with his real, with himself as real – which is also what always remains most mysterious to him.

A digression would not be amiss here, in order to try to grasp what the term "real" – a term that I employ, contrasting it with the symbolic and the imaginary – can, in the final analysis, actually mean, which is something that a number of you have been wondering about for a long time. 449

On this point, it is certainly worth noting that our era, which has witnessed the invention of psychoanalysis, is also an era in which something has been forced on us, despite our ever-so-great resistance to it: a crisis in the theory of knowledge, or a crisis of knowledge itself.

I already endeavored to draw your attention to what the scientific venture signifies last time. Science was created and grafted onto a longstanding culture that involved adopting a stance that was biased [partiale] enough for us to call it partial [partielle]. Indeed, it involved a certain retreat – on the part of man, for whom the world was present – from stances that were initially contemplative.

As I have pointed out, we can assuredly specify these stances as constituting a discipline, ascesis, or choice. They did not entail a desiring stance as such, but rather the election of a certain form of desire – namely, as I said, the desire to know. What resulted from this is, as we know, science, our modern science, which is distinguished from others by the exceptional grip [prise] it has on the world – a grip that reassures us, in a way, when we speak of reality.

We know that we have at least some handle [prise] on the real. But what sort of handle is it, after all? Is it a cognitive handle? Do we take cognizance of the real? I can provide only a partial answer here.

If we consider what results from the scientific process at the point we are at today, and especially at the point at which the development of physics has arrived – which is the form of this process in which the grip of our symbolic chains on something that we call experiments [or: experience, l'expérience], which are constructed experiments, has gone the furthest and has encountered the greatest success – doesn't it seem to you immediately, at first glance, that we have less than ever the feeling that we have reached the ideal that the earliest philosophy set for itself?

From a Greek, Aristotelian, perspective, the goal of knowing – what rewarded the efforts of the philosopher or sage – was identification with the being that was known. At the end of the process, the 450 subject – or rather he who was thinking, he who was seeking knowledge, for he was not called a subject at the time – was supposed to identify with the object of his contemplation. What do we identify with at the end of the process of modern science? I do not believe that there is a single branch of science that proposes anything of the sort, whether it be the branch in which we have arrived at the most perfect and most advanced results [physics], or even the branch in which science is still taking its first step, trying to sketch out its foundations – I am referring to the form of psychology known as behaviorism.

The latter is still but a science in its infancy. It seems to want to imitate the little angel in Dürer's Melencolia I, the one who, alongside the adult Melencolia, is just beginning to spread its wings [see Plate 2]. Behaviorism can, nevertheless, be instructive to us. It shows us that when people found a psychology that claims to be scientific, they begin by positing that they are going to do simple behaviorism – in other words, they are going to confine themselves to looking at what is right in front of them and will above all refuse any sort of aim involving identification [with the object of study]. Above and beyond the method at stake, there is at the very crux of science a refusal to believe that one can, in the end, arrive at what Antiquity's ideal of knowledge entailed.

What is truly exemplary in behaviorism is such as to make us contemplate what we are told by another form of psychology – which we do not formulate as a science, of course, but which is nevertheless considered to be paradoxical with respect to the method thus far defined for a scientific approach – Freudian psychology.

The latter states, in effect, that a subject's real must not be conceptualized as correlated with some sort of knowledge. From the outset, the real, as a real in which a subject is involved, is not situated with respect to a knowing subject, since something in the subject is articulated that is beyond any possible knowledge he may have. Yet he is already a subject.

Furthermore, the subject recognizes himself in the fact that he is a subject of a chain that is articulated like a discourse is. Now, a discourse cannot be sustained without some sort of prop, and it would not be going too far to qualify this prop with the term "being." After all, if the term "being" means anything, if we give it its minimal definition, it is the real inasmuch as the real is inscribed in the symbolic.

A real is involved in this chain, and Freud tells us that it is coherent and commands the subject's behavior, beyond all the motives that are accessible to the play of consciousness [or: cognition or knowledge, connaissance]. It is a real that is articulated in the symbolic, that has come to occupy a place in the symbolic, and that has come to occupy it beyond the knowing [or: conscious] subject. This is truly something that deserves to be designated as along the lines of being, in the full sense of the word. 451

We arrive here at the end of the digression I began earlier.

It is at the very moment at which the branch of the tree of knowledge known as science – and which has given us results that undoubtedly go much further than any sort of effect expected from knowledge – proved to disappoint knowledge's hope of attaining identification with the object, that Freud pointed (in an experience of subjectivity as it is established in the confidential disclosing of things that goes on in analysis) to a chain in which things are articulated in a way that is structured just like any other symbolic chain, just like what we know as discourse, but which is not accessible to the subject. For, as opposed to what occurs in contemplation, the subject cannot rely on that chain as though it were an object in which he can recognize himself. On the contrary, he fundamentally misrecognizes itself in it.

The harder he tries to broach this chain and to name or locate himself there, the less he can do so.

He is only ever there in gaps and cuts. Every time he tries to get his bearings there, he is only ever in a gap.

This is why the imaginary object of fantasy with which he then tries to prop himself up is structured as it is.

There are many other things to demonstrate about the formalization ($$ \lozenge a$), but I would now like to show you how little a is constructed.

3

Let us first consider the formal properties of object a in the structure of fantasy, such as analytic experience allows us to recognize them.

As I just mentioned, the subject encounters himself as a cut or 452 gap at the endpoint of his questioning. Moreover, it is essentially in the guise of a cut that a shows us its form, in all its generality. I am simply going to list here a certain number of shared properties of the different forms of this object that are already known to you.

For those of you who are analysts, I can proceed quickly, with the proviso that I will have to go into detail and comment on this again later. What, for example, is going to allow us to recognize that the object in fantasy takes the form of a cut? Frankly, I believe that, at the level of the result, you will be a step ahead of me, at least I dare to hope so.

The subject, at the point at which he wonders about himself as a barred subject, finds nothing to prop himself up with but a series of terms that we call a insofar as they are objects in fantasy. As a first approximation, we can provide three examples of this. This does not imply that there are only three, but almost.

This list is not altogether exhaustive, inasmuch as taking things up at the level of what I will call the result – in other words, at the level of a qua constituted – is not a terribly legitimate approach. If I am adopting it, it is simply in order to start from already familiar terrain, in order to make it easier for you to cover the ground we need to cover. It is not the most rigorous pathway, as you will see when we follow the pathway of structure, which begins with the barred subject, insofar as it is the latter who necessitates the term "object." I am beginning with the object because it will allow you to get your bearings more easily.

There are three types of little a that have heretofore been identified and located in analytic experience: a, φ, and d.

The first type is the one that, rightly or wrongly, we usually call the pregenital object.

The second type is the sort of object that is involved in what is known as the castration complex, and you are aware that, in its most general form, it is the phallus.

The third type introduces the only term that will perhaps surprise you as new – but, actually, I think that those of you who have taken a close look at what I have written about the psychoses will not be terribly puzzled here. The third type of object [d] – which fulfills the exact same function with respect to the subject at his breaking point 453 and fading* – is neither more nor less than what is commonly called a "delusion." This is why Freud wrote, very early on in his practice, in his first reflections, "they love their delusions as they love themselves," "Sie lieben also den Wahn wie sich selbst" [SE I, p. 212].

We are going to take up these three forms of the object one by one in order to grasp what in their form allows them to serve the function of becoming signifiers that the subject draws from his own substance in order to be able to bear [soutenir] [something right] in front of him: the hole or absence of the signifier at the level of the unconscious chain.

As a pregenital object, what does little a mean?

A formulation comes to mind here, which summarizes, for more than one materialist thinker, what is, after all, the functioning of an organism, even if it is human, at the level of material exchanges: namely, and I am not the one who invented this, that an animal is nothing more than a tube with two orifices, one that things go into and another that things come out of. Well, this is how the so-called pregenital object is constituted, inasmuch as it comes to serve its signifying function in fantasy.

What nourishes the subject is cut off from him at a certain moment, not to mention the fact that, at times, things are reversed – this is the oral-sadistic stage – he himself cuts it off, or at least endeavors to bite it off. There is thus, on the one hand, the object qua object involved in weaning, which means, strictly speaking, the object involved in the cut [or: object cut off, objet de coupure], and there is, on the other hand, at the other end of the tube, the object he ejects and that is cut from him. All training in rituals and forms of toilet training thus consists of teaching the subject to cut from himself what he himself ejects.

In everyday analytic practice, what we make into the fundamental form of the object of the so-called oral and anal stages is tantamount to cutting [la coupure]. At the oral level, the object is the nipple, that part of the breast that the subject can hold in his buccal orifice, which is also what he is separated from. The object is also excrement, which at a different moment becomes the most significant form of the subject's relationship to objects, too.

These objects are very precisely selected insofar as they manifest in their form, in an exemplary manner, the structure of cutting [coupure]. Owing to this, they serve as props at the level of the signifier where the subject turns out to be situated as structured by a cut [coupure]. This explains why these objects are chosen over others. 454

People could not fail to ask why, if it were simply a question of the subject eroticizing one or another of his vital functions, there would not also be a more primitive and fundamental stage in which he would be attached to a function that is just as vital as that of nourishment – the latter starting at the mouth and ending with excretion from the intestinal orifice – namely, breathing.

Yet breathing does not in any way involve the element of cutting. Breathing does not cut itself off, and if it is cut off, it is in a way that does not fail to generate some drama. Nothing is inscribed in a cutting off of breathing except in an exceptional manner. Breathing is rhythm, pulsation, and vital alternation; there is nothing about it that allows us to symbolize, at the imaginary level, precisely what is at stake – namely, a gap or cut.

This is not to say, however, that nothing that goes through the respiratory orifice can, as such, be subjected to scansion, since it is through this very same orifice that the voice passes. Now, vocal production is something that is cut and scanned [se scande]. This is why later today we will come back to the voice when we turn to delusions.

When cutting or scansion is not imposed on this production, and it is simply pneuma or flatus [breath or wind], then, at the deepest level of our experience of it in the unconscious, it is not specified as being of a respiratory order, but is related to anal flatus. Furthermore, the latter paradoxically turns out to symbolize most profoundly what is at issue whenever the subject is symbolized by the phallus at the level of the unconscious. This is one of those unpleasant surprises that psychoanalysis has sprung on us.

It is to Jones's credit that he glimpsed this, and I recommend you read his studies on the topic.

455 Let us turn now to the second level.

I call it second merely for the artificial purposes of exposition, for there is neither a first nor a second level. All objects a have the same function. At the point we are at along our path, we simply want to know why they take one form or another. When we describe their form synchronically, however, we try to bring out their common characteristics.

When we turn to the castration complex, we find another form of little a, which is mutilation.

In effect, if what is at issue is cutting, it is necessary and sufficient that the subject separate himself from some part of himself, that he be able to mutilate himself. At first glance, this does not seem to introduce anything terribly new, as analytic writers have clearly seen, they reminding us what we have learned about mutilation from history and ethnography. Which is that – among all the initiation rites by which man seeks to define his access to his own reality, to a higher level of self-realization, and to the consecration of his full-fledged manhood – there are a certain number of forms of marking [stigmatisation] that I do not need to list for you here. Mutilation is one of them, and it plays an especially eminent role.

I will simply remind you now, taking the opportunity to put our finger on it, that what is involved here again, in another form, is something that we can clearly call a cut – truly so inasmuch as the cut inaugurates the shift to a signifying function here. What remains of this mutilation is a mark. Owing to this fact, a subject – who has undergone the mutilation as a particular individual in the flock – henceforth bears the mark of a signifier that extracts him from an initial state in order to convey him toward and identify him with the power to be different and better. This is the meaning of every type of initiatory practice.

This signification is found again at the level of the castration complex. Which is not to say that we have exhausted the question of what is at stake at this level. You must have noticed the ambiguities that revolve around the function of the phallus since I first began trying to broach it with you.

In a certain way, at the level of the castration complex, it is the 456
phallus that is marked and raised to the function of a signifier. Nevertheless, castration is not altogether implied by the ceremonies that lead to one or another type of deformity or circumcision. We must not confuse the mark that is brought to bear in this way on the phallus with the specific function of negativization that is ascribed to the phallus in the castration complex and that constitutes a type of extirpation.

We cannot grasp the latter at this stage in my exposition. We will return to it next time, I think, when we will have to explain a problem that arises for us, now that we are broaching these things anew and are inventorying them. I am simply indicating this to you today.

Why was Freud able to do something so outrageous at the outset, which involved tying the castration complex to something that inspection shows is not all that closely related to it – namely, a dominating, cruel, tyrannical function, that of a sort of absolute father? This is assuredly a myth. And like everything Freud bequeathed us – and this is quite miraculous – it is a myth that holds up. I will try to explain why.

Let us return to initiation rites, and the forms of marking and mutilation they entail. They are designed, by those who practice them, to transform the subject. This is why the angle from which we are broaching them today clearly shows that, in their fundamental function, they play the role of little a.

Initiation rites in primitive societies are designed to change the meaning of the subject's natural desires, which are allowed to run free and remain inchoate at the pre-initiation stage. The point is to give those desires a function with which the subject's being can identify and by which it can be designated as such, he becoming thereby, as it were, a full-fledged man. There are rites for becoming a woman, too. Mutilation serves to orient desire here, to have it function as the kind of index I spoke about earlier.

As an index of what? Of something that is actualized but that cannot be expressed except in a symbolic beyond. Today I have 457 called this beyond "being." Let us thus say that mutilation indexes the actualization of the subject's being here.

A few tangential remarks are in order here.

It is of course no accident if what receives a signifying mark in initiation rites is whatever sticks out. The phallic appendage is not the only one, as you know, that is employed for this purpose, even if there is no doubt but that the relationship of the subject to himself that makes him most apprehensive – namely, that of tumescence – naturally designates the phallus as the object that is most often offered up to the cutting function, and in a way that is more assuredly feared and scabrous than when it comes to any other object.

The same is true of the function of narcissism as the imaginary relationship of the subject to himself, which must be taken as the main structural support in which the formation of the significant object is inscribed. In our experience of the mirror stage, the subject turns out to be able to place his own tension or erection in the image of himself that comes to him from the other – namely, from beyond himself.

This is what allows us to perceive what may be legitimate in how the tradition of philosopher/psychologists had already broached the function of the ego. I am alluding here to what Maine de Biran contributed in his subtle analysis of the feeling of effort. Effort is a pressure [or: push or thrust, poussée] apprehended by the subject from both sides at once, inasmuch as he is the author of the pressure, but also the one who contains it, inasmuch as he feels [éprouve] the pressure he exerts within himself. Nevertheless, although he perceives himself [s'éprouve], he is never able to grasp himself, since there is, strictly speaking, no possible cut or mark here.

This allows us to notice the link that must be located between the experience of tumescence and that of fatigue – I mean what is known, at the level of erotic practice, as the neurotic's fatigue, whose mirage-like character and unobjectifiable nature you are aware of, since it has nothing to do with any muscular fatigue we can factually measure. If the effort cannot in any way serve the subject, nothing allowing us to stamp it with a signifying cut, this fatigue, which is symptomatic and paradoxical, seems conversely to be the aftermath 458 or trace in the subject of an effort on his part to "turn (or make) into signifiers" [signifiantiser], as I will call it.

It is here that we might be able to find, in its most general form, what – at the level of the subject's tumescence or pressure – shows us the limits at which possible consecration in the signifying mark vanishes. I felt it was important to mention this in passing.

We come now to the third form of little a, inasmuch as it can serve as an object.

Here I would really like it if people would try not to get this wrong, even though I do not have enough time today to go into all the details about what I will emphasize. Without undertaking a close rereading, which I will ask you to do, of what I wrote in "On a Question Preliminary to Any Possible Treatment of Psychosis" [in Écrits] – in which I laid out what allows us to formulate, in such an advanced and developed way, Judge Schreber's delusion – what I think is most likely to show you what is at stake and how I mean it is to try here to spell out the voice's function in delusions.

We will not be able to understand the phenomenological characteristics of the voice in delusions unless we have first been able to grasp in what respect it corresponds quite specifically to the formal requirements of little a, insofar as it can be raised to the signifying function of a cut or gap as such.

In the usual case, a subject produces a voice. I would go even further and say that the function of the voice always brings into discourse the subject's weight, his real weight. A raised voice [La grosse voix], for example, must be included in the formation of the superego as an agency, in which it represents the agency of an Other manifesting himself as real.

Is this the voice that is heard by someone who is delusional? Is it what Jean Cocteau tried to pinpoint the dramatic function of in his work entitled La Voix humaine [The Human Voice]? It suffices to consider the everyday experience we in fact have of the voice in an isolated form – in the very form in which Cocteau, with a great deal of relevance and flair, showed us its pure impact – namely, on the telephone.

What does the voice itself teach us, beyond what it says on the telephone? There is certainly no reason to lay out here the whole 459 range of experiences of it that one may have. It should suffice to mention the times you try to place an order, or make any other sort of request, at a shop, and lo and behold you end up with one of those voices, at the other end of the line, whose indifference immediately informs you of the ill-will of the person you are dealing with, his well-established will to elude what may be pressing or personal in your request. This sort of voice instantly indicates that you can expect nothing from the person with whom you are speaking. I will call this type of voice, using a term that has been beautifully crafted by the genius of the French language, une voix de "contremaître" [the voice of a foreman, supervisor, or overseer] – it is not that this guy is against [contre] the master [maître], but he is truly the contrary of the master. It is in this way that certain voices can sometimes convey vanity, irrelevance, and bureaucratic emptiness.

Is that what I mean when I speak of the voice functioning at the level of a? No, absolutely not.

In delusions, the voice presents itself as pure articulation, and this is what renders paradoxical what a person having a delusion tells us when we question him about the nature of the voices he hears. What he has to communicate always seems to slip away in the oddest way, whereas there is nothing more solid to him than the consistency and existence of the voice as such. Of course, it is precisely because the voice is reduced in his experience to its most cutting and purest form that the subject can but take it to be forcing itself on him.

This is why I emphasized, when we analyzed Judge Schreber's delusion, the (characteristic of) cutting that is altogether obvious there, since the voices heard by Schreber articulate only the beginnings of sentences, such as, Sie sollen werden. . . . The sentences are interrupted before the significant words are uttered, allowing a call for signification to arise after the sentence is cut short. The subject is indeed concerned by this [or: caught up in this, y est intéressé], but solely insofar as he himself disappears, succumbs, and is swallowed up whole in a signification that targets him only very generally.

460 Before closing, I will summarize for you what I have tried to home in on today with the words il l'intéresse [it interests him, concerns him, he is caught up in it].

I agree that today's class has perhaps been one of the most difficult of all those I have ever given here. You will, I hope, be rewarded next time, when we will proceed by less austere pathways.

I have asked you today to hold onto the notion of interest [intérêt]. He who is concerned [intéressé] is the subject inasmuch as he resides in the gap constituted by unconscious discourse [l'intervalle du discours de l'inconscient]. The subject is, strictly speaking, the metonymy of the being who expresses himself in the unconscious chain.

If the voices and senseless sentences get the subject especially interested in the delusion, it is for the same reason as for all the other forms of the object that I have enumerated for you today. It is at the level of the cut or gap that he becomes fascinated and fixated in order to sustain himself [or: thereby sustaining himself] – at the instant at which he targets himself and questions himself – as a being, as the being of his unconscious.

I do not want to close, however, without conveying – at least to those who have come here for the first time today – the import of the little link this lecture constitutes between others I have given lately.

It is important for us to see what we must do about fantasy, whose most radical and simple forms I have shown you, forms in which, as we know, it constitutes the preferred objects of the subject's unconscious desire. But fantasy is mobile. If we upset it, we must not believe that it can, just like that, jettison one of its members. I know of no examples of fantasies which, when suitably attacked, do not react by reiterating their fantasy form.

We are aware how complicated fantasy can become. In its so-called perverse form, it insists, it preserves and complexifies its structure, and it strives to ever more closely serve its function.

"Interpret fantasy," people say.

Is it purely and simply a question of bringing the subject back to actuality as we see it, to the actuality of reality that we can define 461 as men of science, or as men who imagine that everything can be cognized, known? It seems that a major trend in analytic technique is inclined to reduce the subject to reality functions – reality, for certain analysts, seeming not to have to be articulated otherwise than as the world of American lawyers, as I called it last time. Isn't this enterprise indubitably beyond the scope of the means employed by those with a certain modicum of conviction?

Doesn't the place occupied by fantasy require us to take another dimension into account? This dimension is that of what one might call the subject's true exigencies. This dimension cannot be confused with reality; it cannot be reduced to the everyday world; it is a dimension of being.

In this dimension, the subject bears within himself something that is, good Lord, perhaps as hard to bear as Hamlet's message, and which may doom him to a fatal destiny.

The main question is to know what value we analysts grant the experience of desire. Is it to us but a simple bump in the road, something rather bothersome, something that will go away if we wait long enough, when old age sets in, allowing the subject to quite naturally return to the pathways of peace and wisdom? Or does desire designate something else to us?

How should we operate with this something else?

What is our mission? What, in the final analysis, is our duty?

These are the questions I am raising when I speak about the interpretation of desire.

May 20, 1959

XXII

CUT AND FANTASY

Choice, drive, and repetition
The creative cut Details in works of art
Is the ghost* a liar?
Hamlet's fantasy

Today we will continue our study of the place where fantasy as a function is situated. Fantasy includes the part of the subject that is marked by speech's effects, in relation to an object a that we tried to define last time.

1

You know where fantasy as a function is situated on what I call the graph.

It is, in short, very simple. The intersecting of the two signifying chains, the upper and lower chains [left-to-right arrows], by a loop which is that of subjective intention, defines four points. I have referred to those on the right, A, and above it, ($◊D), as the points at which we find the code, whereas the other two are points at which we find the message, S(Ⱥ), and below it s(A), owing to the retroactive effect of the signifying chain as regards signification.

These are thus the four points that we have learned to give the following significations. The two points on the lower chain are loci where the subject's intention encounters the concrete fact that there is language. Today we are going to examine the other two signs – namely, the barred subject in the presence of D and the signifier of the barred Other.

I have long since elucidated what the two signifying chains represent.

464 The lower chain is that of the subject's actual discourse. As a first sketch, let us say that it is accessible to consciousness. That said, it is because it is based on illusions, as psychoanalysis has taught us, that we assert it to be completely transparent to consciousness.

If it were not, why would I have spent several years emphasizing what is illusory in this transparency effect, and used every means to convince you of this? I tried to show you, using a fable that you perhaps recall, that it is theoretically possible to imagine that a specular image can subsist independently of any subjective prop; it can persist long after the subject has ceased to exist; and it can even produce effects owing to a mechanism that persists in the subjective nothingness realized by the destruction of all life. I showed you this not for the simple pleasure of constructing such an apparatus, but to illustrate the fact that a montage structured like the montage of the signifying chain can be assumed to last far longer than any of the subjects who prop it up.

Our practice, which constantly brings us into contact with the subject's systematic misrecognition [méconnaissance], teaches us that consciousness – insofar as it gives us the feeling of being "me" [moi] in discourse – is not an immediately given fact, but is, rather, first experienced in an image, that of one's semblable. This experience throws an appearance of consciousness over what is implied by the subject's relations to the earliest, naive signifying chain, by his relations to innocent demand and actual discourse. I am talking about the type of discourse that flies from one mouth to the next, that gets repeated by one person after another, that organizes what there is by way of discourse in history itself – this actual, shared, everyday speech [discours universel] that envelops everything that in fact occurs at a greater or lesser distance from it, that envelops all real, social activity of human groups.

The other signifying chain [i.e., the upper chain] is the one that is clearly shown in psychoanalytic experience to be inaccessible to consciousness. That said, given that we doubt whether the first chain is altogether conscious, to characterize the second chain as inaccessible to consciousness raises many questions about the meaning of this inaccessibility. We must thus indicate what we mean by it.

465 Must we assume that the chain that is inaccessible to consciousness is constructed like a signifying chain? I will return to this later. Let us consider it first as it presents itself to us.

We have here the line $S(\not A)\rightarrow($\lozenge D)$, which is drawn as a dotted line in order to indicate that the subject does not articulate it as a discourse. What he currently articulates is something different, something that is situated in the intentional loop $($\lozenge D)\rightarrow S(\not A)$. In effect, it is inasmuch as the subject situates himself as operating within the play of speech while alienated by signifierness [en tant qu'agissant dans l'aliénation de la signifiance avec le jeu de la parole] that he articulates himself very precisely as a question or an enigma.

This is tangible in human development when, beyond the first demand, with all the consequences it already has, the child seeks to ratify [sanctionner] things in the realm established by signifierness – he says "What?" and he says "Why?" This constitutes an explicit reference to discourse and transforms the subject's first intention, that involving demand, into a second intention, that involving discourse itself. Here, discourse itself is questioned, things are questioned in relation to it, in relation to how they are situated in discourse. We are no longer dealing here with exclamations, interpellations, or cries based on need, but rather with naming.

I show the subject's second intention beginning from the locus A. Indeed, it is because the subject is thoroughly alienated by spoken articulation [i.e., speech] and signifierness that a question arises, the one I expressed last time in the guise of Est-ce? with a question mark. I expressed it thus not to indulge in equivocation, but because this guise corresponds to the current stage of my formulation of the topic here. In effect, once the subject has been instituted in speech, he tries to situate himself as the subject of speech [or speaking subject, sujet de la parole]. This is why he asks "Is it?" "What?" "Why?" "Who is speaking?" and "Where is it speaking?" What we see here is questioning that is internal to discourse, to the established locus of speech.

This question in effect constitutes the subject as a subject of speech. But the fact remains that, at this level, what is articulated at the level of the signifying chain is not articulable. The existence of the unconscious stems from that.

Some of you may worry that I am presenting the relationship between the unconscious chain and the subject's questioning as 466 identical to the relationship between the earliest discourse involving demand and the intention that arises out of need, as if this were an arbitrary construction.

Let me simply remind you that if the unconscious has a meaning, this meaning has all the characteristics of the signifying chain as a function. And I will complete this brief reminder by alluding to a little story that most of my audience here has already heard me tell when I spoke about the signifying chain. Those who do not recall it can have a look at the published version of it.

I am alluding to the fable of the white disks and the black disks [pinned to three prisoners' backs]. This fable illustrates something structural in subject-to-subject relationships, inasmuch as there are three subjects involved. In this fable, a pair of differential signs, white and black, allows us to discern the relationship between one subject and two others. Each subject situates himself with respect to the reasoning process engaged in by the other two subjects, which is based on the color of the disks that they see him and one of the others wearing. The three go through a succession of synchronous oscillations that lead them to conclusively make what I will call a Wahl, a choice, a fundamental choice, by which each of them decides what color disk he is wearing, white or black, and shows himself ready to declare it, which is what the fable was constructed for in the first place.

Now, isn't that something we are familiar with from the structure of the drive?

In this fable, we find identification relative to others, negation, refusal to articulate, and defense, which are as consistent with the drive as are two sides of the same coin. The matter is concluded with a decision that marks for the subject the fact that he indeed always makes the same choice in the same situations. We refer to this power of repetition, depending on whom we are dealing with, as we can – as a masochistic tendency, a penchant for failure, the return of the repressed, or a fundamental evoking of the primal scene – but we are dealing with one and the same thing: repetition in the subject of a type of sanction [sanction] whose forms go well beyond the characteristics of the content.

In essence, the unconscious always presents itself to us as an indefinitely repeated articulation. If it is legitimate to situate it on the graph in the form of a dotted line, it is, as I have said, because 467 the subject does not accede to it. At this level, the subject is, in the end, he who bears the mark or stigmata of a repetition that remains not only ambiguous, but strictly speaking inaccessible to him, until psychoanalytic experience – which puts a stop to it – allows him to name, situate, and designate himself in it as the medium [support] of the sanction.

He cannot say "I" at this level. Things present themselves, on the contrary, as "coming from the outside" [Ça arrive du dehors]. To say that a thing is coming is already a lot, for he can only read it as "it is speaking" [Ça parle]. There is such a great gap here that it is not clear that the subject can, in any way, bridge it and attain the goal that Freud enjoins us to aim at with the commandment Wo Es war, soll Ich werden.

Let us now turn to ($◊D). What is signified by this so-called code point, symbolized here by the confrontation between the barred subject and demand, capital D?

Let me emphasize first that this point only takes on its import when the deciphering of the coherence of the upper chain begins in the course of psychoanalysis. It is the precise point at which the chain of the subject's speech – insofar as he wonders about himself in what lies beyond actual discourse – encounters demand.

The subject in question here is the one that we retroactively assume to be the medium of the articulation of the unconscious [l'articulation de l'inconscient], inasmuch as he sees it, hears it, and reads it. He is the subject qua subject of the unconscious. What role does demand play here? It is assigned its truly symbolic form, and this is what is meant by the lozenge, ◊, between $ and D.

Demand comes in at this level inasmuch as, beyond what it insists on by way of need satisfaction, it presents itself as a demand for love that establishes the Other to whom it is addressed as someone who can be present or absent. It is in this respect that demand, whether it be oral or anal, takes on a metaphorical function here, and comes to symbolize a relationship with the Other. The subjective relationship to demand plays a code function here, inasmuch as it allows us to constitute the subject as being situated, for example, at the level of what, in our vocabulary, we call the oral or anal stage.

With the code, the subject can receive as a message a question that connotes, in what lies beyond the Other, the first taking up of 468 the subject in the signifying chain. It is a question that comes from the Other – on this [curved upper] line, which is also dotted – in the form "Che vuoi?": "What do you want?" It is also a question that the subject, again in what lies beyond the Other, asks himself in the form Est-ce?

The answer is symbolized on the schema by the Other's signifierness [signifiance] qua S(Ⱥ).

I grant this signifierness a broader meaning at this level, into which the adventure of the actual subject – that is, his subjective history – is going to flow. In its most general form, this meaning can be enunciated as follows: there is nothing in the Other or signifierness that can suffice at this level of signifying articulation; there is nothing in signifierness that can guarantee truth; there is no other guarantee of truth than the Other's good faith; and this good faith always presents itself to the subject in a problematic form. Everything that the realm of speech brings into existence for the subject continues to depend on utter and complete faith in the Other.

Does this mean that the subject is done with his question here? This is precisely where we come to fantasy.

I already showed you last time that fantasy is the point we concretely butt up against by which we approach the shores of the unconscious. At the precise point at which the subject finds nothing that can articulate him qua subject of his unconscious discourse, fantasy plays for him the role of an imaginary prop.

This is what we are returning to today, for we must more closely examine what this phenomenon is about.

2

As you see on the graph, I locate fantasy across from the [vertical] line A→($◊D) where the subject situates himself in order to accede to the level of the unconscious chain.

Let me remind you of what I said last time. Everything transpires as if, in fantasy, the object plays the same role qua mirage as the image of the specular other, i(a), plays with respect to the ego, m, at the lower level. Except that in fantasy, the object is the imaginary 469 prop of a relationship involving cutting with which the subject must prop himself up at this level. This leads us to a phenomenology of cutting.

We have seen the object at three levels: the pregenital object, castrating mutilation, and hallucinatory voices. Let me point out in passing that, as the third object here involves an incarnated voice, it is less an interrupted discourse than a voice that is cut from the text of the subject's internal monologue.

Let us see today if there is not a good deal more to say about this, assuming we return to the meaning of what I already discussed last time, concerning the difference between the vantage point of the real and the vantage point of knowledge.

The point is to know what level we are at here regarding the subject, when we introduce him as barred S. Is this Est-ce? [pronounced exactly like S] anything other than an equivocation, which can be given whatever meaning we like? Are we going to dwell on the fact that it is a conjugation of Esse, the verb "to be" in Latin?

I already commented on this a bit last time when I talked about reality. Indeed, the subject does not simply refer to discourse, but also to some facet of reality. If there is something that we can coherently call reality, I mean the reality we make a point of mentioning in analytic discourse, I would situate it on the graph in the field that is below actual discourse.

In fact, actual discourse envelops the field of reality and encloses it within itself; it constitutes a reserve of knowledge that can be extended to everything that speaks to man. I mean that man is not obliged to constantly recognize every aspect of his reality and history that he has already included in his discourse. It is here, for example, that alienation, as it is presented in Marxist dialectic, can be coherently articulated.

I would go further still: let us not forget the cut. It is already at work in the first type of fantasy object, the pregenital object. What are fantasy objects here if not real objects? As separated as they may be from the subject, they are nevertheless closely related to his life drives.

In short, it is only too obvious that reality is not a compact continuum; it is made up of cuts, including and going far beyond the 470 cuts made by language.

Plato long ago compared the philosopher to a good cook, one who knows how to place his knife in the right place, and cut through the joints [of an animal carcass] without crushing them. Up to a point, the relationship between real cuts and linguistic cuts thus seems to agree with what the philosophical tradition has always assumed – namely, that what is involved is merely the overlapping of one system of cuts with another. Yet if I say that Freud's question comes in here, it is inasmuch as the distance that science has now covered allows us to formulate that the scientific venture goes far beyond the notion that natural cuts are overlaid by cuts made by discourse, made by any discourse whatsoever.

Efforts – that essentially involved eliminating the mythological elements from all scientific explanation – have led us to the point we are at right now, which seems to me to be adequately characterized, without being overly dramatic, by the term "disintegration of matter." This term is well designed to suggest to us that it is not pure and simple knowledge that is at work in the scientific venture.

Situating ourselves at the level of the real, or, if you will, of what I will provisionally call "the great All" – with all the necessary irony, for I am certainly not inclined to call it that – science and its venture do not in any way show us the real lining up with its own cuts [se renvoyant à lui-même ses propres coupures], but rather cuts which are elements that create something new that has the virtue of proliferating.

As human beings, we certainly cannot deny that a question arises here: that of knowing whether the consequences of what manifests itself in this way do not go somewhat beyond us in our mediating function. This remark, which I am deliberately keeping sober and limited in scope, nevertheless takes on a current and dramatic accent which I assume has not escaped you. In short, it is only too clear that man enters into this game at his own expense.

There is perhaps no reason for us to go further here. Indeed, if I have referred to the scientific venture, it was not in order to mention all the dramatic effects it has had on human history. It was in order 471 to home in on the relationship between the subject and the sort of cut constituted by the fact that he is not in a certain unconscious discourse, and that he does not know what he is in it.

The subject as real insofar as he enters into the cut, the advent of the subject at the level of the cut, his relationship to something that we must call the real, but which is symbolized by nothing: this is what is at stake. I designate the specific point of the subject's relationship to what we might call his "pure being as a subject" – and this will perhaps seem to you to be going too far – at the level of the cut, which I have called a pure manifestation of this being.

Desire's fantasy [le fantasme du désir] thus takes on the function of designating this point. This is why, at another point in time, I defined the function fulfilled by fantasy as a metonymy of being, and identified desire itself at this level.

It should be clear that the question remains entirely open at this level whether we can call what is indicated in this way "man." Indeed, what can we call "man," if not what has already been actually symbolized and which, whenever people talk about it, turns out to be laden with all sorts of historical admissions [reconnaissances]? The word "humanism" generally designates nothing here, even if there is, of course, something real in it, which is necessary, and which suffices to assure, in psychoanalytic practice itself, the dimension – which we usually, and rather improperly, I believe, call a depth, so let us instead say a beyond – which is such that being can be identified with none of the roles (to employ the term currently used) that it takes on.

To my mind, the dignity, so to speak, of this being has nothing to do with the fact that he is cut – if I may express myself thus, with the whole backdrop, and especially the castrating references, you may attribute to this – nor with the fact that he is un coupable [a guilty party, but also someone who is cuttable], to allow myself a play on words. His dignity is based on the cut itself.

The cut is, in the end, the final structural characteristic of the symbolic order. It is in this direction – and I am saying so in passing – that I have already taught you to seek the meaning of what Freud called the death instinct, that by which the death instinct may turn out to converge with being.

472 As all of this may be a bit problematic to you, I would now like to try to fill it out by referring to a work of art, and to works of art in general, in order to illustrate what is involved here.

3

I will begin with a very interesting article, that does not go too far: Kurt Eissler's "The Function of Details in the Interpretation of Works of Literature," which came out in The Psychoanalytic Quarterly.

Eissler begins his discourse, and ends it, too, with a remark that one may qualify in various ways, depending on whether one considers it to be confused or simply unexplained. The term "detail" seems to him to be particularly apposite when it comes to the work of a specific author [Ferdinand Raimund] who is completely unknown outside of Austrian circles, an "actor-poet" who Eissler considers to be a sort of unrecognized Shakespeare. I am taking up his article here because I am going to return to Hamlet later today.

Regarding this quasi-Shakespeare who lived in nineteenth-century Vienna, Eissler tells us one of those pretty little stories that are quite typical of what is known as "applied psychoanalysis." In other words, like others before him, he finds in the life of this author a certain number of indicative and paradoxical elements that allow him to raise questions that must forever remain unanswered. We thus learn that Raimund was especially affected, five years before writing one of his chefs-d'oeuvre, by the death of someone who was a sort of model for him, but a model who was so thoroughly embraced that all kinds of questions about paternal, maternal, and sexual identifications arise, as well as any other identifications you might like to add to the mix. The question in itself leaves me rather cold. It is one of those gratuitous papers which, in this genre, appear again and again with an annoying note of conviction. But that is not what is at issue.

Eissler emphasizes the function of what in English he calls the "relevant detail,"* the one that does not fit in with the rest and attracts attention [p. 19]. Eissler's ears perk up when, in a rather 473 well-constructed play by Raimund, something comes out of the blue, as it were, something that nothing has prepared us for. One thing leads to another and Eissler manages to find a certain number of biographical facts of obvious interest. What is at stake is thus the value of relevant details as a guide.

Eissler contrasts what happens in clinical work to what often happens in the so-called applied psychoanalysis of a literary work. He repeats this contrast twice, and if I had time I would read the passages to you to convey their curious opacity [pp. 3 and 19].

In short, he says that a symptom and a relevant detail play more or less the same role, with the following proviso: in analysis, we begin from a symptom that is taken to be relevant by the subject, and it is by interpreting it that we move toward a solution. In the case of a literary work, on the other hand, it is the detail that introduces us to the problem. It is when we find something in a text – he does not even go so far as to define what a text is – that is not especially well motivated, a discordant element, that a path opens up that can lead us to the author's personality.

When we look more closely, this does not amount to much of a contrast. Moreover, if there is a contrast to be made, there is also a parallel to be made. Eissler's remark should lead him to realize that discordance in the symbolic – in the symbolic as such, in a written work, and at least in this one – plays a functional role that can be thoroughly identified with a real symptom, in any case from the standpoint of the progress of an analysis, if this progress is to be considered to involve progress in knowledge of the subject.

Be that as it may, this comparison of two things is of genuine interest. But the question arises whether only typographical errors are going to turn out to be of significance to us in literary works. And why not, after all? It is clear that, in the analysis of literary works, typographical errors – you understand what I mean by that, what presents itself to us as a discontinuity – can tip us off as to where to seek, in its unconscious import, one or another incident of 474 the author's life that might shed major light on it, and this is in fact what happens in this article.

In any case, doesn't this shed light for us on the dimension of works of art? Owing to this sole fact – but as we shall see, it also goes well beyond this fact – we can no longer consider a work of art to be a transposition or sublimation, call it as you will, of reality. One can no longer say that it involves imitation or amounts to mimesis, for it always constitutes a profound reworking of the said reality. But I believe that we have already gone well beyond this point, and it is not to this that I wish to draw your attention.

I will say, confining my attention here to written works of art, that artworks, far from transfiguring reality in any way whatsoever, no matter how broadly viewed, bring the advent of cutting [la coupure] into their very structure, because a subject's real is manifested therein, insofar as, beyond what he says, he is an unconscious subject.

The subject is certainly prohibited from acceding to his relation to the advent of cutting, since his unconscious lies there. On the other hand, this access is not prohibited to him insofar as he is familiar with fantasy – namely, insofar as he is actuated by the relationship known as desire. Now, fantasy is intimately woven into literary works. Hence it becomes possible for a literary work to express the dimension of a subject's reality, which is the advent of being beyond all possible subjective realization, as I called it earlier.

The form of the work of art – of the work of art that succeeds as well as of the one that fails – has the virtue of involving this dimension. If I may use, in this regard, the topology of my graph to convey this, this dimension is not parallel to the field of reality created in reality [réel] by human symbolization, but cuts across it, inasmuch as man's most intimate relationship to the cut goes beyond all natural cuts. For there is the essential cut constituted by his existence – namely, the fact that he is here and that he must be situated in the very advent of the cut.

This is what is involved in works of art, and especially in the one we have broached most recently because it is, in this regard, the most problematic work – namely, Hamlet.

4 475

There are all sorts of relevant things in Hamlet, too, in the sense of details that do not fit or make sense.

I would even say that it is owing to them that we made headway, but in a completely enigmatic way, for we were unable to ever do otherwise than wonder about what such relevance* means. One thing is clear, which is that we can never rule out the possibility that Shakespeare wanted it this way.

Kurt Eissler may find it bizarre – rightly or wrongly, it does not matter – that Ferdinand Raimund mentions, at a certain moment in his play, a period of five years that no character had ever mentioned before, and claim this is a relevant* detail that puts him on the scent of something. I did not proceed in the same way at all regarding Hamlet. For I was sure that the fabric of relevant details could not in any case be purely and simply resolved by saying that Shakespeare allowed himself to be led here by some sort of divine inspiration [bon génie]. I had the impression that Shakespeare himself had contributed to it.

But had he contributed to it nothing other than the manifestation of his deepest unconscious, it is in any case the architecture of these relevant details that shows us that he managed to make the major assertion that I described earlier. Namely, that he brought out the most profound facet of the subject as a speaking subject – in other words, his true relationship to the cut.

This is what the architecture of Hamlet shows us, inasmuch as the tragedy is founded on the subject's relationship to truth.

In contrast to the dream with which we began our exploration this year – that in which the dead father appears before his son, a son who is suffering greatly – in Hamlet the father knows he is dead and tells his son how he died, they then being the only two who know this. Shakespeare's text differs on this point from the Hamlet story as it is found in the prior literature where the murder took place publicly; in prior accounts, everyone knew that there was a crime and Hamlet acted crazy in order to dissimulate his intentions.

In Shakespeare's version, there are only two who know, one of 476 whom is a ghost.* The ghost* makes his appearance right from the beginning of Hamlet, and other commentators have demonstrated the function served by the fact that it is foregrounded in this way. Now, what is a ghost* if not a representation of the kind of paradox that only works of art can pose? Shakespeare makes his altogether believable to us.

What does his ghost* say? He says very strange things and I am astonished that no one – I am not saying has attempted to psychoanalyze the ghost* – but has wondered much about what he says. What he says is that the betrayal was absolute, there having been nothing greater or more perfect than his loyalty to his wife, the queen; there is no more complete betrayal imaginable than the one that laid him low. Everything that falls under the heading of good faith, loyalty, and vows is thus presented to Hamlet as not merely being revocable, but as having actually been revoked.

This absolute revocation unfolds at the level of the signifying chain, but it is quite different from the fact I spoke to you about that there is no signifier that could constitute a guarantee [la carence du signifiant de la garantie]; for something is clearly guaranteed here, which is an untruth. This sort of revelation, as it were, of a lie – a theme that would be worth exploring in its own right – leads to the sort of stupor with which Hamlet is overcome after his father's revelations. It is translated in Shakespeare's text in a remarkable manner, for when Hamlet is asked what the ghost* told him, he does not want to say, and for good reason, yet he expresses it in a very specific way:

> There's never a villain dwelling in all Denmark
> But he's an arrant knave. [I, v, 23–4]

In other words, he expresses himself in the register of tautology.

But let us leave that aside, for these are mere details and anecdotes. The question lies elsewhere. It is the following: how did we make such a mistake?

For it is generally agreed that dead men don't tell lies. Why is that? For the same reason, perhaps, which makes it such that all of our science still maintains the internal postulate that Einstein – who occasionally said things that were not altogether superficial, philosophically speaking – highlighted in his own terms by saying, "God may be subtle, but he is assuredly honest." Can we say as much 477 about a father who categorically claims that he is being subjected to all of hell's torments owing to absolutely odious crimes? There is some discordance here that cannot fail to make our ears perk up.

Can't we discern the effect on Hamlet of his father's assertion that he is eternally damned? We can conceptualize that Hamlet remains trapped within this claim [parole] and that this dooms him to see truth forever escape him. Mustn't we wonder what this claim means, at least functionally, with respect to the genesis and unfolding of the entire drama?

Many other things could be connected up with this, including something that is said by the ghost:*

> But virtue, as it never will be moved,
> Though lewdness court it in a shape of heaven,
> So lust, though to a radiant angel linked,
> Will sate itself in a celestial bed
> And prey on garbage. [I, v, 53–7]

Which radiant angel are we talking about here? It is the angel who introduced lewdness into this broken love relationship. The entire responsibility for the sin falls on the angel. But is it really possible that, here more than anywhere else, he who bears witness in this case to the harm that has forever been done him bore no responsibility whatsoever? This is, of course, the key that can never be turned, the secret that can never be found out.

Yet doesn't a clue put us on the scent here of the word that will tip us off as to what is at stake? This word, here as elsewhere, is fantasy. And the clue? However primitive we may assume the brains of Shakespeare's contemporaries to have been, and rightly so, it was quite a curious choice, all the same, on the playwright's part to cast a never-to-be-resolved enigma in the form of a vial of poison poured into someone's ear. Let us not forget that the ear in question is that of Hamlet, Hamlet the father, for both he and his son are named Hamlet.

Psychoanalysts have only glancingly touched on this point. A few have indicated that some symbolic element must perhaps be recognized here. Yet it is something that can, in any case, be situated using our method: it is the father's revelation, whose paradoxical nature I just highlighted, that lives on in its consequences.

His revelation is presented to us in the form of the wall that it forms, the hole that it digs, and the impenetrable enigma that 478 it constitutes. We have here a structure that is not merely fantasized, but that fits in perfectly well with what takes place – for, if there is anyone who gets poisoned through the ear, it is Hamlet himself. And what plays the role of poison in his case is his father's speech.

Shakespeare's intention is somewhat clarified thereby. First he shows us the relationship between desire and this revelation. Hamlet remains devastated by this revelation for two full months. How does he little by little reclaim the use of his members? Through a work of art. The actors come just at the right time for him to bench test "the conscience of the king," as the text tells us [II, ii, 591].

It is clearly by means of this test that he is able to enter back into action, back into a circuit that necessarily unfolds starting from the first of the consequences of his father's revelation. This character who, from the moment of his father's revelation, wished only for his own dissolution –

> O that this too too sullied flesh would melt, > Thaw, and resolve itself into a dew [I, ii, 129–30]

– is overtaken at the end of the [actors'] play by a kind of drunkenness that has a very precise name, which is that of artifex. He is overjoyed at having managed to corroborate the ghost's horrific story, he can no longer be held back, and Horatio just barely manages to contain Hamlet's exuberance by grabbing onto his coattails.

When Hamlet asks Horatio, couldn't I now "get me a fellowship in a cry of players, sir?" the latter replies, "Half a share" [III, ii, 267–9]. He knows what is going on. Things are far from having been settled for Hamlet by means of this play; it is not because he is artifex [ingenious, crafty, or artful] that he has now found his role. But it is enough for us to know that he is artifex to understand that he will accept the first role he finds. He will, in the final analysis, do whatever he is ordered to do – I will read you the passage in the text another time.

A certain poison, once ingested by a rat – and you realize that rats are never far from all such goings-on, especially in Hamlet – gives the rat a thirst from which it will die, for thirst completely dissolves this mortal poison in him. Well, this is the sort of thing Hamlet was immediately inspired to do.

Something can be added to what I just told you, which allows 479 me to emphasize this more forcefully. An author by the name of Walter Wilson Greg was astonished by something that every spectator should have long since noticed – namely, that Claudius shows himself to be completely impervious to what precedes the scene in which Hamlet has the unfolding of his crime acted out before him. There is, in fact, by way of a prologue, a long pantomimed scene in which we see the queen of comedy proclaim her loyalty to and love for the king of comedy; this precedes the scene in which the king, who has fallen asleep in the very same garden, has poison poured into his ear by a third character. Claudius displays no reaction whatsoever to the prologue. Walter Wilson Greg concludes that the ghost was lying, perish the thought!

Whole careers have been wagered on this point! John Dover Wilson wrote an extremely long book explaining how it is possible that Claudius, who is so obviously guilty, did not recognize himself in the scene, and constructed all sorts of minute logical arguments to demonstrate that he did not recognize himself in it because he was looking elsewhere at the time. This is not indicated in the staging. Perhaps this is not worth the work of a lifetime, after all.

Can't we suggest that Claudius was assuredly in on these dark dealings, since he admits it himself and proclaims it to heaven? He has destroyed not only the conjugal balance of Hamlet the father, but a great deal else, and his own life to boot. It is quite true that his crime, as he says, smells bad: "O, my offense is rank, it smells to heaven" [III, iii, 36].

Claudius clearly realizes that there is a smell of sulfur in the air. He even asks Hamlet, "Is there no offense in 't?" To which Hamlet replies, "no offense i' th' world" [III, ii, 224–7]. But when the actor playing Lucianus, the king's nephew, comes on stage and pours poison into the sleeping man's ear, and Hamlet tells Claudius that the assassin is now going to win the love of the king's spouse, Claudius feels that things have gone a bit too far and, cut to the quick, he jumps to his feet.

In truth, things remain totally ambiguous. From that time on, everyone is appalled, the entire court considers Hamlet to be impossible, and the courtesans are all on the king's side. This is because they have not recognized Claudius' crime, for no one knows anything about how Claudius exterminated Hamlet the father, and, apart from Hamlet and his confidant, no one ever knows anything about it until the very end.

The function of fantasy thus seems to be truly different here from that of "the means employed" [moyen], as it is put in detective novels.

This becomes much clearer if we assume, and I believe I am making this assumption plausible to you, that Shakespeare was one of those beings who went the furthest in exploring subjective oscillations, to the point that his work describes for us a sort of cartography of all possible human relations, but includes the scar known as desire as a contact point, which irreducibly designates his being. This is what makes it such that his work, each part of which corroborates the rest, displays a miraculous unity.

Isn't it absolutely marvelous that he himself undoubtedly experienced the adventure described in the sonnet* that allows us to precisely corroborate the fundamental positions of desire? I will come back to this later.

This astonishing man lived through the era of Elizabethan England without going unnoticed, of course, having written almost forty plays, and we no doubt have some traces of him, I mean some first-hand accounts. Yet you need but read one good book that summarizes more or less everything that has been found out about Shakespeare to see that, apart from the fact that he surely existed, we truly cannot say anything about him, his attachments, his milieu, his loves, or his friendships. Everything has disappeared without a trace.

Our author presents himself to us analysts as the enigma we can point to in our history that has the most radically and forever vanished, dissolved, and disappeared.

May 27, 1959

XXIII

THE FUNCTION OF THE SUBJECTIVE SLIT IN PERVERSE FANTASIES

Not one
The Last Judgment
An artificial perversion
Voyeurism and exhibitionism
When little a is the Other's desire

I am continuing my attempt to articulate what must guide our actions in psychoanalysis insofar as we deal therein with a subject's unconscious.

I know that this is not easy to do. Which is why I do not allow myself just any old thing in the kind of formulation to which I would like to lead you. My tangents are related to the sense I have that I need to convey to you the importance of the approach I am taking. This does not mean that I always succeed in speaking in such a way that you do not lose your bearings along the way. I nevertheless ask you to follow and trust me.

And to begin from where we left off last time, I will articulate more simply what I formulated – not without precautions, not without making an effort to avoid ambiguities – when I foregrounded the term "being."

1

I am going to take some pretty gigantic steps here by asking that, however risky this may appear to you, we reintegrate into our everyday thinking terms that are so massive [gros] that for several centuries now no one has dared go near them without respectfully trembling. I am speaking about Being and the One.

It is only by using them that we can test their coherence. Let us say that what I call being – and what I went so far last time as to call "pure being" at a certain level of its emergence – must be situated in relation to terms by which we orient ourselves here, namely the real and the symbolic.

We are not idealists, as it is put in books of philosophy; we are not among those who think that being precedes thought. But in order to orient ourselves in our work as analysts, we need to refer to being – no less than that! I am sorry to have to invoke the firmament of philosophy for you; I am only doing so because I feel forced to do so and, after all, because I cannot find anything better with which to make headway.

I will thus say that being truly is the real insofar as it manifests itself in the symbolic. This means that being is at the level of the symbolic. In any case, we need not consider to lie elsewhere than in the symbolic the simple fact that we add something to a thing when we say that it is this or that, this comment targeting the real, because it is in the symbolic that the real is affirmed or rejected or denied.

Being lies nowhere else – let this be quite clear – than in gaps, where it is the least signifying of signifiers – namely, the cut [la coupure]. Being is the same thing as cutting [la coupure]. Cutting renders being present in the symbolic.

What about the "pure being" that we are also talking about? I will put it more directly, since it seems – and I am quite willing to admit this – that certain formulations that I proposed last time struck some of you as circumlocutory, not to say confused. The pure being in question is the same being whose general definition I just gave, and this is so because a signifying chain, going by the name of the unconscious, subsists in accordance with a formulation that you will be so kind as to allow me to propose: every subject is not one [tout sujet est pas un].

Here I must request that you be so indulgent as to go along with me. This simply means that you will not imagine that I am proposing what I am proposing with fewer precautions than I proposed being. I am asking you to credit me for having already perceived what I am now going to propose before coming to speak to you about it today: namely, that the One [l'Un] is not an *un*equivocal notion.

Encyclopedias of philosophy remind us that there are different 483 uses of this term. The One that is the All is not to be confused, in its various guises, with the One as a number, 1, the latter presupposing the whole system and series of numbers, the one that can actually be isolated. It appears that, if things are correctly deduced, the first One [the All] is secondary to the institution of numbers themselves.

In any case, empirical approaches leave no doubt about this. It is not at random that I will refer here to what purports to be the most basic approach, that of English psychology, when it attempts to reconstruct the ways in which numbers became part of our experience. Moreover, I have already pointed out that it is impossible to structure human experience, I mean the most common actual experience, without beginning from the fact that human beings count and count themselves [or: are counted, se compte].

I will say, in an abbreviated way – for I cannot go any further without assuming that you have by now digested what I have already said, owing to the time you have had to reflect – that desire is closely related to what happens owing to the fact that human beings must express themselves in the signifier; and that, qua being, it is in the gaps of the signifying chain that a human being appears as a barred subject. I shall try to articulate the level at which the subject is a barred subject further on with the help of a notion that I will deliberately begin by making more ambiguous than that of the One as I have just introduced it, because I do not think that people have yet realized how ambiguous this notion is. It is the notion of the not one. It is insofar as the barred subject appears here as not one that we will deal with him today.

Let us nevertheless take things up again at the level of experience, I mean at the level of desire here.

If desire serves the subject as an index at the point at which he cannot designate himself without vanishing, I will say – to play on words and their ambiguities – that at the level of desire the subject counts himself [or: is counted, se compte]. This is what I want to draw your attention to first. Given our usual inclination to forget what we are dealing with in the experience of those that we have the audacity to take on, our patients, I will ask you to consider your own experience here – in desire we count ourselves (as) counting [nous nous comptons comptant].

It is in desire and not in the computus [comput] that the subject appears as counting, where we say he has to come to terms with what, in the final analysis, makes him who he is. Must analysts be 484 reminded that nothing more definitively constitutes proof of the subject's presence than desire? The fact that, from that point on, the counting begins to change by giving itself over to all sorts of transactions that dissolve it into variously fiduciary equivalents – this is obviously a whole separate problem. But a moment inevitably comes at which one must pay cash [payer comptant].

When people come to see us for analysis, it is usually because things do not work out for them when it comes time to pay the piper [payer comptant], regardless of what is involved, whether it be sexual desire or action, in the simplest sense of the term. The question of the object arises here. It is clear that if the object were simple, it not only would not be difficult for the subject to deal directly [comptant] with his feelings, but, if you will allow me this play on words, he would be more often content [content, another homonym] with the object, whereas, instead, he has to content himself with it [s'en contente], which is a horse of a different color.

This is obviously related to the fact that, when it comes to desire, the object that is able to satisfy us is not, to say the least, easily accessed. I would even say that it is not easy to find it, and this is true for structural reasons which we are now going to try to examine. I do not seem to be making headway quickly here, but it is because it is difficult, even if, let me repeat, we are talking about everyday experience.

If the object of desire were the most mature and "adult" of objects, as people put it in the sort of blithering drunkenness in which they exalt "genital desire," we would not constantly be dealing with the division that regularly enters into the register of the object, and that forces us to distinguish between the level at which the object is an object of love or, as people put it, of tenderness – whereby we give another person the gift of our uniqueness – and the level at which this same other person is considered to be an instrument of our desire.

Since the supposition that subjects can be very conciliatory and can harmonize these two levels seems to be more or less problematic, people rely on the other's love [or: love for the other, l'amour de l'autre] to resolve everything. But in doing so, they go beyond the limits of our model, because they rely in the final analysis not on our own dispositions, but on the other's, on his affection [tendresse]. We expect that the other – and undoubtedly at the cost of a certain decentering of himself – will live up to the most exacting standards of what desire requires by way of an object.

In the end, it seems that people quite simply bring back in here 485 old religious distinctions, in a more or less disguised fashion – for example, the distinction between loving affection, in the concrete (or, as it is put, "passionate" or "carnal") sense of the term, and charitable love [or: Christian love, amour de charité]. If this is truly what is involved, why not send our patients to pastors who will preach it to them better than we can?

Thus one cannot say that we do not receive a warning from our patients, who are very good at anticipating slippage in our terminology. They tell us now and then that if we are going to preach fine moral principles, they can go and get them elsewhere. Curiously enough, it sometimes happens that this gets on their nerves so much that they do not want to hear any more about it. I am being flippantly ironic here. Nevertheless, it is not pure and simple irony.

I would go further still. I would say that, in the final analysis, the only theory of desire in which we can recognize – assuming we dot the i's and cross the t's – a sketch of the numbers that will serve me in articulating this to you, is the theory that is oriented by religious dogma. It is no accident that desire is clearly inscribed in religious discourse – in protected corners of it, naturally, whose access is reserved, not open to ordinary mortals or the faithful – in corners that are referred to as mystical. As such, the satisfaction of desire is tied to an entire divine organization which, to ordinary mortals, presents itself in the form of the mysteries – to others too, probably, whom I have no need to name. We need but consider what terms that are quite vibrant, like those of "incarnation" and "redemption," represent to believers with sensitive souls.

But I will go still further. We would be quite wrong not to see that the most profound of all dogmas, which is known as the Trinity, is not unrelated to the number three, which we deal with constantly, inasmuch as we perceive that there is no possible balanced access to so-called normal desire without an experience that involves a certain subjective triad. Why not say these things, since we find them in an extremely simple form here?

As for me, I will say that not only do I not balk at such references, I like them just as much as the somewhat vague apprehensions of 486 primitive ceremonies – whether totemic or others – in which the best elements are not very different from these structural elements. Of course, it is precisely because we try to broach things in a way which, even if it is not exhaustive, does not involve the angle of mystery, that I believe there is some interest in our following this pathway.

Similarly, it is not superfluous to recall to mind here certain questions with a moral or even, I would say, a social horizon. It seems clear in contemporary experience that there cannot be satisfaction of one person without the satisfaction of all [tous]. This is at the core of a movement which, even if we are not very involved with others in it, impinges on us from every direction, and certainly enough to be ready to disrupt many of our creature comforts.

Let us not forget, however, that the satisfaction in question is such that we must ask whether it concerns solely the satisfaction of needs. The people I am talking about – let us put them under the heading of the movement that considers itself to be Marxist in perspective, and whose main principle is the one I just expressed – would not dare to claim this, since the precise goal of this movement, with the revolutions that it brings with it, is in the end to have "everyone" [tous] accede to freedom – a freedom that is no doubt far off, and posited as having to be post-revolutionary. Yet what other content can we give this freedom than the notion that each person has his own desire at his disposal?

Now, in this perspective, the satisfaction of desire is a post-revolutionary matter, which is something we perceive every day, and which does not make things easy. We cannot, in effect, defer the desire we deal with to a post-revolutionary stage.

You realize, of course, that I am not criticizing one lifestyle or another, whether it lies shy of or beyond a certain border. The question of desire remains at the forefront of the preoccupations of the powers that be, by which I mean that there has to be some social and collective way of managing* desire. This is no easier to do on one side of a certain curtain than on the other. The point is always 487 to temper a certain discontent, the discontent in civilization, as Freud called it. There is no other discontent in civilization than the discontent of desire.

To hammer this home for you, I would ask each of you – not as analysts, for analysts are overly inclined, less here than elsewhere, to believe they are destined to rule over other people's desires – what the expression "to realize your desire" means to you at the heart of your existence. What does it mean to realize your desire?

Desires do get realized, after all! Things happen. Things get deflected a bit to the right, a bit to the left, twisted, confused, and become a greater or lesser pain in the neck, but there are nevertheless things that at a certain moment we can summarize by saying, "This went in the direction of realizing my desire." Nevertheless, if I ask you to articulate what it means to realize your desire, I am wagering that you will not be able to express it very easily.

If I may highlight a formidable bit of black humor that the religion I referred to a moment ago, the one that is alive and well around us, the Christian religion, proposed that goes by the name of the Last Judgment, I will simply ask you if I shouldn't project the following question onto this most suitable locus.

On the day of the Last Judgment, won't what we will be able to say about what we have done, in our unique existence, to realize our desire weigh as heavily as what we will have done along the lines – which does not refute it in the slightest, which does not counterbalance it in any way – of doing what is known as the good?

We are now going to return to the topic of the structure of desire.

2

It is no longer simply a question of the function of the object as I tried to formulate it two years ago, nor is it the function of the subject, which, as I have tried to show you this year, is distinguished, at the key point of desire, by a vanishing of the subject insofar as he must name himself. What interests us is the correlation between the two. 488

The correlation is such that the object has the precise function of signifying the point at which the subject cannot name himself. It is in this respect that modesty [pudeur] is, I would say, the royal form of what shows up in symptoms in the guise of shame and disgust.

Nevertheless, before going into this, I will ask for a moment of your attention to make a remark that I am obliged to leave here as a marker, without being able to explore it as I would like.

Comedy, as opposed to what stupid people think, is what gives us the most profound access to the workings of the [theatrical] stage insofar as it grants human beings a spectral decomposition of their situation in the world. Comedy goes beyond modesty, whereas tragedy ends with the name of the hero and with total identification of the hero. Hamlet is Hamlet, he is [the person who goes by] that specific name. And this is even so because his father before him was already Hamlet. In the final analysis, everything resolves there: Hamlet is definitively abolished in his desire. I think I have now said enough about Hamlet.

But comedy is a very curious sort of desire trap. Whenever a desire trap functions, we are in the realm of comedy. It is desire insofar as it appears where we were not expecting it. The ridiculous father, the hypocritical pious person, the virtuous man in the throes of adultery – that's the stuff of comedy. There has to be an element which is such that desire is not owned. It is masked and unmasked, it is buffeted about, and it is occasionally punished, but only for appearances' sake. For in true comedies, punishment never even grazes the raven's wing of desire, the latter getting off absolutely scot-free. Tartuffe is exactly the same when the exempt taps him on the shoulder as he was before. Arnolphe goes "whew" – in other words, he is still Arnolphe, and there is no reason why he would not start up again with another Agnes. Harpagon is not cured by the more or less artificial conclusion of Molière's comedy. In comedies, desire is unmasked, not refuted.

I have given you but a quick sketch here. What I would like to go into with you now is how we must situate ourselves in analysis with regard to desire. Thus I am going to present something to you that will serve this purpose. 489

As one of our great poets – even though he was a still greater painter [Picasso] – put it, desire can be caught "by the tail," in other words, in fantasy. The subject, insofar as he desires, does not know where he is at with regard to unconscious articulation, that is, with regard to the sign or scansion he repeats qua unconscious. Where is the subject himself? Is he where he desires? The aim of my class today is to show you that the subject is not where he desires, but that he is somewhere in fantasy, and that the way we interpret depends on that.

Some time back I discussed a fine case study that came out in Belgium in a little bulletin, which concerns the appearance of a transitory perversion during a psychoanalytic treatment.

The patient was incorrectly diagnosed as suffering from a form of phobia, whereas something else was clearly involved. The case study is very conscientious, and is useful to us owing to questions that the author – that is, the woman who directed the treatment [Ruth Lebovici] – herself raises. Had she been better guided herself, she would no doubt have had all the qualities necessary to see much more clearly and to go much further. In the name of certain principles, in the name of the so-called reality principle in this case, the analyst was wrong to allow herself to meddle with the subject's desire as if she were dealing with something that had to be put back in its place [or: put away, remis en place].

The patient thus begins to fantasize that the treatment will not be over until he has had sexual intercourse with the analyst. It is obviously no accident if something as crude as this comes to the fore during analytic treatment. It is undoubtedly a result of the general orientation of the treatment.

The crucial point was the interpretation of a fantasy. The fantasy involved, quite magnificently, I will not say a man in a suit of armor, but a suit of armor advancing behind the subject and armed with a syringe full of bug spray – the funniest and most stereotypical representation of the destructive phallus one can imagine. In retrospect, 490 the author was embarrassed to realize that it was her interpretation that set off the subsequent artificial perversion.

In effect, she interpreted his fantasy in terms of reality, as reflecting a real experience he had had of the phallic mother. Yet a close examination of the case – starting from any point at which one cares to take it up – clearly shows that the subject brought out here the necessary, yet missing, image of a father, inasmuch as a father is required to stabilize the subject's desire. Nothing could be more satisfying than to see this missing character appear in the form of a montage, which gives us the living image of the subject as reconstructed with the help of cuts or joints in the suit of armor, which are truly pure articulations [jointures].

It is in this direction that one could concretely rethink the type of intervention that would have been necessary. The "cure" in this case could perhaps have been obtained more easily than by creating a transitory perversion that was played out in reality; this indisputably shows us in what respect the reference to reality, in a certain form of practice, represents a regression when it comes to treatment.

I am now going to indicate what I would like to convey to you regarding the relations between $ and a, by first providing a model of them, which is no more than a model: fort-da.

I have no need to comment on it otherwise than to remind you that we can theoretically consider it to be the first moment of the subject's entry into the symbolic order. Fort-da resides in the alternation of a signifying pair with regard to a small object, whatever it may be. The element in question may be a ball, or just as easily a bit of string, or a worn-out edge of bedding, as long as it holds fast and can be thrown away and reeled back in. This moment is situated just before the one in which we see the appearance of $ – in other words, before the moment at which the subject wonders about the Other as present or absent.

This is thus the locus or level at which the subject enters into the symbolic order. This entrance immediately brings out something that Winnicott designated with the term "transitional object," which he invented. In his thought, which revolves altogether around the earliest experiences of frustration, the transitional object is necessary to all of human development. The transitional object is the 491 little ball involved in the fort-da game.

When can we consider this game to be given its function in desire? From the moment at which it becomes a fantasy. For that, the subject must no longer enter into the game, he must short-circuit it, in order to bring himself forward [s'anticiper] and include himself altogether in the fantasy, where he catches hold of himself [or: gets his bearings, se saisit] in his very disappearance. He does so with a certain amount of difficulty, of course, but for what I call fantasy, qua prop of desire, it is necessary that the subject be represented therein at the very moment of his disappearance.

I am not saying anything extraordinary here. I am simply articulating the idea Ernest Jones dwelt on when he attempted to give concrete meaning to the term "castration complex." He identified the castration complex with the fear of the disappearance of desire, and that is exactly what I am saying to you in a different form.

Why did Jones go there and not elsewhere? For reasons based on the requirements of his personal understanding: this is how things were phenomenologically understandable to him. People are clearly impeded by the limits of understanding when they try to understand at any cost. And these are the limits that I am trying to get you to go a bit beyond by inviting you to stop trying to understand. It is in this regard that I am not a phenomenologist.

Since the subject fears that his desire may disappear, this must clearly signify that in some way he wants to desire [il se désire désirant]. This is the structure of the neurotic's – pay attention here – the neurotic's desire.

I will not take up neurosis right away because that would strike you as involving an overly simple doubling of the type "I desire to desire" [je me désire désirant] and "I want to desire and to be desired" [je me désire désirant désiré], etc. That is not what is involved here at all.

To show this to you, it is worth once again spelling out perverse fantasy.

492

3

Today I will examine one of the most accessible perverse fantasies, which is, moreover, closely related to the one I mentioned earlier in the case study [by Ruth Lebovici].

It is the fantasy of the exhibitionist, that of the voyeur too, for it is perhaps fitting not to confine ourselves to the way the structure in question is usually portrayed.

People generally tell us: "The perverse fantasy involving the scoptophilic drive is very simple and very pretty. People naturally like to look, and people naturally like to be looked at." These are among the "charming life drives," as Paul Éluard puts it somewhere. We have here, in short, something that is known as the drive, and that enjoys "putting on a show" [donner à voir], to borrow the lovely title of Éluard's book of poetry. It is a manifestation of the [human] form offering itself of its own accord to the other.

Let me point out that this is not insignificant, for it already implies a certain subjectivity.

At our society's scientific meeting last night, we were talking about the implicit subjectivity there may be in the life of an animal. It is hardly possible to conceptualize this "putting on of a show" [donner à voir] itself without hearing the word donner [to give] in the full sense of the virtues of the gift [don], which implies a reference – undoubtedly innocent, not intentional – of this form to its own richness. We know of many concrete indications of the extravagant lengths to which animals go in their captivating display, and especially in sexual display.

I am not going to trot out the stickleback again here – I think I have spoken about it often enough for what I am saying today to make sense to you. I will simply say that, however instinctual we assume it to be, a certain behavior can include in its trajectory a little backward motion, and simultaneously an anticipatory motion, that the graph shows you in the trajectory of speech. In the drive's exuberance to show itself – the drive such as we find it in nature – a temporal projection is tangible.

As a side note, I will recommend that the person who spoke last night about this topic take note of the following: in certain circumstances, we undoubtedly observe a temporal anticipation or expectation on the part of animals. But what can justify you in characterizing the disappointment of this expectation as a "deception" [tromperie]? There is reason to temper this, and in my view, until someone convinces me of the contrary, I will say that the medium [of deception] seems to me to be constituted by a promise. In order to be able to talk about deception, instead of disappointment of an expectation, we have to assume that the animal promises itself to succeed with one or another of its behaviors, and therein lies the whole question. 493

Let us return now to our exhibitionist.

Is he inscribed in the dialectic of "showing"? In no way, shape, or form. Yet, showing is connected here to the pathways of the Other. In effect, in the exhibitionist's relationship to the Other – the terms I am going to employ somewhat awkwardly in order to convey something to you are certainly not the best, or the most literary – it is necessary that this Other be, as far as desire is concerned, complicit (and Lord knows that she is truly complicit at times) in what is happening in front of her and which takes on the value of a break.

Note that this break is not just any old break. It is essential that it be a desire trap. It is perceived by the Other to whom it is addressed, insofar as it goes unnoticed to, let us say, most people. Everyone thus knows that there is no true exhibitionist in private life – apart from some supplemental subtlety, of course. In order for there to be pleasure, the exhibition must take place in a public space.

So here we show up in our big clodhoppers and we tell the exhibitionist: "My little friend, you expose yourself from so far away because you are afraid of getting close to your object. Move closer, move closer." What a load of malarkey! Do you think exhibitionists don't fuck? Clinical experience shows us this is not the case. They are at times very good husbands with their wives. But their desire lies elsewhere and their satisfaction requires other conditions. These are conditions on which we must dwell here.

The satisfaction of so-called exhibitionist desire requires that a specific kind of communication occur with the Other. It is necessary that the exhibition, as a manifestation of being and the real, be inscribed in the symbolic frame as such. This is precisely what necessitates a public space, in order that one be quite sure that one is within the symbolic frame.

494 Stated differently, whereas people reproach exhibitionists for not daring to get close to their objects, for giving into some sort of fear, I am saying that the satisfaction of their desire depends on the condition that there be maximal danger. On this point, the same people, without worrying about the contradiction between this and their preceding remark, say that exhibitionists seek out danger.

This is not impossible, but before going that far let us observe what sometimes happens for what figures here as the object, namely the interested party or parties, one or more little girls – over whom let us shed a tear in passing like kind souls. Little girls, especially if there are several of them, are sometimes highly amused by this. This may even be part of the exhibitionist's pleasure, as a variant. An essential element of the situation is thus the Other's desire, insofar as she is surprised, is involved beyond all modesty, or is complicit here – all such variations are possible.

What about the exhibitionist himself? There is what he shows, you will tell me. Indeed, this is what I pointed out the structure of to you and just indicated again. Nevertheless, I would say that in this case what he shows – which is rather variable, and more or less glorious – is in fact redundant, hiding rather than revealing what is at stake.

Don't kid yourself here – what he shows, the erection that attests to his desire, is distinct from the apparatus of that desire. The apparatus that instates what is glimpsed in a certain relationship to what is not glimpsed is what I quite crudely call a pair of pants that opens and shuts. It is essentially constituted by what we might call the slit in desire. There is no erection, however successful one may suppose it to be, that can take the place of the essential element in the structure of the situation here – namely, the slit itself. The subject designates himself in the slit; and he designates himself, strictly speaking, as what must be filled by the object.

We will come back to this later, because I want to corroborate this with the correlative phenomenology of the voyeur. Here I think I can proceed more quickly. Nevertheless, as going too quickly always allows one to dissimulate what is at stake, I will broach the voyeur with the same circumspection.

495 Regarding the scoptophilic drive, people always omit what is essential, which is the slit. For a voyeur, the slit is an absolutely indispensable structural element. And the terms of the relationship between what is glimpsed and what is not glimpsed, even though they are distributed differently here than for exhibitionists, are nevertheless quite distinct.

Let me go into this in detail. Since the satisfaction here, which is voyeuristic, is based on an object – in other words, on an other – it is important that the person who is seen be involved in the scene. This is part of the fantasy.

There is no doubt but that the object seen is very often seen unbeknownst to her. The, let us say, female object – since it seems that it is no accident that the object spied on is female – undoubtedly does not know that she is being seen. But the voyeur's satisfaction, I mean what props up his desire, involves the following element. As innocently, as it were, as she presents herself, something in her lends itself to the function of a spectacle. The object is out in the open; she is potentially participating in the dimension of indiscretion. The voyeur's jouissance reaches its true height when something in the gestures of the woman he is spying on allows him to suspect that, in some way, she is capable of offering herself up to his jouissance.

The secretly observed creature is all the more "eroticizable," I would say, when something in her gestures reveals her to be offering herself up to what I will call the "invisible hosts of the air." It is no accident that I am alluding here to the angels of Christianity that Anatole France had the gall to invoke in this context. Read his Revolt of the Angels, and at the very least you will see a precise link between the dialectic of desire and the virtual nature of an eye that can never be grasped but that can always be imagined. In his book, La Rôtisserie de la reine Pédauque, the aim of which is very focused, Anatole France knows what he is doing when he refers to the Comte de Gabalis regarding the mystical wedding of men with sylphs and undines.

The voyeur's pleasure is thus at its height when he catches the creature in an activity in which she appears in a secret relationship to herself, in gestures that betray the permanence of an unavowed witness.

Isn't it obvious to you that, in both cases, the subject is reduced to the artifice of the slit? This artifice occupies the place of the subject, and shows him to be truly reduced to the miserable function that is 496 his. Insofar as he is in his fantasy, the subject is the slit.

The form that corresponds to it in the place of a woman's sexual organ is, according to our field, what is symbolically the most unbearable. What relationship is there between the subjective slit and the female slit? This is a separate question that I will leave for future discussion.

Let us now reconsider the whole. Let us begin with the famous poetic metaphor from La Jeune Parque, "Je me voyais me voir" [I saw myself seeing myself]. It is clear that no desire realizes this dream of perfect closure or complete self-sufficiency, if not the poetic virgin's superhuman desire.

What justifies the voyeur's and the exhibitionist's entry into the situation? The fact that they put themselves in the place of Je me voyais [I was looking at myself]. But the Other does not see her Je me voyais; her jouissance is unconscious; she is in some sense decapitated by the third party. The Other does not know that she may potentially be seen by a voyeur. When faced with an exhibitionist, she does not know what is represented by the fact that she is shaken by what she sees – in other words, by the unusual object that is presented to her. This object has an effect on the Other only inasmuch as she is in fact the object of the exhibitionist's desire, but without her knowing it, without her recognizing it at that precise moment.

We are thus faced with twofold ignorance here. The Other does not realize what is supposed to be realized in the mind of someone who exhibits herself or is seen, not knowing that she is a possible manifestation of desire. Inversely, the exhibitionist or the voyeur is not aware of the function of the cut in his desire; he does not realize that the cut abolishes him in a clandestine automatism, that it crushes him in a moment whose spontaneity he absolutely does not recognize. What is actually communicated by the act – which is unknown although present, yet in abeyance – is then at its acme, and that is what is designated by the cut, whereas the subject is aware only of an oblique maneuver like that of a shameful animal that exposes itself to blows.

Regardless of the form in which the slit presents itself – whether as part of a shutter, telescope, or any sort of screen – it is what allows the perverse subject to enter into the Other's desire. This slit is the symbolic slit of a more profound mystery that we must elucidate. Namely, where in the unconscious is it fitting to situate the pervert?
497 What is his relationship to the structure of desire itself? For what he aims at is the Other's desire, reproducing the structure of his own.

The perverse solution to the problem of the subject's situation in fantasy is the following: target the Other's desire and believe one sees an object therein.

It is late enough that I could stop here.

That, too, would be a cut. But it would have the disadvantage of being arbitrary, and of stopping me from showing you the originality of this solution when compared to the neurotic solution. At the very least, you should realize that it is of interest to compare them.

I will show you the function played by the neurotic subject in his fantasy on the basis of the pervert's fundamental fantasy. I fortunately already indicated this function to you earlier – he wants to desire, as I put it. Now why can't he desire? Why is it so necessary that he desire? Everyone knows what is involved here – the phallus, strictly speaking. You have seen that, up until now, I have left to one side the role played in this economy by the phallus, the good old phallus of yesteryear.

Twice – once in our re-examination of the Oedipus complex last year, and once in my article on the psychoses – I showed you that the phallus is linked to the paternal metaphor – namely, insofar as it gives the subject a signified. But it was impossible to bring it back into the dialectic at issue today without first introducing a structural element into the constitution of fantasy, an element whose symbolism I will ask you to accept – in a last effort before we part today.

I have written on the blackboard all the different types of cuts, including those that reflect the subject as a cut [la coupure du sujet (this schema is missing)].

This is how we will henceforth notate the barred subject in fantasy. Remember that I asked you to accept the notion of the "not one." You see that I allow myself to be so ridiculous here as to even refer to the notation of the square root of minus one, $\sqrt{-1}$, concerning imaginary numbers.

When I told you about the vanishing of the subject, I left you on the verge of this "not one." I will begin with it next time and even with the comme pas un [like no one else], which brings up the subject's uniqueness. If I am asking you to notate it in this way, it is precisely in order that you not see in it the most general form, and 498 therefore the vaguest form, of negation.

If it is so difficult to speak of negation, it is because no one knows what it is. Yet at the beginning of this year I pointed out the difference between foreclosure and discordance. For the time being, it is in this closed – but for that reason decisive – symbolic form that I am pointing out another form of negation, one that situates the subject on another scale altogether.

As for little a, with which the subject is confronted in fantasy, you realize that I showed you today that it was more complicated than the three forms I had given you as a first sketch, since, in the cases that I presented to you, little a is the Other's desire.

June 3, 1959

499

XXIV

THE DIALECTIC OF DESIRE IN NEUROSIS

The traumatic Other
The hysteric and his double
The obsessive's hiding place
To be the phallus or to be no one
When jouissance crushes desire

In our last class, I laid out the structure of fantasy insofar as it props up, as I put it, the subject's desire.

Where it is possible to grasp fantasy in a structure that is sufficiently complete, it can in some sense serve as a hub for what we are led to relate to it as regards different, let us say, nosological structures, those we encounter in our practice – in other words, the relationship between the subject's desire and what I have long designated, from a psychoanalytic perspective, as not simply its reference point but its essence: the Other's desire.

As announced, today I will try to situate the position of desire for you in the different clinical structures, and to begin with, in neurotic structure.

1

Last time I discussed perverse fantasies to help you locate in them what corresponds to the function of the subject and what corresponds to the function of the object.

Fantasy is the prop and index of a certain position of the subject in desire. At the outset, it is the other's image that serves to prop up the subject, at least at the point at which he qualifies as desire. Later comes the more complex structure known as fantasy.

500 For profound reasons, I decided to take up a specific, especially exemplary form of perverse fantasy last time, the one that is found among exhibitionists and voyeurs. I showed you that – as opposed to what is all too often said when people jump the gun – they are not reciprocal positions that complete each other: "the one who shows" and "the one who sees." On the contrary, these two positions are strictly parallel, paradoxically enough.

In both cases the subject turns out to be indicated in the fantasy by what I called the slit or gap, something that is both a hole and a flash in the real, inasmuch as the voyeur spies from behind his shutter and the exhibitionist opens his screen just slightly, leaving it ajar. The subject is indicated here in his place in the activity. He is nothing but the flash of the object people speak of, and which is experienced and perceived by the subject as the opening up of a gap that situates him as open. Open to what? To a desire other than his own, his own desire being profoundly impacted, struck, and shaken by what is perceived during the flash.

In one case, [what is perceived is] the Other's emotion that goes beyond her modesty; in the other case, [what is perceived is] the opening up of the Other, the Other's virtual expectation, inasmuch as this Other does not sense that she is seen and yet is perceived as offering herself up to be seen – this is what characterizes the object's position in the structure. The latter is so fundamental that it was noted from the very moment psychoanalysis first investigated the causes and stigmata that generate the neurotic position. I mean that there is, at the starting point of neurosis, a perceived scene, the so-called primal scene.

If the primal scene is part and parcel of this structure, it is undoubtedly insofar as it reverses it. This reversal is such that the subject sees something open up, suddenly perceives a gap whose traumatic value is related to the Other's desire, which is truly glimpsed and perceived. The Other's desire remains like an enigmatic nucleus until later, when, after the fact, the subject can reintegrate that lived moment in the chain, which will not necessarily be the right chain, but which will in any case be a chain that constitutes a whole unconscious modulation – a chain that thus constitutes the nucleus of neurosis.

Let us now turn our attention to the structure of fantasy.

As I stress, what makes for its value as an index is a suspended or stopped time, an interruption [temps d'arrêt] that corresponds to a 501 moment of action at which the subject can only establish himself in a certain way, x – which is precisely what we are trying to pinpoint in the function of desire – on condition that he lose all sense [sens] of his position, which is marked by the fact that the fantasy is opaque to him. We can designate his place in fantasy, and he can perhaps glimpse it himself; but the meaning [sens] of the position, the reason why he is there, and what comes to light regarding his being – that he cannot say.

This is the essential point – aphanisis occurs. The term is no doubt a felicitous one. In any case, it serves us, even if – as opposed to the function given to it by Jones in his interpretation of the castration complex – its form remains enigmatic to us.

Indeed, if the word "aphanisis" – disappearance or "fading,"* as I put it – can serve us regarding fantasy, it is not as the aphanisis of desire; it is insofar as an aphanisis of the subject occurs at the height of desire. Where it speaks in the unconscious chain, the subject cannot situate himself in his place, or articulate himself as I. He can only indicate himself qua disappearing from his position as a subject.

As I have defined it, this is the extreme, imaginary point where the subject's being resides, as it were, in its greatest density. This is merely an image that I am providing so that you can have a metaphor to latch onto. The subject's being must be articulated and named in the unconscious, but in the end, it cannot be. It is solely indicated at the level of fantasy by what turns out to be a slit, a structure based on a cut [structure de coupure].

In each and every domain, it is legitimate to situate an imaginary point if we can spell out its structure by what begins from there. Here the imaginary point will allow us to situate what actually occurs in the different forms of the subject.

These different forms need not be homogeneous – a form that is comprehensible to a subject situated on one side is not necessarily comprehensible to a subject situated on the other side. We know only too well what can lead us astray in understanding a psychosis. When we try to reconstruct and lay out a structure, as is the case here, we must be careful not to understand.

Let me remind you that we find a trace of the notion of the disappearance of the subject in Freud's work when he talks about the 502 dream's navel as the point at which all the dreamer's associations converge only to disappear. At that point, they can only be related to what he calls the Unerkannt. This is what is at issue here.

What does the subject see opening up [s'ouvrir] across from him at the moment at which he disappears? Nothing but another gap. This may go so far as to engender an infinite reflection of one desire in another desire. But the concrete thing that experience shows us in the voyeur's and the exhibitionist's fantasy – even if it is not very easy to grasp – is that the subject turns out to be dependent on the Other's desire, indeed, at its mercy.

This is precisely what is involved in little Hans's neurosis, which I spoke to you about at length two years ago.

I highlighted the crisis that little Hans encountered at a certain moment of his development. This crisis went much further than his rivalry, which was nevertheless critical, with the new person on the scene, his little sister; and it was much more serious than the first stirrings of sexual maturation that made him capable of having erections, and even – the question remains an open one according to specialists – orgasms. As I stressed, spelled out, and even hammered home, the crisis in question did not arise at the interpsychological level, strictly speaking, or at the level of the integration of a new drive [tendance]. There was a crisis because, at that specific moment in time, and owing to the effect of a certain closing down [fermeture], the subject found himself confronted with his mother's actual desire, and he had no recourse in the presence of this desire.

In his 1917 article entitled "The Unconscious," Freud calls the fact of having no recourse Hilflosigkeit. Hilflosigkeit comes before anything else – before anxiety, for example, which already involves a first sketch of an organization inasmuch as it involves expectation, Erwartung, even if one does not know what one is expecting, and even if one does not articulate it immediately. Prior to anxiety there is Hilflosigkeit, the fact of having "no recourse."

Having "no recourse" in the face of what? This can only be defined as the Other's desire. The relation between the subject's desire and the Other's desire is dramatic, inasmuch as the subject's desire must be situated in relation to the Other's desire, but the latter literally absorbs his and leaves him no recourse. An essential structure – not only neurosis, but every analytically defined structure – is constituted by this drama.

We will begin here with neurosis. Nevertheless, since we started 503 with something rather different, perversion, you can glimpse in what way perversion is related to the same drama. I will nevertheless point out that I only brought in perversion regarding the instantaneous moment of fantasy – fantasy that in perversion is the only thing that reveals the passage à l'acte [acting out].

In the case of little Hans, what is related to the structure that I am formulating for you here is the fertile moment of neurosis known as a phobia. It is the simplest form of neurosis. We can put our finger on what characterizes the solution that it brings with it, and I have already discussed this with you at length: it is the coming into play of the phobic object insofar as it is an all-purpose signifier [signifiant à toutes fins].

The phobic object is situated between the subject's desire and the Other's desire, and it fulfills a function of protection or defense there. There is no ambiguity whatsoever regarding Freud's formulation here. What is fear of the phobic object designed to protect the subject from? Freud tells us that it protects him from desire's approach [l'approche de son désir]. If we look more closely, we see that his desire is at stake insofar as Hans is defenseless in relation to what emerges [s'ouvre] for him in the Other – the mother in this case – as the sign of his absolute dependence on her.

She will take him to the ends of the earth; she will take him further still; she will take him with her as often as she herself disappears, slips away. At that moment she no longer appears to him only as someone who can satisfy all of his demands; she appears to him with the supplemental mystery of being herself prey [ouverte] to a lack whose meaning appears to Hans to be in a certain relationship to the phallus – a phallus that he does not have.

It is at the level of the mother's want-to-be [manque-à-être] that for Hans a drama begins [s'ouvre] that he cannot resolve without forging the phobic signifier whose polyvalent function I showed you. This signifier is a kind of skeleton key, a key that opens all doors, allowing him to protect himself against the emergence of an anxiety that is far more dreadful than the fear that is localized by the phobia.

All experienced analysts have perceived this, and in an unequivocal way. But what is worth examining is the following: how – at this moment, which involves a relationship based on desire – can the 504 subject (the subject who in the structure of fantasy is juxtaposed as $ to a) find something that lightens his load [or: improves his situation, allège sa part], find something that sustains his presence, find something to latch onto? This is, in short, where a symptom is going to be produced, inasmuch as, in neurosis at its most profound level, it concerns the subject's position most generally.

I will proceed as follows, if you will be so kind as to allow me to. First, we are going to unpack this, then we are going to inquire whether the structure of fantasy is as fatal as all that. At the onset of the whirlwind of fantasy, on the verge of the point of loss or disappearance indicated in the structure of fantasy, there is something that holds or stands firm – how is this something possible?

The neurotic accedes to fantasy. He accedes to it at certain specific moments at which his desire is satisfied. But as we all know, this is merely a functional use of fantasy. On the other hand, his relation to his whole world, and to the real others in it, is profoundly marked by what? By a repressed drive, as people have always said.

It is this repressed drive that we are trying to explain a bit better, a bit more precisely, and in a way that is more clinically obvious.

We are going to begin by indicating how it presents itself.

2

Let us consider obsessives, if you will, and hysterics. Let us consider them together inasmuch as they shed light on a certain number of each other's features.

Given that the object in fantasy is connected to the Other's desire, the goal is not to approach it. There are obviously several ways of reaching this goal.

One way, as we have seen, is by creating a phobic object, a prohibited object. What must be prohibited? In the final analysis, a jouissance that is dangerous because it exposes the true abyss of desire to the subject.

I already sketched out two other ways to you in the paper I gave at Royaumont. The subject can sustain his desire when faced with 505 the Other's desire in two manners: as an unsatisfied desire – that is the case in hysteria – or as an impossible desire, which is the case in obsession.

Let me remind you of the example of the butcher's wife, in which the structure of unsatisfied desire appears most clearly [SE IV, pp. 146–51; Écrits, pp. 522–3]. In her associations to the dream she had, the hysteric's operation is in some sense avowed: the butcher's wife wants to eat caviar, but she does not want her husband to buy it for her, because her desire for it must remain unsatisfied. This is one of the little maneuvers with which the fabric, text, and everyday life of the hysteric is woven. But the structure thus illustrated in fact goes much further.

This little tale reveals the function that the hysteric grants herself: she herself is the obstacle, she is the one who does not want. Stated otherwise, in her fantasy she comes to occupy the tertiary position between the subject and the object which was occupied by the phobic signifier in our earlier example. Here, she is the one who is the obstacle. She derives jouissance from blocking desire. This is one of the fundamental functions of hysterical subjects in the situations they fabricate: stopping desire from being satisfied so that they themselves can remain what is at stake in desire.

The place the hysteric takes on in such situations is that of what we might call, using an English word, a "puppet,"* something like a dummy but with the more extended meaning of pretense. The hysteric in effect brings in a shadow, who is her double, in the guise of another woman; the hysteric's desire manages to slip in by means of this other woman, but in a hidden way, for she must not see it. This position is so common that it is truly recognizable in case studies, assuming we have this kèy at our disposal.

Although the hysteric presents herself in this case as the mainspring of the machine on which these sorts of marionettes depend, even in relation to each other, in a redoubled relationship which is that of the subject in relation to the object, ($◊a), she nevertheless plays her part in the game in the form of she who is at stake, in the final analysis. The obsessive, on the other hand, has a rather different position. He stays outside the game.

Trust in these formulations when you are dealing with subjects who can be clinically qualified as obsessive. The obsessive is someone who is truly never where something that could be called 506 his desire is at stake. He is not where he apparently runs a risk. He makes $ – the disappearance of the subject at the point of desire's approach – into his weapon and his hiding place. He has learned how to use $ in order to be elsewhere.

He can only do so by putting off or deferring until later his commitment to a true relationship involving desire. Whereas the relation to desire in hysteria has an instantaneous structure, the obsessive always puts off until tomorrow committing his true desire. This does not mean that he commits to nothing while awaiting that day, far from it – [in the meantime,] he proves himself. Moreover, he may go so far as to consider what he does as a means of acquiring merit. What does he think he merits? The Other's deference to his desires [Des mérites à quoi? – à la révérence de l'Autre à l'endroit de ses désirs].

You will clearly observe this mechanism, which shows up everywhere, even when the obsessive does not recognize it. But it is important that you are able to recognize and designate it. It would be inopportune, indeed, if you were led to crush this mechanism in the analysis under the weight of all the intersubjective relations it brings in its wake, and which can only be conceptualized as organized with respect to the fundamental relation or relations that I am trying to spell out for you.

What shows its face in this neurotic position is a call for help by the subject, for help sustaining his desire, for help sustaining it in the presence of the Other's desire, for help constituting himself as desiring.

As I said last time, the only thing he does not know is that his approach is profoundly marked by the danger constituted for him by desire's drift. In constituting himself as desiring and in the very constitution of his desire, he defends against something. His very desire is a defense and can be nothing else. This is what the subject does not perceive.

Yet in order to sustain his desire he must always call on something that presents itself in a tertiary position for help in dealing with the Other's desire. This is where he situates himself in order for the wannabe [aspirante], vanishing relation of $ when faced with a to be tenable.

The role of this thing is to allow the subject to symbolize his situation in relation to the real Other – in other words, to keep a situation in which he can be recognized and satisfied as a subject going. When 507 in analysis he is able to get some perspective on his situation, he is shocked to perceive that the subject who is sustained in this situation is prey to all sorts of contorted and paradoxical attitudes. This allows him to realize that he is a neurotic prey to symptoms.

And it is here that the element that psychoanalytic experience has taught us to consider a key point of signifying functions – the phallus – comes in.

3

If the phallus plays a key role here, it is obviously insofar as it is a signifier.

This signifier is linked to something that Freud – who absolutely did not hide its place in the economy of the unconscious – called the law.

It is fruitless to try to reduce the phallus to the status of something that is balanced by and juxtaposed with some other functional correspondent in the opposite sex. Although this conception has generative [or: developmental, génétique] value, as it were, from the vantage point of the subject's interrelations, it neglects what is essential in valuing the phallus – namely, that it is not purely and simply an organ.

At the level at which it is an organ, it is the instrument of a jouissance, and it is not integrated into the mechanism of desire, for the latter is situated at another level. To understand what the mechanism of desire is, we must define it as seen from the other side, in other words once cultural relations have been instituted – whether it be on the basis of the myth of the killing [of the primal father] or not.

Desire is distinguished from all demands by the fact that it is a demand that is subject to the law. This formulation is almost painfully obvious, but we must nevertheless realize that this is what is involved when Freud distinguishes demands that correspond to the so-called needs related to the survival of the species or of the individual from demands that are situated at another level.

Why tell us that the demands that are situated at this other level are different from the first demands in that they can be deferred? After all, to say that sexual desire in men can be deferred in its 508 effects – that is, in its execution [passage à l'acte] – is not unambiguous. Why can it be deferred more easily in men than in animals, where such deferral is not terribly well tolerated? It is undoubtedly owing to genetic flexibility, but it owes [still more] essentially to the fact that the primal order of exchanges is built on sexual desire, the primal order that founds the law by which the realm of numbers comes alive in human interpsychology – namely, the so-called law of marriage and kinship.

Nothing is articulated in psychoanalysis if not at this level. And it is at this level that we see the fundamental signification of the phallus appear. Fundamentally speaking, the phallus is the subject qua object of sexual desire, this object being subjected to what I will call the law of fertility.

It is in the guise of a fertility symbol that the phallus plays a role in initiation ceremonies, when it is unveiled at the end of those ceremonies to the people who participate in them. As for the father, who, for a subject, is the "author of his days," as they say in French [figuratively, "my revered father"], he is merely the signifier of what I am calling the law of fertility here, inasmuch as this signifier regulates desire by tying it to a law.

This is where the whole dialectic of desire comes in.

In the law of exchanges – defined by the fundamental relations that regulate desire's interreactions in culture, real bonds, relations with real others, and the real creation of a line of descent – the subject presents himself qua phallus. But desire comes in along the trajectory of the functionalization of the subject qua phallus. In effect, the subject's being – at the point of its loss – is expressed in desire because, as we have seen, the subject can no longer get his bearings [se saisir] in desire starting at a certain moment: he is no longer, he fails to be [il manque à être]. It is this lack [manque] that encounters the phallic function. And the balance [or: tipping] point – the one we dwelt on at the end of the dream recounted by Ella Sharpe's patient – is produced by this encounter.

I also connected this up with my humungous digression on Hamlet, inasmuch as, in this patient's dream, he presented us, in the purest form, the alternative "to be or not . . ."* that I highlighted so extensively.

We are considering here the moment at which the subject gets close to his desire, at which he just barely puts his finger on it, at 509 which he must choose to be completely taken up in the devouring desire of a woman or to be no one. It is immediately thereafter that he is summoned to be or not to be. It must be noted that the second "to be"* in this formulation does not have the same meaning as the first one. In the second one, what comes to light is the "not to be" of desire's primordial structure. In the first one, the point for Hamlet is to be what he can be as a subject – in other words, "to be the phallus." But to be the phallus that is marked as the Other's exposes him to the threat "not to have it."

If you will allow me to use a so-called logical sign, the V which is used to designate the "either/or" of disjunction, I would say that the subject sees here that there is a choice to be made. Either "not to be it," not to be the phallus, and disappear, fail to be. Or, if he is it, in other words, if he is the phallus for the Other in the intersubjective dialectic, "not to have it." This is the game that is at work. And it is in this game that the neurotic senses that getting close to or integrating his [or: her, son] desire threatens him with loss.

The "not one," by which the barred subject in desire's fundamental structure designates himself, is transformed into a "one too many" or "something that is too much." Or it is transformed into "something missing" for men who are threatened by castration, and for women for whom the phallus is experienced as an absence.

This is why not everything is resolved at the end of the psychoanalytic demystification of the neurotic's position. At least this is what Freud tells us based on his own experience: there is something that takes the form of a remainder, and which in all cases is such that the subject remains in an inadequate position, that of peril as regards the phallus in men, and that of absence of the phallus in women.

This is perhaps owing to the approach that was initially adopted to solve the neurotic's problem. This approach leads us to neglect the transverse dimension – namely, that by which the subject, when it comes to desire, is dealing with the manifestation of his being as such, with himself as the possible author of the cut.

In other words, analysts tend to try to shrink the neurotic's desiring position, whereas they should strive to free up desire's true position and release it from being bogged down in the specific dialectic which is that of the neurotic.

4 510

How can I go back over these points in order to better convey to you how they are linked? For I have assuredly led you along the purest path already.

It is clear that this brings with it not only all the subject's anecdotal history, but also other elements of his past, which are structural and which I brought out years ago. I am talking about the narcissistic drama, the subject's relation to his own image, and his narcissistic relation to the other's image.

As Freud often stressed in his own terms, it is here, of course, that, in the final analysis, the fear of losing the phallus, or the feeling of not having [or: missing or lacking] a phallus, comes in for the subject.

In other words, the ego is involved. It can intervene at the level of the complex dialectic in which the subject is afraid of losing what constitutes his privilege in relation to the other. But let us note that, if it intervenes, it is certainly not because of something that we could call its weakness, for in every case in which we observe a weakness of the ego, we witness, on the contrary, a diffusing or even a blockage of the situation.

I need but refer here to a case that you are all familiar with. It is a notorious case of Melanie Klein's, the case of Dick ["The Importance of Symbol-Formation in the Development of the Ego," IJP 11 (1930): 24–39]. Klein describes a child who, assuming he had truly been brought into the relationship between desire and the signifier, found himself completely dependent on the imaginary level in relation to the other, on the possible relation with the other at the gestural, communicative, and life-sustaining level.

As we do not know everything about this case, we can merely say that it is a remarkable one, inasmuch as this child, who does not speak, is already so open to and touched by Klein's spoken interventions that for us, in our register, his behavior is truly striking. In effect, right from his first moments with Klein it is clear that the only structures in the world that are accessible and available to him are those that bear within themselves the characteristics of the signifying chain.

511 He plays, for example, with a train, which is a little chain – that is, a series constituted by elements that are attached to each other. We have a door that opens or closes, which is tantamount to the simplest form of the alternative "yes or no" that conditions the signifier as such. "A gate must be open or closed," as I reminded you here when I tried to show you how we can put cybernetic schemas to use with our symbols.

The child's behavior is limited to that; and yet, simply by grazing it with words that are nevertheless sentences, something essentially verbal, what do Klein's interventions immediately do? The child's first reaction is, in my view, almost unbelievable in its exemplary character: he runs into the dark "space between the outer and inner doors of the [consulting] room" [p. 31]. We are surprised that Klein – who, in certain ways, so clearly saw the structural elements of introjection and expulsion, namely, the limit of the outer world of what one might call the inner shadows with regard to a subject – did not see the import of this intermediary zone, which is nothing less than the one where, to our way of thinking, desire is situated.

This zone is neither outside nor inside, and however small it may be in this subject, it is articulated and constructed. We find in certain primitive village structures these sorts of empty spaces between the village and pure, unadulterated nature. Let us say that it is in this sort of "no man's land"* that the little subject's desire broke down.

It is here that the ego might possibly intervene. Naturally, as I have repeated dozens of times, it is to the degree to which this ego is not weak, but strong, that the subject's resistances are organized, they being the very forms of his neurotic construction's coherence. This is how the subject organizes himself in order to subsist as desire, in order not to be the place of this desire, in order to be sheltered from the Other's desire as such. It is the distance that is maintained between his most profound manifestation as desire and the Other's desire; it is the means [alibi] by which he constitutes himself as phobic, hysteric, or obsessive respectively.

I must return here to the elaborate example Freud provides us of a fantasy, "A child is being beaten." It is worth returning to it after having taken this detour. In it, we can perceive the stages at which we find anew the structural relationship that I am trying to formulate today.

What do we have here? An obsessive fantasy. Girls and boys use 512 this fantasy to arrive at what? Masturbatory jouissance. The relationship to desire is clear. What is the function of this jouissance? Its function here is that of any and every satisfaction of need in relation to that which lies beyond it, which is determined by human language. Which is to say that masturbatory jouissance is not the solution to desire here; it represents, instead, the crushing of desire – just as a child at the breast crushes his demand for love from his mother with the satisfaction of nursing.

This is virtually countersigned by the testimony of history.

I alluded at the time [I discussed Freud's paper, "A Child is Being Beaten"] to the hedonist perspective and its inability to truly characterize human desire. Let us not forget one of its paradoxical points, which has an exemplary character for us – even though it was obviously left in the shadows by those who have gone down in history as sages. Their discipline had as its aim – qualified as philosophical, and for reasons that were after all, valid, since they were methodological – the choice of a stance with respect to desire, consisting at the outset of excluding it and rendering it null and void.

Every perspective that is, strictly speaking, hedonistic shares in this exclusionary stance, as is demonstrated by the paradoxical example that I will remind you of here, the stance of the cynics. Tradition has, as we know from Chrysippus, if I recall correctly, passed this down to us. Diogenes the Cynic claimed that the solution to the problem of sexual desire was, as it were, at hand's reach for each of us, and, through an act that was not one of exhibitionism but of demonstration, he proved it brilliantly by masturbating in public.

The obsessive's fantasy bears a relation to jouissance, and this relation can even become one of its conditions. But it also has a structure whose value as an index, as I call it, Freud demonstrated to us, inasmuch as this fantasy indicates nothing other than a feature of the subject's history, a feature that is inscribed in his diachrony. Namely, that the subject, in a forgotten past, saw, Freud's text tells us, a rival – whether of the same sex or of the opposite, it does not matter – being subjected to punishment by the beloved being, the father in this case, and was overjoyed by this early situation.

513 In what way does the fantasized instant perpetuate, as it were, this favorite instant of happiness? It is here that the intermediary stage that Freud designates takes on its demonstrative value. This stage, he tells us, [is never remembered; it] can only be reconstructed.

Freud sometimes tells us that certain unconscious stages are altogether inaccessible. Whether he is right or wrong in this precise case is not germane. Thus he is not wrong, but that is not what is of importance here; what is important is that he designates this intermediate stage as something that can only be reconstructed.

At the first stage of the fantasy's construction, we find the memory of a moment of triumph on the subject's part, a memory that is merely repressed, at worst, and can thus be brought to light: a memory of the other, the rival brother, falling prey to the anger of the beloved object [the father here] and to the punishment that the beloved object is meting out to him. At the third stage, the fantasized instant plays the role of an index inasmuch as it immortalizes, as it were, this stage by making it into a point that something entirely different is attached to – namely, the subject's desire. But the process involves an intermediary stage which is, I will say, strictly speaking metaphorical.

What is at work in the second stage, which is, as Freud tells us, essential to understanding the functioning of this fantasy? The subject puts himself in his rival's shoes: it is the subject himself who is punished. What is the subject seeking in this metaphor or transference? We find ourselves faced here with an utter and complete enigma.

How strange it is to proceed, after the moment of his triumph, to a scene in which he himself suffers the other's humiliating defeat! Freud does not hide the fact that we find ourselves faced here with the ultimate enigma of what in psychoanalysis we call masochism. A conjunction presents itself here in a pure form, a conjunction by which something in the subject perpetuates the happiness of the initial situation in a hidden, latent, unconscious situation of unhappiness.

In this hypothetical second stage, what is involved is, in short, the oscillation, ambivalence, or, more precisely, ambiguity of the act being engaged in by the authority, the father here, inasmuch as the punishment is also a form of recognition. The subject slides here from a short-lived incident in his life history to a structure in which he appears as an actual being. The decisive step of his jouissance lies 514
– insofar as it leads to the fantasized instant, "a child is being beaten" [On bat un enfant, literally "someone is beating a child"] where he himself is no longer anything but On ["someone"] – in the fact of alienating himself, in other words, in taking the other's place as a victim.

On the one hand, the subject is On bat ["someone is beating"], the instrument of alienation insofar as it devalues [the one who is beaten]. This is why I told you that, up to a certain point, he purely and simply becomes the phallic instrument, insofar as it is the instrument here of his cancellation.

On the other hand, he is confronted with what? With "a child," a faceless, sexless child, a child who is no longer the child originally involved in the first stage, nor even the child the subject himself was at the second stage. A close examination of the succession of fantasies laid out by Freud shows that the subject is confronted here with what one might call an extract of the object.

We nevertheless see traces, in the recounting of the fantasy, of what constitutes the subject's favorite instant of jouissance. I will juxtapose the neurotic's jouissance next time with something very unusual, whose common factor does not seem to have been found up until now. It is not perversion in general – which plays a pivotal role in the structure we are exploring – that is at work, but rather homosexuality.

To confine our attention today to neurosis, I will tell you what its most common, fundamental structure is, in the final analysis.

If the neurotic wants to desire, what does he desire? He desires what allows him to sustain his desire in its very precariousness, without knowing that all of his phantasmagoria is designed for this purpose and that his symptoms, which in themselves provide so little satisfaction, are the very locus where he finds jouissance.

The subject thus does not present himself as a "pure being" [être pur] – which is what I began from in order to indicate to you what is meant by the subject's relation to the real – but a "being for" [être pour].

The ambiguity of the neurotic's position lies precisely in this metonymy, which is such that it is in this être pour that all of his pour être [in order to be] lies.

June 10, 1959

515

XXV

THE EITHER/OR CONCERNING THE OBJECT

Perverse fantasy and perversion Fantasy and the construction of reality
The paradox of the bad internal object
The radical nature of female jealousy
The function of substitutes in neurosis

There is something instructive, I will not say "even in," but "above all in" mistakes [erreurs] – or instances of going astray [errances], if you will.

This is why you have noticed that I rather constantly refer to the hesitations and impasses that manifest themselves in psychoanalytic theory, and use them as being in and of themselves revealing as concerns the structure of the reality we deal with.

In this regard, there is something interesting, noteworthy, and significant to us in a paper that is not very old, since it came out in 1956 in the July–October issue of the International Journal of Psychoanalysis. It was written by several of our Parisian colleagues, whose names I will not mention, since I am not targeting their position insofar as it may be personal.

They endeavored to closely define the meaning of perversion. Curiously enough, the article's conclusions are as reserved as they could possibly be. The only formally articulated conclusion included is, however, rather striking: "Thus there is no specific unconscious content in the sexual perversions, since we find the same content in cases of neurosis and psychosis."

The entire article illustrates this, but in a way that is not altogether convincing. Even without taking a bird's eye view, we realize that the article is based on a constantly maintained confusion between perverse fantasy and perversion. The authors note that there are conscious and unconscious fantasies in the neuroses and 516 the perversions that seem to overlap, and to our astonishment they facilely conclude therefrom that there is no fundamental difference, from the vantage point of the unconscious, between neurosis and perversion.

We find in this article reflections that are presented without taking any precautions or manifesting any regard for the psychoanalytic tradition, and that proceed toward a sort of overturning of the values and principles of that tradition. The authors stop only once they have concluded that perversion is, in short, an abnormal relation that is eroticized. It thus does not involve the relationship to an object, but rather the eroticization of a relation for economic reasons. To anyone who undertakes an even slightly sensible examination of the matter, this eroticized relation to the object can be only of "soporific value."

I myself am now led, after having begun last time to broach the relationship between fantasy and neurosis in order to indicate their most general terms, to discuss the relationship between fantasy and perversion.

1

First a word about what has happened in the course of the history of psychoanalysis, which can be laid out more rigorously in light of our progress here.

Very shortly after having spelled out the functions of the unconscious, especially in hysteria, the neuroses, and dreams, Freud was led to posit the presence in the unconscious of what he called polymorph perverse Anlage: a "polymorphously perverse disposition" [GW V, p. 91; SE VII, p. 191].

For a time, one that has long since passed, naturally, things remained at that point. Nevertheless, what people failed to realize, it seems, is that in formulating the notion of a polymorphously perverse disposition in the unconscious, Freud discovered nothing less than the very structure of unconscious fantasies. He observed that their structure resembles the relational mode that blossoms, comes fully to the light of day, and is demonstrated in the perversions.

In effect, the form taken by unconscious fantasies overlaps what occupies the imaginative field of the pervert's desire.

What perverts stage in their fantasies presents itself in a way that 517 is obvious in clinical work. It presents itself as a movie* sequence, by which I mean a sequence that is isolated [coupée] from the development of the drama – is that what is called a "rush"*? I'm not sure of the term – like trailers that are designed to whet our appetite to come back next week to see the film from which the images we are watching were extracted. What is seductive about them is that they are removed [désinsérées] from the chain and disconnected from the plot.

Something like that is involved in perverts' fantasies. Naturally, psychoanalysis has taught us to recontextualize them, link them back up with the fuller plot, and reattach them to the subjects' histories. To varying degrees, and even at the cost of several modifications, some touching up, and reversals, they reassume their place and meaning. Nevertheless, the extraction [désinsertion] by which they present themselves confirms what I have formulated regarding the position of desire – namely, that desire is situated in what is beyond what is nameable, in what is beyond the subject.

I will add in passing, and as a reminder, that this is what retrospectively explains the characteristic quality that fantasies, whether those of a pervert or not, take on when they are avowed. Namely, the state of being ill at ease that we should give a name to when it is at its height, and which often stops patients from revealing their fantasies for a long time. This ridiculous facet can only be explained by the relations that we have already been able to perceive between the position of desire and the realm of comedy.

A question thus immediately arose [in the analytic literature] as to the real nature of perverse fantasy. Is it absolutely crucial, natural, and definitive, or should it be viewed instead as something as complex, elaborate, and in short, significant as a neurotic symptom?

This question gave rise to a whole way of thinking that became integrated into the problem of perversion, and that plays an essential role in the elaboration of what is known as object relations theory.

It was at this point in time that people gave object relations a developmental definition. People did not simply turn the steps 518 regulating the subject's development into specific stages [momentalités] of his Eros – that is, erogenous phases – but into modes of his relation to the world. I need not remind you here of the initiators – Abraham, Ferenczi, and others – of the so-called tables of correlated stages, which made the so-called dispositional reservoirs [or: reservoirs of the tendencies, needs, or drives] correspond to specific libidinal forms of the ego.* A particular ego* structure, specifying a certain type of relation to reality, was supposed to correspond to every form of libido.

You are aware of what this theory has brought with it by way of clarity and even enrichment, and also what it has posed by way of problems. Writers have tried to show us the aforementioned correspondences in concrete cases, but it suffices to read their works to realize that these correspondences are always established in a somewhat theoretical way, and that their own texts suggest that an accurate assessment of things is lacking. Right from the very first discussions, an opposition between "partial object" and "total object" is made, for example, but in a way that is unsustainable in my view.

In more recent works, we find, for example, the notorious notion, which I have often mentioned, of "distance from the object," which so thoroughly dominates articles dealing with rules of technique. A certain French author believes that the notion of distance is decisive in obsessive neurosis, whereas it is in certain perversions that it plays a decisive role – for example, the distance of an object [from oneself] is obviously far more manifest in the phenomenology of fetishism. Many other forms [of perversion] can be articulated in much the same way.

The first truth we will have to bring out here is that the notion of distance is so essential that it is perhaps, after all, truly unelimina-ble from desire itself, by which I mean that it is necessary in order to maintain, sustain, and even preserve the dimension of desire. It would be hard, indeed, to conceptualize how desire could sustain itself were the myth of a relationship to the object without any distance from it to be realized.

We have here – in a truly mythical form, I am saying – the idea of a sort of harmony [accord] between subject and object. This harmony has two facets, two faces, or two mirages: animal on the one side and mystical on the other. Needless to say, this idea in no way coincides with the facts of experience or with psychoanalytic 519 theory, which views the object as a remainder [or: leftover, reste].

Thus the supposed "bad distance at which the obsessive stays from the object" is also thought to be corrected and rectified, overcome in the hic et nunc [here and now] of the analytic relationship. And this is supposed to happen owing to an ideal and even idealizing identification with the analyst, who is considered in this case not as an object but as the prototype of a satisfying object-relation. What exactly can such an ideal correspond to when one tries to realize it in analysis? I have already broached this question, but we will have to return to it later to formulate it differently.

The problems raised by object relations have been broached far more assiduously and seriously in other contexts by other groups. As you know, I place Edward Glover's work at the top of the list; I have already mentioned his article entitled "The Relation of Perversion-Formation to the Development of Reality-Sense" which came out in the International Journal of Psychoanalysis in 1933.

In his concern to construct a developmental theory of the relations between the subject and the world – that is, the reality around him – Glover demands that development be examined as closely as possible: through reconstruction in the analyses of adults, and through the direct observation of behavior in children. He proposes to situate the perversions on a timeline that includes, as it were, the times in life at which the different psychical anomalies we deal with in analysis arise. He lays out a whole series of them, and the order in which they appear on his timeline is, as usual, open to criticism. Without going into it in detail, I will point out that he highlights the extremely early nature of psychotic disturbances – paranoid disturbances in particular – and situates after them the different forms of neurosis in order from the earliest to the latest.

The earliest is obsessive neurosis, which is thus located right at the border with paranoid forms of psychosis. Glover felt that he had rather precisely situated the relations between paranoia and the neuroses in an article on "drug addictions"* written the year before this one. In it he tried to situate the perversions in terms of the stage at 520 which they arise, the time in life at which they begin, and the mode of the subject's relationship to the real to which they correspond.

In his view, the standard paranoid stage, which is considered to arise very early on in life, is characterized by a highly specific mode of object-relation, linked to primitive mechanisms of projection and introjection. This is where he situates drug addictions.* He clearly indicates that, on this point, he endorses Klein's theory, whereas, as you know, he went on to very publicly critique her.

This is the context in which the instructive passage I read you a few classes ago appears, where, in a brilliant, metaphorical way, Glover does not hesitate to compare the child's earliest world to "a combination of a butcher's shop, a public lavatory under shell-fire, and a post-mortem room" [IJP 14, no. 4 (1933): 492]. The stage that follows this inaugural spectacle of life brings with it what is assuredly a far more benign organization, that of a pharmacy with its store of objects, some beneficial, some poisonous. This passage shows us in what direction Glover and Klein – for there is no difference between them here – seek to define fantasy as functioning in such a way as to organize the construction of reality by the subject.

In her article "The Importance of Symbol-Formation in the Development of the Ego" [IJP 11 (1930): 24–39], Klein clearly articulates the way in which objects are successively mastered by the child. At the outset, owing to frustrations the child undergoes, objects are sources of anxiety to him, which is why his fundamental relations with those around him are colored by aggression and sadism. The subject's interest next shifts to more benign objects, objects that are further removed from his needs; these objects become, in turn, imbued with the same anxiety. The progressive extension of the child's world is understood to proceed in this manner.

Note that we have here a mechanism that we might call "contraphobic" – phobic objects are replaced by contraphobic objects, even if the latter become phobic in turn. It is thus in a contraphobic dialectic that the progressive extension of the world of objects – in other words, the conquest of reality – supposedly comes about.

To determine whether this conception corresponds to clinical work or not is not my direct interest here. In clinical work, many things run counter to it. I believe that it attests to a unilateral viewpoint, inasmuch as such a mechanism, even if it plays a role in the conquest of reality, does not strictly speaking constitute reality. 521

But my goal here is not to critique Klein's theory. I am after something else altogether – namely, to shed light on the nature of a function, that of desire. We immediately see the consequences of her theory, for Glover arrives at a paradox, which should certainly be more instructive to him than it is to us, for there is nothing in it for us to be surprised by.

What he concretely tries to do is to situate the various perversions with respect to a dialectic or mechanism that he hopes to integrate into the notion of steady ego* development, ego development that supposedly parallels changes in the libido. The upshot is that the subject's entire fate and structuring turn out to be theorized as a purely individual experience of the conquest of reality. That is the whole story.

This is what makes for the difference, for example, between the theory I provide you with of the phobias, and that proposed by certain recent French authors.

The latter seek to reconstruct the development of a phobia on the basis of structural forms of childhood experience – the way, for example, in which the child negotiates his relations with those around him, or deals with the passage from light to darkness. Development is understood here as something that is purely experimental, the possibility of phobia being deduced from and generated by a concrete experience of fear.

What I teach you here, on the other hand, is that there can be no accurate theory of phobia that does not include the true function of the signifier. This function presupposes the existence of a dimension which is not that of the relation of the subject to those around him, or to any reality, if it is not the reality and dimension of language. The fact that the subject must situate himself in discourse and manifest himself there as a being is where it all starts.

It is striking to see how greatly someone as perspicacious as Glover can misjudge the phobias. In his attempt to explain the development and stabilization of a phobia, he declares the following: "It is more advantageous to suffer from a tiger-phobia in London than in an 522 Indian jungle." One could retort that this is not the register in which the problem arises. One could even reverse his claim and say that a tiger-phobia would be quite advantageous in helping an Indian child adapt to his real situation, whereas it is quite cumbersome to suffer from a tiger-phobia if one lives in London, whether one is a child or further along in one's development. For in London, the behavior of a subject who is prey to such a phobia would surely be quite constricted and would bear no relation whatsoever to reality.

Glover then finds himself faced with the following problem: how can one situate perversion in a developmental perspective when it includes the widest variety of distortions of reality? He can only do so by isolating different types of perversion and inserting them into every supposed or presupposed stage of development. He is thus obliged to accept the existence of very archaic perversions, ones that are more or less contemporary with the paranoid or even the depressive phase, alongside other perversions that are situated at very advanced stages of development – not simply phallic, but Oedipal and even genital, strictly speaking.

Breaking perversion down into different types does not seem to Glover to constitute an objection to his conceptualization, and here is why. The perspective from which he begins forces him, when all is said and done, to define perversion as one of the various forms of reality testing.* When reality testing fails in some way or location, perversion comes to cover over the hole* through a specific mode of apprehending reality – which is, in this case, a psychical reality, a projected and indeed introjected reality.

Perversion thus serves the function of safeguarding reality for the subject, for otherwise the equilibrium of the whole of reality would be threatened by some overload [décharge] or moment of instability. Perversion serves to repair [reprise] – in the sense in which one speaks in French of a fabric that is darned [reprisé] – reality and, moreover, serves as reality's keystone. In short, perversion is unambiguously conceptualized by Glover as a form of salvation when compared with the supposed threat of psychosis.

That is one way of looking at it. Perhaps certain case studies do, 523 in fact, include elements that seem to corroborate this, but many others would have us look elsewhere.

Nevertheless, it seems quite paradoxical to grant perversion an economic role that is contradicted by many elements – not to mention the fact that it is certainly not the precarious nature of the pervert's edifice that strikes us, at least at first glance, either clinically or in psychoanalytic experience.

Before moving on, I will point out here in what regard Klein picks up on and takes a first stab at the question I am raising here.

2

Klein postulates two stages, the paranoid phase and the depressive phase that follows it.

In the second phase, the subject relates to his major, prevalent object, his mother, as a whole [person]. Prior to that, he deals only with separate elements that a split divides into good and bad objects, giving rise thereby to the operations of projection and introjection. All of this characterizes the paranoid barrier.

What is going on in this initial process, situated at the outset of the subject's life, if we reformulate it from our own vantage point?

What Klein shows us is, in short, that reality, as based on the child's first apprehensions of the object, comes from the fact that the object – whether it is good or bad, beneficial or frustrating – is first and foremost meaningful [significatif]. The strict opposition between good and bad, without any nuances or intermediary states [transitions] – without taking into account in the slightest degree the fact that it is the same object, the mother, who can be good or bad at different times – makes it clear that what is involved here are not a child's actual experiences, with everything such experiences usually bring with them that is transitional, but rather a shift in the function of the object itself to that of a signifying opposition.

This is what is at the crux of the whole of Klein's theory.

People rarely notice, it seems to me, that, as well-founded as it may be, it is diametrically opposed to what I have brought out in our practice – namely, that the lively communication that takes place in the course of mothering plays an essential role in the child's development. It belongs to a different register, one that is contemporary with hers, but cannot be confused with hers. 524

What Klein proposes is a sort of primitive algebra that we can say connects up perfectly with what I am trying to bring out here under the following heading: "function of the signifier." What Klein rightly or wrongly describes to us, and we need but register this, are the earliest forms of the functioning of the signifier, whether the signifier is in fact present at that early moment in time or simply a Rückphantasie, a fantasy that is constructed retrospectively.

What value does the frontier between her two phases thus take on? I am referring to the stage between the paranoid phase – with its division between good objects that are "internalized"* by the child and bad ones that are rejected – and the depressive phase where the notion of the subject as a whole comes into view. Let us note that it is, in fact, only from the moment at which the subject considers himself to be a whole [entity] that there can be an inside and an outside. It is only then that it is conceivable that the process of "internalization"* and "externalization,"* of introjection and projection – which is decisive in Klein's eyes in structuring the primitive animal – can occur.

The conceptual landmarks we use here allow us to grasp what is at issue in the move from one phase to the next. What Klein calls the primitive division of objects into good and bad is transferred, she says, into another register, which is that of the subject's inside and outside. Now we can relate this register – without, I believe, going too far out on a limb – to what I call the mirror stage. It is the other's image that gives the subject the notion [forme] of the other's unity, on the basis of which the division between inside and outside can be established, and with regard to which good and bad objects are then redeployed.

The good objects must come inside, and the bad ones must remain outside. What Klein manages to define here in the clearest possible way, because it is forced on us by experience, can be formulated in our own terms: the discourse that really organizes the world of objects in accordance with the subject's being goes, I would say, beyond the discourse in which the subject recognizes himself in the ordeal constituted by the mirror stage, [where] it is in the relationship of narcissistic identification of one image with another that he recognizes himself as mastery and as a unique ego – as mastery of an ego.

525 In order to understand what is at stake in what Klein describes, we must accept the non-overlapping nature of two experiences (note that I myself am not saying that the whole of development is necessarily organized in this way):

1 the experience that defines the subject as an object of the first identification with the mother, and in particular with her insignias; this experience continues to have an assimilating value to the subject, going beyond what he will be able to place inside himself;
2 the register of experience that defines this inside and in which the subject is i(a) – in other words, typically and ideally, the image of his young semblable, with whom we most clearly see him have his first experiences of mastery and bearing.

Between the two there is a field, x, where i(a) is both part of the subject and not part of the subject. What is it? It is what Klein calls the bad internal object.

People do not seem surprised by the paradox that it constitutes with respect to the premises we began from, whereas it presents itself immediately in Klein's dialectic, and in the most manifest way possible, as a problematic object.

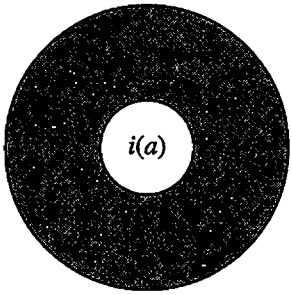

Figure 25.1: The bad internal object

Indeed, if we look at it from the outside, as it were, where the subject is not a subject but where we must take him to be a real being, we can wonder whether the subject is not, in fact, the bad object with which he supposedly identifies. Conversely, if we look at it from the inside – from the point of view of crasia or mastery, from the point of view of the subject's first attempt to stand up, assert himself, and contain himself – a question arises. Does the subject 526 have the bad object – which will play an absolutely decisive role thereafter – or doesn't he?

According to Klein, as we have seen, the division of objects into good and bad determines the subject's structuring process. The child internalizes good objects, making them part of himself right from the outset, whereas he rejects the bad objects as being not him. The paradox of the bad internalized object thus comes to the fore: the subject internalizes it, making it his own, and at the same time he in a sense disavows [dénie] it for being virtually bad.

The bad object never stops presenting itself, with regard to the subject's being, in the form of a permanent, anxiety-producing enigma. What will put an end to it is clearly the later function of prohibition. Prohibition puts an end to it by introducing an essential delineation into the bad object: if the subject is the bad object, he does not have it; insofar as he is [est] identified with it, he is forbidden to have [ait] it – we should take advantage of the similarity in pronunciation in French between the subjunctive of the verb avoir, to have, and the present tense of the verb être, to be. Otherwise stated, insofar as he is it, he does not have it, and insofar as he has it, he is not it.

Stated in still other terms, it is at the level of the bad object that the subject experiences the slavery of his mastery, if I may put it thus. The true master – everyone knows that he has no face, that he is somewhere in language, although he may even be nowhere in it – allows the subject limited use of the bad object itself, insofar as it is an object that is not situated with respect to demand, an object that cannot be demanded. It is on this basis that what we encounter in our practice takes on its import.

We can see this in a striking way in the precise cases that Klein presents.

The incredibly inhibited child [Dick] whom she presents in "The Importance of Symbol-Formation in the Development of the Ego" has manifestly arrived at an impasse, which is constituted by the field of what truly cannot be demanded. As soon as she begins to speak to him, what she immediately achieves crystallizes in a panicked question: "Nurse coming?"* Immediately thereafter, Klein 527 indicates, as an astonishing, decisive fact, that the child allows himself to enter into contact with objects, from which he initially appeared to be oddly separate.

He does so, as you recall, by making a little cut or tear with the help of a pair of scissors. The child can hardly be called inept, for he is able to handle all sorts of things, like door-handles [p. 29], but he has never been able to hold scissors before. Here, however, he manages to hold them, use them, and detach a tiny lump of coal from something that is not devoid of signification, since it is part of the train set [chaîne du train] with which people have managed to get him to play.

What is involved here is a "tender."* I won't go here into all the curious plays on words that could be made around this English word. It is not the Carte du Tendre we are used to, but the Carte du Tender.

In truth, the child isolates himself, defines himself, and situates himself in this little piece that is detached from the signifying chain – in this remainder, this minuscule lump, this sketch of an object, appearing here only in the form of a little bit, a very little bit. A similar little bit suddenly gives rise to both panic and sympathy on his part when he sees pencil shavings on Klein's lap [p. 33].

At that point, showing some emotion for the first time in the presence of this other person, he cries out, "Poor Mrs. Klein!"

3

Thus desire is not demand. This first intuition, which we experience at every moment and which brings us back to the earliest conditions, must not stop us from looking further.

Someone comes to see us for an analysis. Why? What is he asking for? In theory, satisfaction and well-being – except that satisfaction does not always bring him well-being, far from it. How do analysts usually respond to him? They set about organizing his history as a subject, as one might organize the history of psychoanalysis or the history of technique, in order to respond to his demand for satisfaction. By what pathway? By attempting to obtain a reduction of his 528 desires to his needs.

Isn't it paradoxical to do so? For all of our work is, we can say, sustained in the dimension of desire. This is, moreover, as obvious to the subject as it is to us: to us, because everything that we have formulated will come down to what I will say; and to the subject, because in the final analysis, he knows this full well when he comes to see us.

I was just informed that someone is in the process of writing an important thesis on the social signification of psychoanalysis, and this led me to believe that it will include elements that are extremely rich in experience and especially well thought out. I think that the social representation of psychoanalysis is in fact much less distorted in society as a whole than we tend to think. Owing to that, I dare to hope that something – which is frankly at the very basis and core of what is implied by the fact that a person comes to see us – will come out of this thesis in the clearest way possible: the fact that at the root of his demand we find that he does not trust (in) his desire [or: he does not have faith in (or rely on) his desire, il ne se fie pas à son désir]. What all of the subjects who contact us have in common is that they do not trust (in) their desire.

The fact that, owing to our artifices, their desire can, following our lead, be reduced to need – or even be led toward sublimation along the elevated pathways of love – does not alter the fact that what characterizes their desire at the outset is that there is something that cannot actually be demanded, and regarding which a question arises. This is the dimension of desire, strictly speaking.

In order to introduce the dialectic of desire, do you recall what I did at a very precise moment, namely two and a half years ago? I began from what Freud says regarding the Oedipus complex in women [Seminar IV, Chapters 6–8]. Isn't what I have just said legible in the fact that there is good reason to pinpoint – in psychoanalytic practice, in our work with the unconscious – what women demand at the outset, which is that by which, Freud tells us, they enter into the Oedipus complex? They do not demand satisfaction; they demand to have what they do not have. What is involved is, as you know, the phallus.

This is the source of the myriad problems that arise when one tries to reduce the unfolding of the dialectic of desire in women to a 529 natural process.

Whether we manage to reduce it to a natural process or not, we must deal with something that emerges at a critical moment, that Freud highlights, in the development of little girls. Whether it is a primary or a secondary process does not matter much to us, after all; it is a salient and irreducible process, in any case. It is the following: what little girls demand – namely, to have the phallus – they demand to have in the place where they would have had it if they were men. This is what is involved and there are no two ways about it.

They will no doubt manage to have it – to have this phallus which is a signifier, a signifier, I repeat – to really have it in a man. This is even what makes it such that women are in a highly privileged position and that their affective problems are relatively simple compared to those experienced by men, but this relative simplicity must not blind us. The fact remains that at the outset, the real phallus that women can have enters into their dialectic and its unfolding as a signifier. Owing to which, they will always have it, at a certain level of their experience, en moins (as an absence, as something missing).

Naturally, I always reserve for women the marginal possibility [possibilité-limite] of perfect union with a being – namely, that in a sexual embrace there could be a complete fusion for a woman between her beloved and his organ. The fact remains, however, that in everyday experience, the difficulties that present themselves regarding sex revolve precisely around the following point: the ideal moment – which is in some sense poetic and even apocalyptic – of perfect sexual union is only situated in the margins [limite], whereas in fact, in the everyday test of experience, women, even when they fully realize their femininity, always deal with the phallic object qua separate. It is precisely because they deal with the phallus as such and in this register that their actions and impact can be perceived by men as castrating.

Moreover, they remain unconscious of this, until they go into analysis, just as they remain unconscious of the fact that symbolically they are the very phallus they do not have inasmuch as they are the object of the Other's desire. They do not know either of these things.

This specific position lasts as long as they remain unconscious of 530 it, which means as long as it exists solely for the Other [en tant qu'elle ne vaut que pour l'Autre], the partner. Nevertheless, the extremely odd and paradoxical formulation by which women's relations to the phallus are resolved is that, in the unconscious, they both are it and have it.

The peculiar position of the phallus alongside the ideal woman, alongside this woman in her fantasized world, is one of the oddest effects of our relationship to discourse. In the unconscious, she is it and she has it, in the best of cases – except that she can only know it via her desire. Consequently, there is an odd similarity between her as it were trans-subjective formulation – that is, between her unconscious formulation – and that of the pervert.

What have we discovered about women's unconscious economy if not that they manage to find phallic equivalences for all the objects that can be separated from them, including, and first on the list, the most natural object that separates from them – namely, the children to whom they give birth? I am merely reciting the ABCs of psychoanalytic doctrine here. Owing to this fact, the objects from which they separate end up taking on for them, as naturally as can be, if you will, the function of objects of desire. And this is what explains, I believe, the lower frequency of perversion in women. Insofar as their satisfactions are inscribed in a cultural context – and it is out of the question that they not be – they manage to be situated in the dialectic of separation, which is the dialectic of desire's signifying objects.

More than one analytic author has already clearly expressed what I have just said – and in a way that will undoubtedly appear far more concrete to you – by saying that, if there are fewer perversions among women than among men, it is because they generally manage to satisfy their perverse tendencies in their relations with their children. This is not why "your daughter is mute," but it is why there are a number of children who need our help. As you see, we come back here to first truths; but it is not pointless to return to them, assuming we do so by the proper pathway.

I will take advantage of the point we are at here to also give you an indication designed to temper what the male portion of my audience might experience by way of surprise and even impatience when faced with one of the odd features of their relations with their partners of the opposite sex. I mean what is commonly referred to 531 as jealousy.

Psychoanalysts, who have brought us so much clarity, have naturally brought us just as much obscurity. As Nestroy, whom Freud greatly appreciated, said, "every step forward is only half as big as it looks at first." This is why the problem of female jealousy has been conflated in psychoanalysis with the very different problem of male jealousy. Assuming the two sexes have very different ways of loving, female jealousy is something that, I believe, can truly be situated only at the most radical point.

Consider my little illustration of demand, if you recall it [Table 20.1]. The subject questions his relationship to the Other and then strikes the Other with signifying death, as it were, as Ⱥ, only to himself appear as fallen, $, in the presence of this little a which is, in the final analysis, the remainder of the division: an irreducible and undemandable something that is the object of desire. Well, insofar as the subject, the woman here, makes herself into an object of love, she views this remainder as what is most essential to her. Which is why she attributes so much importance to manifestations of her partner's desire.

For in the end, it is obvious that in real life, love and desire are two different things. We should speak clearly and say that we can love someone a great deal and desire someone else.

To the degree to which women occupy the specific position that I mentioned, they know the value of desire full well. They know that, beyond all of love's sublimations, desire has a relationship to being, even in its most limited, restricted, fetishistic, and, in short, its stupidest form – that is, even in the marginal form in which in fantasy the subject, qua blinded, is literally nothing more than a prop and a sign, the sign of little a as the signifying remainder of relations with the Other. Nevertheless, in the final analysis, women view little a as ultimate proof that the Other is verily and truly addressing them.

A man can truly love a woman with all the affection and devotion we can imagine, but the fact remains that if he desires another woman – even if the first woman knows that what he desires in this other woman is her shoe, the hem of her dress, or the makeup 532 she wears on her face – his homage to being thus goes to the other woman.

It is necessary to remind people of first truths from time to time, which is why I think you will excuse the possibly forced tone of this digression.

Let us now consider the exact nature of the zone of the object in which this ambiguity is established. What is the true function of the phallus? You cannot fail to feel it has already been singularly sketched out by what I told you earlier today about the bad internal object.

One could say that, in the guise of the phallus, the paternal metaphor, as I have called it, institutes a split in the object that precisely overlaps, as we should have expected, what I consider to be the general form of prohibition – namely, either the subject is not it or the subject does not have it.

If the subject is the phallus – something that can be immediately illustrated when the subject is the object of his mother's desire – then he does not have it, in other words he has no right to use it; this is the basic meaning of the law prohibiting incest. On the other hand, if he has it, in other words if he has identified with his father, then he clearly is not the phallus.

This is what is signified, at the symbolic level that I will call radical, by the introduction of the Oedipus complex as a dimension.

And everything that will ever be said on this topic will always boil down to the "either/or" that introduces the realm of an object that one cannot demand.

How is the neurotic characterized? He of course makes use of this alternative [either/or], and since he fully situates himself in the Oedipus complex, in its signifying structuring, he makes use of it in a way that I will call metonymic. I would even say that this metonymy is regressive to the degree to which "he is not it" presents itself there as prior to "she does not have it."

Allow me to explain this. The neurotic uses the fundamental alternative in a metonymic form in that, for him, "not to have it" is the form in which he disguisedly asserts himself "to be it." He "does not have" the phallus "in order to be" the phallus in a hidden, unconscious way. It is on this somewhat enigmatic "in order to be" [pour être] that I ended last time.

Note that "it is an other who has it," whereas "he is it" unconsciously. In his desiring function, the subject elects a substitute. This is the crux of neurosis. Consider what actually happens at the end of the obsessive's complicated maneuvers – he is not the one who enjoys. Similarly for the hysteric: she is not the one who is enjoyed. 533

The imaginary substitution that is at work here is a substitution of the ego for the subject – that is, for the $ that is involved at the level of desire. It is because the ego takes the place of the subject that he brings demand into desire's question. Someone who is not the subject, but who is his image [i.e., the ego], is substituted for him in the dialectic of desire.

This is why the neurotic can only demand substitutes, in the final analysis. What is characteristic about his experience, and he may even sense this, is that he demands everything that he demands for something else [or: for some other reason, autre chose]. This is the other consequence of the role that the imaginary comes to play and what I called the neurotic's regressive metonymy, for in this realm he cannot be stopped – once the subject has been replaced at the level of his desire, he can only demand replacements while believing he is demanding what he desires.

To take this a step further, experience shows that the ego, owing to its very form – that is, insofar as it is the reflection of a reflection, and is the other's form – also takes the place of the person from whom [dont] the subject demands something. Nowhere more easily than in the neurotic does this separate ego come to take the place of the separate object that I designate as the earliest form of the object of desire.

The neurotic's altruism is, as opposed to what people say, permanent. To obtain the satisfactions he seeks, nothing is more common than to see him take a pathway about which we can say that it consists in devoting himself to satisfying – as much as he can here – all of the other's demands, even though he knows that those demands constitute a perpetual obstacle to his own desire. In other words, in his devotion to the other, he blinds himself to his own lack of satisfaction.

These are things that are not, I think, comprehensible outside of the perspective that I am trying to articulate for you here.

For the neurotic, the barred S of the formula ($\$\Diamond a$) transforms 534 – I am saying this summarily and with caveats – into something in which identification of his unconscious being with the phallus is inscribed. For this reason, I will give it the same sign as the subject: just as there is a "barred subject," I will write "barred phallus." This barred phallus finds itself in the presence of an object that I will write in the most general form of an object of desire – namely, in the form of the imaginary other in which the subject situates himself and finds himself anew: $\Phi \Diamond i(a)$.

We must now turn to perversion, but as it is late, I will defer this till next time. I cannot advance any more quickly here. See nothing in this but an effect of the difficult ground we must cover.

June 17, 1959

XXVI

THE FUNCTION OF SPLITTING* IN PERVERSION

The locus of perverse desire in Lolita
A feature of masochistic jouissance
The machine in schizophrenia
The idolized woman in homosexuality Desire on the horizon or desire at the heart of . . .

The difficulty we are facing is not a new one; it is one of those about which the entire ethical tradition has speculated. Need I echo here from long, long ago the bitterness of the sages or pseudo-sages regarding the disappointing nature of human desire?

The question takes on an explicit form in psychoanalysis, where the partial nature of the drives appears right from the outset, as does the fact that our connection with the object depends on the complex, complicated, and incredibly risky arrangement of those drives. All access to the object, insofar as it depends on a combination of partial drives, is fundamentally problematic in character.

If there is a theory here, it runs counter to the notion of instinct, as counter to that notion as one can possibly imagine. However flexibly one may posit its hypothesis of finality, the whole theory of instinct is, as it were, based on the centering of the object. In other words, the natural process of the living organism is such that an object is progressively fixated in a certain field and caught there in a certain behavior. The process presents itself in the guise of a progressive concentration of the field.

The process and dialectic that psychoanalysis shows us is altogether different. Here, we progress on the contrary through the addition and combination of partial drives. It is only after taking the trouble to synthesize all sorts of interchangeable and variable drives, and at the endpoint of highly diverse combinations, that we manage to conceptualize the advent of a satisfying object, one that corresponds to the two poles of masculinity and femininity.

536 This might lead you to think that ($◊a) – situated on the graph we use here to map the position of desire in a speaking subject – is a very simple notation. In line with this, we might say the following: in desire, something is required, which is the relationship between the subject and the object; little a is the object, barred S is the subject, and that's it. What is most original in this notation is still the little bar on S, which reminds us that, at the culminating point at which desire is rendered present to mind, the subject is himself marked by speech. But this amounts, after all, to nothing more than a reminder that the drives are fragmented.

It is worth pointing out here that this notation is broader in scope.

It does not designate a relationship between the subject and the object; it designates fantasy, insofar as fantasy sustains the subject as desiring – in other words, at a point beyond his discourse. This notation signifies that the subject is present in fantasy as the subject of unconscious discourse. He is present in fantasy insofar as he is represented there by the function of cutting, that is, by the essential function that is his in discourse – and not in just any old discourse; it is a discourse that escapes him [or: slips out, lui échappe], the discourse of the unconscious.

If you follow the thread of this notation, you will not fail to be struck by the fact that it brings out dimensions that are always overlooked when it comes to perverse fantasies.

1

I already indicated to you last time how prudently we must broach such fantasies.

Perverse fantasies are not perversion proper.

The biggest mistake we – such as we are, in other words, insofar as we are more or less neurotic around the edges – can make is to imagine that we understand perversion because we have access to perverse fantasies. For the comprehensive access that we have to perverse fantasies does not give us access to perversion as a structure, even if those fantasies call, as it were, for a reconceptualization of perversion.

537 If you will allow me to take a little liberty in my discourse today in order to give myself over to a little gambol outside it, I will discuss with you a book marked by the seal of our times, which is entitled Lolita.

I am no more asking you to read this book than a whole series of others that could indicate a certain constellation of interest around the mainspring of desire. There are things that are better constructed than Lolita at a theoretical level, so to speak, but it is a rather exemplary product all the same.

For those who open the book, nothing will seem obscure as to the function that is reserved for i(a) in it. This function is manifested in it in a way that is all the less ambiguous as, curiously enough, the author expresses a frank opposition to what he calls "Freudian voodooism." He nevertheless clearly attests, several times and in a way that he truly does not perceive, to the symbolic function of the image i(a). For example, the hero, shortly before approaching Lolita decisively, has a dream in which she appears in the form of "a small hairy hermaphrodite."

But that is not what is of the essence. What is of the essence lies in the structure of the work, emphasizing, as it does, the brilliant contrast between the first and the second part, between the sparkling nature of desire as long as it is contemplated by the subject for some thirty years of his life, then its prodigious decline into an embroiled reality in the course of the miserable voyage of this couple across America the beautiful, during which the subject finds himself without any means whatsoever to get through to his partner. This is why Lolita presents all the characteristics of the subject's relation to a fantasy that is strictly speaking neurotic.

What is exemplary here is the way in which, owing to the very coherence of the construction, perverse desire shows itself. This desire does not appear in the hero, but in someone else [un autre] who is both more and something quite other than his double, for he is literally his persecutor. He appears in the margins of the story, as if the desire at stake in the subject could only live in another person, where it is literally impenetrable and altogether unknown. This substitution is clearly avowed in the novel.

The character who takes the hero's place at a certain moment in the plot is a pervert, strictly speaking. He really accedes to the 538 object. The key to this character is only given to us by his final groans when he is shot by the hero with a revolver. The relation to the object relies, in effect, on a sort of negative of the hero. This configuration has something exemplary about it, which can serve us as a schema for understanding that it is only by extrapolating that we can grasp perverse structure.

The structure of desire in neurosis is of a very different nature from the structure of desire in perversion, but we can nevertheless say that the two structures are opposites.

What will serve us here as a pole in broaching perversion is the most radical of the perverse positions of desire, the one that is placed by analytic theory at the basis of development, as its earliest point, and also at the endpoint of the most extreme regressions – namely, masochism.

Why not begin by highlighting something obvious that fantasy brings the subject, in order to underscore the degree to which certain levels are neglected when analysts rush to provide collapsed formulations of the nature of masochism?

People tend, as we know, to reduce masochism in its various forms to the subject's most basic relation to his own life. They invoke certain valid and precious indications given by Freud on this topic in order to justify their conflation of masochism with the death instinct and to maintain that something that runs counter to the organization of the instincts makes itself immediately felt at the very level of the drive, viewed as an organic impulse. There is undoubtedly some sort of target here on which it may be of interest to set our sights in order to raise certain questions.

If we return to our schema – the one that situates desire in a relationship in which the subject's relation to discourse takes the form of a long division [Table 20.1] – a singular feature that we would be wrong to neglect shines forth from within the fantasy world [la fantasmatique] of what people call masochism.

While conceptualizing masochism as the result of one of the most central instincts, analysts are undoubtedly in agreement that 539 masochistic jouissance essentially requires one not to go beyond a certain point when it comes to physical abuse. Now certain features of this jouissance, when they are highlighted, are, I believe, such as to enlighten us as regards at least a middle register [médium] of this jouissance, in which we can recognize the relationship between the subject and the Other's discourse.

Indeed, it suffices to have had a masochist confide in you – or to have read any of the numerous writings that are devoted to masochism, some decent ones having come out again just recently – to recognize that an essential dimension of masochistic jouissance lies in the specific sort of passivity experienced by the subject: he enjoys thinking that his fate is being decided in some upper echelon, by a certain number of people who are around him and who debate his fate in his presence as if he were not there. Isn't this one of the most salient and perceptible dimensions of the masochist's jouissance? The subject himself emphasizes this as one of the constituent features of masochistic relationships.

In short, nothing allows us to better grasp the fact that the subject is constituted as a subject in discourse than this fantasy in which discourse itself is lit up, explicit, and revealed. The possibility that this discourse may view the subject as nil [néant] is taken to extremes here.

We find here one of the first steps – a step, good Lord, that is rather important, since it is starting from it that a certain number of symptomatic manifestations will develop – a step from which we can see the following relationship sketch itself out on the horizon: the relationship there may be between the death instinct, considered to be one of the most central instances, and what in discourse gives us a prop without which we cannot accede to the death instinct – namely, the cut – a prop of nonbeing, the latter being one of the earliest, constitutive, and implicit dimensions which is at the root of all symbolization.

For a whole year, the one I devoted to Freud's Beyond the Pleasure Principle [Seminar II], I explained that the true function of symbolization must be located in the foundation of the cut. A cut is that by which the current of an early tension, whatever it may be, is taken up into a series of alternatives that inaugurate what one might call the most basic machine. This machine is precisely what we rediscover in a detached and isolated form at the core of schizophrenia. In schizophrenia, the subject identifies with the very discordance between this machine and his life-sustaining [vital] current. 540

We are putting our finger here – I am pointing this out in passing – in an exemplary way, which is both radical and altogether accessible, on one of the most eminent forms of the function of Verwerfung [foreclosure]. Assuming that the cut is both constitutive of discourse and irremediably external to it, one can say that the subject is verworfen [foreclosed] insofar as he identifies with the cut. It is because of this that he apprehends himself and perceives himself to be real.

Here I am merely indicating to you another form of Descartes' "I am thinking, therefore I am," a form that is, naturally, articulated and explored quite differently than in Descartes' work, but that I do not view as fundamentally distinct from his. What we have in addition to the Cartesian dimension is that the discourse in which the subject participates escapes him [lui échappe], and he is [divided in] two unbeknownst to himself. Insofar as he is the cut in this discourse, the subject is at the pinnacle of an "I am" whose singular property is to get its bearings [se saisir] in a reality that is truly the last reality in which a subject can get his bearings – namely, in the possibility of cutting the discourse somewhere, of providing punctuation.

The subject's essential being lies in this property. For the only real intrusion that he radically brings to the world as a subject nevertheless excludes him from it.

The upshot being that it will require, on the basis of all of his other life-sustaining relations, every detour that we analysts are aware of in order for the I to become reintegrated into the world.

2

Last time I spoke briefly about the way things work for neurotics.

As I said, for neurotics, the problem involves the paternal metaphor – that is, the fiction, whether real or not, of he who enjoys the object in peace. At what cost? At the cost of something perverse.

541 I also said that the paternal metaphor actually masks a metonymy. Behind the metaphor of the father as a subject of the law [or: law-abiding subject, sujet de la loi], as a peaceful possessor of jouissance, the metonymy of castration is hidden.

If you examine it closely, you will see that the son's castration is but the consequence or equivalent of the father's castration here. All the primitive myths that underpin Freud's myth of the [primal] father indicate this sufficiently: prior to the establishment of the heavenly monarchy, Cronos castrates Uranus, and Zeus castrates Cronos.

The metonymy in question is based, in the final analysis, on the fact that there is never just one phallus in the game. And this is precisely what must not be seen in neurotic structure. The neurotic can only be the phallus in the name of the Other [or: on the Other's behalf, au nom de l'Autre]. He does not have it – this is, as everyone knows, what we call the castration complex. There is thus someone who has the phallus, someone upon whom the neurotic's being depends. But if no one has the phallus, the neurotic has it still less, naturally.

What is the neurotic's desire?

As the entire development of Freud's work indicates, the neurotic is altogether dependent on the signifier's good faith. The neurotic latches on to this mythical guarantee in order to live in something other than a permanent state of vertigo. Moreover, as everyone knows, there is a close, historical relationship between Freud's anatomy of this desire and the characteristics of the era in which we live and about which we cannot know to what form of human – vaguely predicted by prophets of various ilks – it will lead or stumble.

This allows us to arrive at a condensed formulation, which in a certain way summarizes what I would like to convey to you: the neurotic's desire is, I would say, what is born when there is no God.

This is tangible in our practice as long as we do not hesitate to articulate it. But don't put words in my mouth; don't say that I am saying the situation is simpler when there is a God. I am saying that the suspension of the supreme Guarantor is what the neurotic hides within himself, and that it is at this level that the neurotic's desire is situated, stops, and is in abeyance.

The neurotic's desire is a desire only on the horizon of all of his behaviors. Indeed, if I can relay to you one of those formulations that allow you to recognize the style of a behavior, I would say that, 542 with regard to the desire in which he situates himself, the neurotic is always on his own horizon and preparing his own advent.

If you will allow me an expression that is modeled on all sorts of things we see in everyday life, the neurotic is always busy packing his bags or examining his conscience – it's the same thing – or organizing his labyrinth – that's the same thing, too. He gathers his bags, he forgets some of them or he checks them at the baggage checkroom, but they amount to nothing more than luggage for a trip he will never take.

This is an absolutely essential point to consider if we wish to realize that – notwithstanding what lazy thinking proposes, thinking that inches along the edge of the phenomenon like a snail, without ever trying to get a bird's eye view of it – there is a very distinct contrast to be made between the structure of the neurotic's desire and the structure of the pervert's desire.

There is a gap for the pervert too, of course. He, too, represents his being in the cut, since this is the fundamental subjective relationship. The only question is thus to know how this cut is experienced and borne by the pervert.

Here we can assuredly take into account work done by analysts over the years, insofar as their experience with perverse patients has allowed them to articulate theories which, although they sometimes contradict each other or fit together badly, are nevertheless suggestive of the type of difficulty they deal with. We can speak of it as material that, in and of itself, betrays certain structural necessities, necessities which are precisely those that we are trying to formulate here. I will thus say that the attempt we are making here to establish the real function of desire can include everything up to and including the discrete delusion, and even the well-organized delusion, to which certain analysts have been led who have broached the topic from the angle of behavior.

I will give you an example. I think that, overall, no one currently has more to say about perversion than a man who is very discreet and funny – I am talking about William H. Gillespie. To those who 543 read English, I recommend they peruse the following articles, all of which came out in the International Journal of Psychoanalysis, and from which they will learn a great deal: Gillespie's first paper on the topic, "A Contribution to the Study of Fetishism" (1940); then his "Notes on the Analysis of Sexual Perversions" (1952); and finally his most recent article, "The General Theory of Sexual Perversion" (1956).

One gets the impression that the author is a free spirit who gauges rather well the different directions from which people have attempted to broach perversion. Perversion is, naturally, far more complex than one might imagine when one confines one's attention to the summary view that it is the drive nakedly showing itself, and that's it. Which is not, for all that, to lend credence to the approach that tends to lump perversion and neurosis together.

I will go straight to what must be expressed, and which will henceforth serve us as a landmark for examining perversion in certain ways.

The notion of splitting* [in French, refente] is essential to Gillespie's conception of perversion. We could applaud him for this – but don't believe that I am going to rush to do so – believing that his conception overlaps the function in which I teach you to recognize the subjective component of fantasy: the subject's identification with the slit [fente] or cut provided by discourse. It just so happens that the type of precipitation implied by this recognition has already led certain writers who have studied perversion to insights of which they were a bit ashamed.

In order to corroborate this, I need but refer to the third case Gillespie discusses in the second of his articles. I will briefly depict the patient for you. He is a thirty-year-old fetishist. In the course of his analysis, it comes out that his fantasy is to be split in two by his mother's teeth while he penetrates her, she suddenly changing "into a hairy gorilla-like creature." The creature's cutting edge, as it were, is represented by the fact that "she bites off his female nipples," which he turns out to have; and [in another fantasy] she kicks him, her shoe "splitting up his anus and rectum" [p. 75].

In short, there is a whole decomposition/recomposition that goes 544 on here, Gillespie relating it to what he calls castration anxiety, including his mother's demand [that he be a girl] or regret [that he wasn't], and identification with the female genitalia as split. This identification, which grows out of one of Melanie Klein's theories, is not, I must say, demonstrated in this case; it is simply assumed by the analyst at the end of the analysis.

Gillespie concludes with a sort of insight or intuition that is only half-owned, it remaining a question for him. This is, in my view, indicative of the extremes to which he – someone who attentively followed the way the explanation, that only analysis was able to give, of the deepest recesses of perverse structure has developed over the course of time – was led. Gillespie writes, "The configuration of the material at this point led me to a speculation about the phantasy associated with the split ego" [p. 75].

As I believe you know, Freud died before he could complete his article Die Ichspaltung, "The Splitting of the Ego." The article was found after his death and it led Gillespie to speculate about the connection between the split ego and the split object.

Gillespie asks:

> Is not the female genital the split object par excellence, and cannot the phantasy of a split ego arise from an identification with this split genital? I am aware that when we speak of splitting of the ego and of the object we are referring to mental mechanisms which we assume to underlie the phenomena, – he is essentially telling us that we are doing science here and are working with scientific concepts – > and that phantasies pertain to a different level of discourse. [p. 75]

Here the type of question that Gillespie raises becomes interesting:

> [N]evertheless, phantasies, our own no less than our patients', must always play a part in the way we conceptualise these underlying processes. It seems to me, therefore, that the phantasy of being oneself split in pieces just as the vulva is split may 545 > well be very relevant to the mental mechanism of splitting of the object and introjection of the split object, leading to splitting of the ego. It is implicit, of course, in such a phantasy of the vulva as a split object that it was once intact, and that the splitting is the result of a sadistic attack, whether by the father or by oneself. [p. 75]

We cannot fail to be struck by such considerations, coming as they do from someone as prudent and measured as Gillespie. It is clear that he allows himself to go as far as his thought can take him when he reduces the explanation he gives of the subject's personality structure to a sort of primordial identificatory schema, that of splitting. His whole article is devoted to this, not just this one particular case.

Splittings,* which are what are often today called "divisions in the personality,". are in effect tangible and come apart in the transference with perverts. Nevertheless, to model the division of the pervert's personality on the two flaps of an organ from which fantasy life originates strikes me as laughable if not disconcerting.

What we find here under the heading of splitting,* and which must be grasped, in extremely different forms, at every level of the pervert's personality formation, is something I have already indicated – for example, in the article I devoted to the case of André Gide, a writer who was so remarkably studied by Jean Delay.

3

In the case of André Gide, splitting* presents itself in the form of an opposition between two identificatory sections, one of which is specifically linked to his narcissistic image of himself, i(a), and the other to his mother.

This illustrious patient tells us this in a thousand different ways in his work, and we must undoubtedly take the importance of his literary work into account, for it adds something to the subject's stability.

But it is not about this topic that I would like to fully elaborate 546 what I am indicating to you. As the time left to us this year is almost gone, I must prime the pump a bit and propose a few little things designed to show you what our work here this year now allows us to broach.

In the very title of my article on Gide, I foregrounded a relationship that is especially salient in his case, the one that the schema of fantasy spells out between desire and the letter. What does this mean? It means that we must situate the process of sublimation, assuming we wish to give the term "sublimation" a suitable meaning, in the reconversion of desire into a production involving symbols – which is not the supra-reality people think it is. It is, on the contrary, essentially made up of shards of reality, of the latter's decomposition into signifying parts. Sublimation, I am saying, lies in the reconversion of desire's impasse into signifying materiality.

There is no doubt but that Gide deserves to be situated in the category of subjects who raise the problem of homosexuality for us. And what do we see in his case, if not the twofold relationship between the subject and a divided object?

On the one hand, the object is narcissistic, the reflection of this ungracious – or even "disgraced," as a certain writer put it – boy that Gide was early on. In his furtive relations with narcissistic objects, the presence of the phallus is essential. It is in this regard that Gide is homosexual.

Nevertheless, and it is to Jean Delay's credit to have shown this to us in his biography of Gide, it is altogether impossible to focus on one of the sexual anomalies of Gide as a subject without juxtaposing it with what Gide himself attested to with the following formulation:

"No one can imagine the love of an Uranist." What is at issue here is his hyper-idealized love for his wife.

Its origins are very clearly spelled out by Delay, and I had no trouble at all bringing them together and highlighting everything that connects this love to his relationship with his mother. It is not solely a question of the real mother as we know her, but of the mother insofar as she harbors within herself a structure whose true nature we will try to detect. I will immediately say that the presence – I would go even further and say the topography – of the bad object is essential to that structure.

I cannot dwell here on each point of Gide's history, such as his work, at its different stages, lays it out. I will confine my attention to 547 citing the following passages:

> But to show how greatly a child's instinct may go astray, I will mention more particularly two of the themes that gave me physical enjoyment [jouissance]: one was furnished me very innocently by George Sand in her charming story of Gribouille. Gribouille throws himself into the water one day that it is raining very hard, not to avoid the rain, as his wicked brothers say, but to avoid his brothers, who are laughing at him. For some time, he struggles in the water and tries to swim; then he lets himself go; and as soon as he lets himself go, he floats; then he feels himself becoming tiny, light, odd, vegetable; leaves sprout out of him all over his body; and soon Gribouille turns into a slender, graceful sprig of oak, which the water gently deposits on the bank of the stream. Absurd! But that is my very reason for telling it; I say what is true and not what I think may redound to my credit. No doubt "the grandmother of Nohant" had not the slightest intention of writing anything demoralising; but I bear witness that no schoolboy was ever troubled by any page of Aphrodite so much as I – ignorant little boy that I was – by the metamorphosis of Gribouille. [pp. 50–1]

Before returning to this passage, whose importance we must not overlook, I will add the second example that Gide gives us of a fantasy that gave rise to his earliest jouissances:

> There was also a stupid little play of Madame de Ségur's called Les Dîners de Mademoiselle Justine. There is a passage in it where the servants take advantage of their masters' absence to have a bout of gormandising; they ransack the cupboards; they gorge themselves with food; then suddenly, as Justine is stooping to lift a pile of plates out of the cupboard, the coachman > steals up behind her and puts his arm around her waist; Justine is ticklish and drops the pile. Crash! The whole of the crockery is smashed to pieces. This disaster made me swoon with delight. [p. 51]

Could we need anything further to realize in what respect this second fantasy illustrates something that is altogether primordial, which we must articulate in the relationship between the subject and the cut? In such subjects, it is very common that one of the fun-548 damental fantasies of their first masturbatory experiences is also a fantasy involving a verbal revelation. I might mention, for example, a subject whose fantasy revolved around an actual sexual initiation.

In the first of Gide's fantasies, the relationship that is revealed of the subject to something detached, which progressively blossoms, presents us with the realm of the subject's identification with the phallus, inasmuch as the phallus emerges from his fantasizing about an object inside his mother. This is a structure that is commonly encountered and demonstrated by a hundred different psychoanalytic case studies, such that no analyst could refuse to recognize it. But it is not enough to see that an identification, representing one of the subject's first erotic experiences, is caught up in the fantasy and propped up by it. We must figure out what sort of identification we are talking about here.

In the neurotic's metonymy, the subject is, as I have said, the phallus – ultimately, in other words, at a point he can only reach in the receding perspective of his symptoms – only insofar as he does not have it. This is what must not be revealed. The upshot is that as the analysis proceeds, his castration anxiety grows.

In perversion, on the other hand, there is something that we might call a reversal of the proof process. What must be proven by the neurotic – namely, the continued existence of his desire – becomes the basis of the proof in perversion. The latter in some sense restores to its place of honor what is known in analysis as a reductio ad absurdum.

For the pervert, in effect, a conjunction is made that unites "he is it" and "he has it" into a single term. For this it is enough that there be a slight opening that allows for a very specific identification with the Other – namely, that "he has it" be in this case "she has it." This "she" is the object with whom he first identified. He will have the phallus – whether this object has transformed into a fetish, in one case, or into an idol, in the other. We have here the wide range of forms taken by homosexual love, from the fetishistic form to the idolatrous form illustrated by Gide.

A bond is established, if I may put it thus, in the natural medium

[or: prop, support]. Perversion presents itself as a sort of natural simulation of the cut. It is here that Gillespie's intuition serves us as a sort of index. What the subject does not have, he has through [or: 549 in, dans] the object. What the subject is not, his ideal object is. In short, a certain natural relationship is taken up as material for the subjective split which, in perversion as in neurosis, must be symbolized. The subject is the phallus qua object within the mother, and he has it in [or: possesses it via] the object of his desire.

This is more or less what we see in male homosexuals. What about female homosexuals? Recall the case of the so-called young homosexual woman, which we analyzed here in comparing it to the case of Dora. What happens at the turning point at which Freud's young patient runs headlong toward homosexual idealization? She is clearly the phallus, but in what respect?

What is at stake there is also the phallus as an object within the mother. This can be seen very clearly when, at the climax of the crisis, she throws herself over the guardrail onto the railroad tracks below. Freud sees an identification with this maternal attribute in this niederkommen [to deliver or give birth]. In falling like an object, she makes herself into the phallus. Her suicide attempt constitutes a supreme effort to give the phallus to her idol. More precisely, by giving what she does not have – namely, the phallus that is the object of her adoration – to the odd character who is the object of her homosexual love, she raises this person to new heights of idealization.

I am proposing this as a structure. You will find it in every case, if you take the trouble to study it – not only in perversion in general, but especially in homosexuality.

It is of course relevant to object that this form is extremely polymorphous, all the more so in that the ordinary use of the term "homosexuality" leads us to subsume under it I don't know how many varied forms that experience presents us with. It is certainly legitimate to include all sorts of peripheral, intermediary forms between perversion and psychosis, let us say, such as drug addiction or other forms in our nosographic field. But wouldn't it be of interest, after all, to situate something that could constitute the crux of homosexuality in terms of perversion?

Let us take our bearings, for example, from what I tried to formulate last time as the point on which the neurotic's desire for desire is based. I said that it is thanks to the relationship between the ego and the image of the other that a whole game of substitutions can be established in which the neurotic never has to put what is at stake 550 – namely, that he is the phallus, that is, clearly $\Phi\Diamond i(a)$ – to the test. Well, in homosexuality I will say that what we are dealing with is the relationship between the primal, symbolic identification, I, and narcissistic, specular identification, i(a).

In homosexuals, there is already a schism in the subject that is traced out between I – his first identificatory, symbolic accession to the primordial relationship with his mother – and his first Verwerfungen [foreclosures]. This is connected to the subject's second identification, his imaginary identification with his specular form, i(a). And this is what the subject uses to symbolize the term in which he inscribes himself insofar as he intervenes in the fantasized relationship, the term that, following Gillespie, I call "split."

In neurotics, the Other's desire frightens the subject, the subject feeling that he is the one who runs all the risks. In homosexuals, on the other hand, the Other's desire finds its symbol, having emerged from the mother, in the phallus, which is the essential signifying element here, the center around which the whole of the pervert's construction gets organized. Which means that, in his case, the Other's desire is what is the farthest removed and hardest to access. This is what makes for the depth and difficulty of the analyses of childhood experience that have allowed us to proffer constructions and speculations related especially to the subject's earliest object identifications.

Had Gide offered himself up at his own expense to psychoanalytic exploration, nothing says that it could have been taken far enough. In any case, he did not do so. His analysis occurred only in a so-called sublimated dimension. But, as superficial as it was, it nevertheless gives us strange hints about his relationship to the object. There is one in particular with which I will close today.

It concerns something that appears to be a little behavioral quirk. To the best of my knowledge, no one has given it much consideration, whereas its symptomatic accent is almost a dead giveaway as to what is at issue – namely, what lies beyond the mother figure, or, more precisely, her inside, her very heart. For what lies at the heart of the earliest identification is found anew at the foundation of the perverse subject's very structure.

Desire is on the horizon of all of the neurotic's demands, which are deployed at length and are literally interminable. By way of contrast, desire "is at the heart" of all of the pervert's demands and, in reading that desire as it unfolds, it indisputably appears tied to 551 aesthetic requirements. But what is most striking is the modulation of the successive themes around which it unfolds.

How can we fail to feel transported to the furthest reaches of fragmenting experience when – right from the first lines of the volume [If It Die . . .], and on the first six or seven pages – Gide's fragmented, kaleidoscopic vision appears? But there is more. At a certain moment, Gide has a certain perception that he articulates in the notion that, no doubt, "there is reality and there are dreams," but "there is another reality as well" [p. 20]. Further on, he recounts the so-called story of the knot in a wooden door. This is what I would like to get at. It is the tiniest of hints, but for us, as everyone knows, these are the most important ones.

In a wooden door somewhere in the town of Uzès, there is a hole because a knot was removed from it. And the young Gide is told that at the bottom of the hole is a little marble that his father slipped in there when he was Gide's age. Gide then tells us, to the admiration of those interested in character, that he spent the whole of the next year letting the nail on his pinky grow so it would be long enough to extract the little marble from the hole in the wood.

When he managed to do so, he found that he had in hand nothing more than a grayish object that he would be ashamed to show anyone [pp. 46–7]. This led him to put it back in its place, cut his fingernail, and not talk about it to anyone – except to us, posterity, who have immortalized this story.

It would, I think, be difficult to find a better introduction to the notion of the object, an object that is, in the final analysis, rejected through a magnificent Sublimierung [sublimation]. It is clearly the form in which the perverse subject's relationship to the internal object presents itself. For the object that he tracks down with perseverance is an object at the heart of the Other.

The imaginary dimension of the Other's desire – his mother's desire in this case – which is primordial in nature, plays the central, decisive, symbolizing role here; this allows us to postulate that at the level of desire, the pervert identifies with the imaginary form of the phallus.

It is on this topic that next week I will give the last class of the year.

June 24, 1959

CONCLUSION AND OVERTURE

XXVII

TOWARD SUBLIMATION

Critique of so-called reality
Defending the dimension of desire
The inexorability of the real Reducing drives to signifiers Perversion's value as a protest

We have now arrived at the end of a year that I have devoted, at my risk as much as yours, to desire and its interpretation.

The question that preoccupied me, and that I have continued to work on without deviating from it, was, as you may have noticed, that of the place of desire in the economy of psychoanalytic experience. I believe, in fact, that the specific interpretation of any desire must begin from there.

It has not been easy to pinpoint the place of desire. Today, by way of conclusion, I would simply like to mention the cardinal points that can help us situate the function of desire, such as I have spelled it out this year, in a way that I hope conveyed its importance to you.

1

At the point in analytic history at which we find ourselves, and which began already about twenty years ago, the case studies that people enjoy publishing concern cases that, compared to the typical neuroses found in the older psychoanalytic literature, involve "neurotic character" [caractères névrotiques] – that is, cases that are situated at the very edge of neurosis.

We find this constantly, and it can be seen in almost any modern psychoanalytic text you care to open.

I read a number of them recently, in order to be up to speed, and the question I would raise concerns how the subjects we meet with in analysis are broached. Where is psychoanalytic thinking at concern-556 ing what constitutes the crux of the progress implied by experience? Well, in short, one might say that with a surprising consistency, and almost regardless of which school an analyst gets his watchwords from, psychoanalysis is currently dominated by object relations. Everything is converging on object relations.

Among the organizing poles of psychoanalytic thought that structure research today, object relations is most closely connected to Melanie Klein's work. It is true that the inclusion of her notions in such articles seems symptomatic, rather than reflecting the circulation of a theory that has been particularly well thought out. Nevertheless, none of the other contemporary poles of psychoanalytic thought has strayed far from this one, object relations having come to dominate our entire conception of analytic progress.

If this observation is not the least striking of those we could make here, the following is more striking still. When one concretely follows the unfolding of a case study written in order to illustrate any structure whatsoever in our nosological field, one realizes that the analysis seems to be carried out, for at least a certain period of time, along lines that one might well qualify as those of moralizing normalization.

I am not saying that analysts' interventions go directly in this direction – that depends on the case – but this perspective gives analysts their bearings. This can be seen in the very way in which analysts articulate the particularities of a subject's position with respect to those around him, with respect to the object he deals with. The subject is always situated with respect to a supposedly normal way of approaching other people, and it is in comparison with this normal way that analysts gauge the deficiencies of their patients' apprehension of the object. Analysts' minds dwell essentially on deterioration in the dimension of the other, an other who is always mapped as being forever neglected, forgotten, ousted from his position as an independent, autonomous subject, and stripped of his status as a pure, absolute other. And that's it. In every case, analysts' attention is entirely focused on the patient's ability (or lack thereof) to appreciate other people in all their depth and autonomy.

What is most striking is not so much this mapping, with all the cultural presuppositions it entails, for it is no worse than any other, after all. It is the implicit rallying of analysts to what one might call 557 a system of values, which, although it is implicit, is nevertheless present.

At the beginning of an analysis, we see the analyst talk at length with the subject about the inadequacies of his affective apprehension of other people. Next we see some sort of turning point in the concrete analysis, unless it simply reflects haste on the analyst's part to summarize what seems to him to be the final key to the analysis. In any case, we generally see the essentially moralizing discussion of the case suddenly slip into the background, and note that the final explanation of the patient's problems involves a series of extremely early identifications, which, regardless of what they are called, are always more or less directly linked to the notion of good and bad objects, internalized or interjected objects, or externalized,* projected objects.

To have recourse to such early identifications always betrays a certain Kleinian penchant on the analyst's part. It sometimes happens that this penchant is masked by the highlighting of the sources of the patient's fixations, which are designated using older terms, borrowed from drive theory – people say, for example, that in such and such a case, oral sadism profoundly impacted the Oedipal relationship. But in order to explain this particularity of the Oedipal drama, analysts always end up referring to something in the realm of early identifications. The entire development of the subjective drama of a neurosis is, after all is said and done, attributed to those identifications, as is the entire development of a perversion.

Now these identifications leave the very notion of subjectivity extremely ambiguous. In such accounts, the subject essentially appears to be an identification with something that he may consider to derive more or less from himself. Therapeutic progress is presented as entailing a rearrangement of these identifications in the course of an experience that appeals to reality as its guiding principle.

Things thus take on an extremely random appearance, because in the final analysis, the reality referred to is nothing more than a reality, the reality presumed to exist by the analyst. This reality implies – in a form that is still more implicit this time, still more masked, and which can be altogether scabrous – an ideal of normality [normativité] that turns the analyst's ideals into the final standard that the patient, in concluding, in an identificatory conclusion, is 558 encouraged to rally around: "I am, in the end, what I recognize to be good in myself. I aspire to conform to an ideal of normality which, although hidden and implicit, is nevertheless the one I recognize, after so many detours, as having been designated for me." The analysis proceeds here by what is tantamount to a subtle set of suggestions; they may be more subtle than other suggestions, but in the end they are still suggestions.

The form of practice that has become organized in this way, through a sort of progressive departure from Freud's recommendations, masks ever more completely the essential question that lies at its heart, and without which there cannot be, I believe, any accurate assessment of psychoanalytic action – namely, the question of the place of desire. My theorization of desire is designed to foreground – in a way that is not ambiguous, but truly crucial – the notion that what we are dealing with is a subjectivity.

Is desire [the same thing as] subjectivity? This question did not have to await the arrival on the historical stage of psychoanalysis to be raised. It has always been there, since the origin of what one might call "ethical practice." Desire is both subjectivity – it is what is at the very heart of our subjectivity, what is most essentially subjective – and at the same time its opposite, for it opposes subjectivity like a resistance, a paradox, or a rejected, refutable nucleus.

It is on this basis, as I have said several times, that ethics developed in a tradition at the end of which we find Spinoza's enigmatic formulation: "desire, cupiditas, is the very essence of man." This formulation is enigmatic inasmuch as it leaves a question unanswered: is what we desire the same as what is desirable?

Even in psychoanalysis, we observe a distance between what is desired and what is desirable. Psychoanalytic practice has been established and formulated on this very basis. Desire is not simply exiled, or pushed away when it comes to action and to the crux of our servitude, as it had been prior to analysis. It is questioned as being the key or the mainspring in us of a whole series of actions and behaviors that are understood to represent what is most profoundly 559 true about us. This is the ideal aim from which analytic practice constantly tends to deviate.

Does this mean that the desire in question is a pure and simple vital impulse, as people thought for a long time? Not at all, since, as soon as we spell out our practice, we find that the more we examine this desire, the less it resembles a pure and simple impulse. Rather, it disintegrates, falls apart, and deviates ever more from anything that might be characterized as a harmonious relationship. In the progressive regression involved in psychoanalytic experience, no desire ever fails to present itself as problematic, dispersed, polymorphous, contradictory, and, in short, far from any oriented coaptation.

We need to set our sights on experience involving desire [expérience du désir], which is absolutely original and irreducible. We cannot leave it without exploring it, without producing some theory that gives us a fix on its meaning – whereas, as I have said, everything in the way in which psychoanalytic experience is currently formulated is designed to veil the meaning of desire and to make us turn away from it.

Transference is the only way the pathways toward the object can be cleared in psychoanalysis. But to define transference as an experience of repetition obtained through regression, which itself depends on frustration, is merely to point to the negative, for it leaves aside the fundamental relationship between frustration and demand. It is only my way of formulating things that allows us to see that, if demand regresses in analysis, it is because – presenting itself there as a developed demand – it remains unanswered.

Analysts today profess to answer it themselves, in a roundabout way, in order to guide their patients toward the object. This gives rise to all kinds of incredible ideas, including that of the "adjustment of the distance" from the object, which I have already critiqued. Although this notion plays a role in the French context above all, it shows clearly enough, all by itself, what sort of contradictory impasse analysis has gotten into by focusing so narrowly on object relations; for every relationship – regardless of what you may say about it, regardless of what it may be, regardless of the normal state it should supposedly conform to – clearly presumes the maintenance of a certain distance. As a matter of fact, we can recognize in this notion an abbreviated and backwards application of several of my considerations on the mirror stage and the narcissistic relationship; they were part of the theoretical baggage of the authors who brought so-called "analytic action" to the fore at a time when they could not situate its place with more encompassing references. 560

In fact, everything that is organized in such terms – relating psychoanalytic experience to something that is supposedly based, in the end, on reality, and takes this reality as the standard of what must be eliminated in the transferential relationship, correlating this eliminating action with the more or less thought-out notion of "ego distortion" [distorsion du moi] with reference to what supposedly subsists in the ego that might possibly function as an ally in the endeavor to reduce analysis to a specific reality – does no more than restore the separation between doctor and patient on which the entire classical nosography is based.

In and of itself, this does not constitute an objection; but the ineffectiveness of a subjective therapeutics that is in no way distinguished from pre-analytic psychotherapy does. The patient's experience is delivered over here to the omnipotent norm constituted by the physician's judgment. Although the patient is assuredly taken to be a man like oneself [semblable], he is viewed as following the wrong path, with everything that this brings with it as concerns distance and uneliminable misrecognition. The intersubjective structuring that analysis establishes is strictly distinguished from the one that came before, in that, as far from our norms as the patient may be – possibly even verging on psychosis and madness – we assume him to be our fellow man, to whom we are linked by the bonds of kindness [charité] and respect for [those made in] our image.

Such a relationship undoubtedly constituted historical progress in our way of behaving with mental patients. But the decisive step established by psychoanalysis was to consider the patient essentially, owing to his nature, as a speaking subject who, regardless of his position, is caught up – just like we are – in the consequences and risks speech entails.

This perspective suffices to thoroughly change our relations with this passive subject. Indeed, it implies that desire, far from being equatable with the feeling of an obscure and radical pressure [poussée], is situated beyond it.

This drive, call, or pressure is only of interest, exists, is defined, 561 and is theorized by Freud inasmuch as it is caught up in the unusual temporal sequence that we call the signifying chain. This chain has a marked impact on everything we deal with, such as pressure. The signifying chain disconnects pressure from everything that defines it and situates it as life-sustaining, rendering it separable from everything that assures its living consistency. The signifying chain makes it possible – as Freud proposes right from the beginning – for the [drive's] pressure to be separated from its source, object, and tendency [or: (pre)disposition, tendance], as it were. It is even separated from itself, since it is recognizable in an inverted form in the tendency. This pressure is primitively and primordially decomposable and decomposed, and in short, in a state of signifying decomposition.

Desire is not this sequence. It is a mapping of the subject with respect to this sequence, whereby he is reflected in the dimension of the Other's desire.

Let us take an example. Let us consider the earliest form of it that we find in psychoanalytic experience – namely, the child's relationship to a newborn who enters the family constellation.

What people call in this case an "attack" is not an attack, it is a death wish. As unconscious as we assume it to be, it is something that is expressed as follows: "Would that he die!" [Qu'il meure !] And this can only be conceptualized in the register of articulation – in other words, where signifiers exist. The rival semblable is attacked in articulated signifying terms, however primitive we assume them to be, whereas an animal, when he attacks his little semblables, bites them, pushes them, and even shoves them out of the nest in which they are fed. The fact that this early rivalry becomes unconscious [in human beings] is related to the existence of an articulation, as rudimentary as we may assume it to be, whose nature is not essentially different from that of the spoken articulation "Would that he die!"

It is because signifiers are involved here that "Would that he die!" can remain hidden behind "Oh, he's so cute!" or "I love him," which is the later discourse that is superimposed on the earlier one. The desire we deal with is situated in the gap between these two discourses.

We might hypothesize that Melanie Klein's bad object is constituted in this gap. We see now how the rejected drive and the 562 introjected object can converge here in such an ambiguous manner.

But how is their relationship in the gap structured? What form does the imaginary function take on here insofar as it is attached to and reaches the two chains of discourse, the repressed chain and the patent, manifest chain?

In order to know exactly at what level desire is situated, we must now go into this in detail.

2

You may at some point have gotten the impression, or suggested, that my conception of desire here is phallocentric.

It is quite obvious that the phallus plays an essential role in this dialectic. But how can we truly understand its function without the help of the ontological landmarks that I am attempting to introduce?

Let us first see how we can conceptualize Klein's use of the phallus, when she deals with a child's earliest experience.

At a point in time at which a child is caught up in certain developmental difficulties that can, at times, be severe, Klein will immediately interpret the little toy he is holding – with which he touches something else in the course of the play with which the analysis begins – by saying: "That is daddy's penis."

Someone who is not part of her group recounted these experiences to me very faithfully. No one outside her group can fail to be somewhat shocked by the incredibly brutal brazenness of such an interpretation – but still more by the fact that, in the end, it takes. In certain cases the child may resist the interpretation; but if he does, it is assuredly, and Klein does not doubt this, because something is at stake there which must not make us despair that it will not be comprehended later on. And Lord knows that Klein allows herself to repeat her interpretations again and again.

It is clear that the phallic symbol enters into the child's play at this very early stage, as if the subject were merely awaiting it. Klein at times justifies her interpretive use of the phallus by saying that it is simply a nipple that is easier to handle and more convenient, but 563 this is tantamount to begging the question. What justifies such an interpretation in our register can only be expressed in the following terms: in most cases, the child has only the most indirect experience of this object and accepts it only as a signifier. It is as a signifier that the impact of the phallus is justified most clearly.

We are perhaps doomed to never know whether a child, at his age, takes the phallus to be a signifier or an element of reality. But what is clear is that whenever Klein refers to the phallus, it is because, whether she knows it or not, she has no better signifier of desire at her disposal.

If there is something that the phallus qua signifier signifies, it is desire for the Other's desire [désir du désir de l'Autre], and this is why it plays its specific role at the level of the object. Nevertheless, I am far from remaining in the phallocentric position that is attributed to me by those who look only at the outer appearance of what I am in the process of formulating. The true problem lies elsewhere. The true problem is that the object we are dealing with from the outset when it comes to desire is in no wise an object that is predestined to satisfy the instincts, in no wise an object destined to satisfy the subject by serving as his instinctual complement; the object of desire is the signifier of desire for desire [signifiant du désir du désir].

The object of desire – in other words, object a on the graph, if you will – is actually the Other's desire insofar as it comes to the attention [or: knowledge or consciousness, connaissance] – assuming the word has a meaning – of an unconscious subject. Which is to say that the object is in a contradictory position with respect to the unconscious subject; this is indicated by the formulation "consciousness of an unconscious subject." The latter is not at all unthinkable; it remains an open question, which means that, if the object comes to [the attention of] the unconscious subject, it comes there insofar as the object is itself the wish to recognize it, being a signifier of its recognition [reconnaissance]. In short, desire has no other object than the signifier of its recognition.

The character of the object qua object of desire must thus be sought out where human experience shows it to us in its most paradoxical form – that of fetishes, as we commonly call them.

Fetishes are always more or less implicit in everything that gen-564 erally constitutes objects of exchange among people; but they are of course masked there by the regular or regulated nature of these exchanges. People have spoken about commodity fetishism, and it is not simply a homophony, for the two uses of the word "fetish" definitely share a meaning. Nevertheless, when we talk about the object of desire, we must first and foremost emphasize the fact that it is borrowed from signifying material.

"I saw the devil the other night," Paul-Jean Toulet says somewhere, "and when you look under his fur . . ." The poem ends with "The fruits of Science do not all fall, you see!" Well, let this be the case for us here, too, that they do not all fall – so that we will perceive that it is less the hidden fruits than the mirage, or fur, present in desire that counts. A fetish is in fact the fur, edge, fringe, or frill, the thing that hides, and nothing is better designated to serve the function of signifier of the Other's desire.

Let us start again from the child's relationship to the demanding subject [or: the subject to whom he addresses his demands, sujet de la demande]. In this relationship, the child first deals with the mother's desire – in other words, with what the demanding subject truly is apart from demand. Now, the child cannot decipher this desire, if not in the most virtual way, by means of a signifier – a signifier that we analysts, regardless of what we do in our discourse, relate to the phallus as a yardstick [commune mesure], a central point of the signifying game here.

The phallus is nothing other than the signifier of the desire for desire. Desire has no other object than the signifier of its recognition. This is what allows us to no longer be dupes of the exchange that occurs at the level of desire, when we realize that the subject has shifted to the other side of the subject/object relationship – namely, that he has become a. We must conceptualize the fact that in this position, the subject is no longer anything but the signifier of the recognition of desire, no longer anything but the signifier of desire for desire.

Yet it is important to maintain an opposition, that of $ across from a, on the basis of which this exchange occurs. As for the barred subject, he is a subject here who is undoubtedly imaginary, but in the most radical sense, in the sense that he is the pure subject of disconnection or of spoken cuts [de la coupure parlée], insofar as such cuts constitute the essential scansions on which speech is built. This 565 subject is grouped here with a signifier that is nothing other than the signifier of the being with whom the subject is confronted, insofar as this being is himself marked by the signifier. As for little a, the object of desire, it is a residue or remainder by nature – namely, the residue left by the being with whom the speaking subject is confronted, the remainder of any and every possible demand.

It is in this way that the object meets up with the real; it is in this way that the object shares in it. I am saying "the real" here, not "reality," because reality is constituted by all the halters that human symbolism, more or less perspicaciously, throws around the neck of the real insofar as it fabricates the objects of its experience with it. Let us note that what characterizes objects of experience is precisely that they leave aside – as La Palice would say – everything in the object that is not encompassed by this experience.

This is why, as opposed to what people believe, experience, so-called experience, is a double-edged sword. If, for example, you find yourself in a historical predicament, in resolving it your chances of making mistakes, even serious ones, are just as great if you trust to experience as if you neglect it, for the very simple reason that, by definition, trusting to experience involves overlooking what is new in the present situation.

The object at stake, insofar as it meets up with the real, shares in it in the sense that the real here presents itself as what resists demand, as what I will call the inexorable. The object of desire is what is truly inexorable. If it meets up with the real – the real that I discussed when I analyzed the case of Schreber – it is because it is in the form of the real that it best incarnates this inexorability. The form of the real that is called inexorable is found in the fact that the real always returns to the same place.

This is why, curiously enough, we see the prototype of the real in the heavens. How else can we explain man's interest, at the origin of cultural experience, in an object that is truly the least interesting for any purpose that is vital to him – namely, the stars?

If culture and the subject's position in the realm of desire – inasmuch as his desire is established – are fundamentally instituted in this symbolic structure as such, our interest in the stars is explained 566 by the fact that they are what is the most purely real in all of reality.

Their mapping requires a single condition. With respect to what does the shepherd, in his solitude – the first to begin to observe that which has no other interest than the fact that it always returns to the same place – map it if not to that with which he establishes himself as an object – namely, with respect to a kind of slit?

However primitive you may presume them to be, slits are what allow us to map the real when it returns to the same place.

3

This is what we thus arrive at by positing that the object of desire must be fundamentally defined as the signifier of a relationship that is itself a relationship, and that is thus in some sense endlessly reflected.

If desire is desire for the Other's desire, it begins with the enigma of what the Other's desire actually is. The Other's desire is fundamentally articulated and structured in the subject's relation to speech – in other words, in disconnecting from everything that has to do with mere survival.

This desire is the central, pivotal point of the entire economy we deal with in analysis. If we fail to locate its function, we are necessarily led to find our bearings only in what is in fact symbolized by the terms "reality," "existing reality," and "social context." When we stick to that dimension, we are led, it seems, to overlook another dimension, the dimension of desire that Freud especially reintegrated into human experience as something that is absolutely essential.

Here certain facts that I have often relied on take on their value, facts that show what analysts' interventions lead to when they attempt to reduce transferential experiences to the current reality – this oh so simple reality, as people say, as if it were not artifice itself – of the analytic session. We must obviously take up whatever the subject experiences, as naturally as can be – and for good reason, because that is what we expect from him – but we must certainly not 567 reduce it to any immediate reality.

I have often emphasized, in different ways, the common characteristic of phenomena that occur whenever analysts' interventions – in an overly insistent and even brutal manner – aim to prove that one of the patient's typical object relations is being repeated in the reality of the analysis. Whereas myriad case studies attest to the regular occurrence of these phenomena, it does not seem that analysts have always identified them.

Whatever the case may be, I will refer once again to the notorious case study that appeared in the Bulletin des analystes belges which I have already critiqued once, because it strikingly intersects the article in which Glover attempts to situate the function of perversion in relation to the system of the subject's reality.

In the first case study, the female analyst, when her patient tells her about his fantasy of sleeping with her, literally tells him the following: "You are scaring yourself about something that you know will never happen." This speaks volumes about the style of her analytic interventions. I will not discuss the analyst's personal motives that can be glimpsed here. I will confine my attention to what orients her in her actions, inasmuch as she was being supervised by someone whom I already alluded to today when I spoke about the topic of distance [from the object].

Whatever role panic may have played in this comment on the analyst's part, people will try to justify it as an accurate assessment of the said reality – namely, the relationship between objects in each other's presence. It is clear that this relationship is decisive, because right after the analyst makes this comment, something occurs that is the very topic of the paper: the brutal emergence in the subject of shame that has haunted him, that related to being too tall. Moreover, we find here a whole series of themes akin to those of depersonalization, which must not be underestimated.

This patient was probably not very well diagnosed – he is said to have a phobia, whereas the case definitely suggests traces of paranoid illusions. But what is clear is that what occurs is a neo-formation. The explicit topic of the article is, moreover, what the 568 author refers to as the subject's "transitory perversion" – I am not the one who is saying he had one. For he runs, at a certain point, to a geographic place – a movie theater – where things were arranged in such a way that it was easy for him to observe females urinating, there being a slit in the partition wall between cubicles. This had played absolutely no role in his symptomatology prior to that time.

Now, a similar phenomenon is noted on page 494 of the International Journal of Psychoanalysis (XIV, 4 [October 1933]) in Glover's article, "The Relation of Perversion-formation to the Development of Reality-sense." Glover's case is quite similar to the preceding one, in the sense that Glover suggests a diagnosis of paranoia, whereas I would, on the other hand, willingly propose phobia. Interventions on Glover's part – that were undoubtedly similar to those made by the abovementioned analyst – produce an analogous staging of a transitory and occasional perverse explosion. There is no essential difference between the two cases.

This should also be related to an example I emphasized in my paper, "Function and Field of Speech and Language" – namely, Ernst Kris's interpretation of a phobic fear of plagiarizing that a patient of his felt. Kris told him that he was not a plagiarist at all, the patient promptly rushing out of the consulting room and into a restaurant where he asked for a dish of "fresh brains" – to the great joy of his analyst who saw in it a truly significant reaction to his interpretation.

Let us say that this is, in an attenuated form, how the subject's characteristic dimension reacts whenever an analyst's intervention attempts to collapse it, or to compress it into a pure and simple reduction to facts that people refer to as objective, whereas they are merely coherent with the analyst's own biases.

4

If you will be so kind as to allow me to, I will end today with a remark that introduces the place where we analysts must situate ourselves with respect to desire.

This cannot, in fact, work if we do not know how to coherently 569 conceptualize our function with respect to social norms.

If there is a practice that should teach us how problematic social norms are – how much they must be questioned, and how much they are designed to do something other than adapt [people to reality] – it is clearly psychoanalysis.

In our work with the logical subject, a dimension is revealed to us that is always latent, but also always present, in intersubjective relationships. This dimension, which is that of desire, is found in a relation of interaction and exchange with everything that crystallizes on that basis in social structure. If we know how to take this dimension into account, we should arrive at more or less the following conception.

What I designate by the word "culture" – a word I am not very attached to, not at all, when you come right down to it – is a certain history of the subject in relation to logos. This relation to logos was assuredly able to remain masked over the course of time, and in our era it is difficult not to see what sort of gap it represents and at what distance it is situated with respect to a certain social inertia. This is why Freudianism exists in our time.

Some facet of what we call culture passes over into society. We can provisionally define the relationship between culture and society as a relationship of entropy, inasmuch as what passes over from culture into society always includes a disintegrating function.

What presents itself in society as culture – and which has thus entered, in various guises, into a certain number of stable conditions, which are also latent, that determine the circuits of exchanges within the flock – establishes a movement or dialectic in society that leaves open there the same gap as the one in which we situate the function of desire. It is in this sense that we can posit that the perversion that is produced reflects, at the level of the logical subject, a protest against what the subject undergoes at the level of identification, insofar as identification is the relationship that establishes and organizes the norms of social stabilization of the different functions.

Here we cannot fail to see what relates any structure that is similar to perversion to what Freud enunciates in his article "Neurosis and Psychosis" in the following terms: "It will be possible for the ego to avoid a rupture in any direction by deforming itself, by submitting to encroachments on its own unity and even perhaps by effecting a cleavage or division of itself" [SE XIX, pp. 152–3]. Here Freud provides one of those insights that always make his texts especially illuminating, compared to the more ordinary analytic literature we generally read. "In this way the inconsistencies, eccentricities and follies of men (Inkonsequenzen, Verschrobenheiten und Narrheiten der Menschen) would appear in a similar light to their sexual perversions, through the acceptance of which they spare themselves repressions" [p. 153]. 570 presents itself in our social context as paradoxes, inconsistencies, confusional states, and madness. Narr means "court jester" in the fabric of the most common and ordinary social life.

Freud is targeting here, in the clearest fashion possible, what

We could say, in short, that something like a circuit is established that alternates between, on the one hand, the conformism, or socially conformist forms, of so-called cultural activity – the term "cultural" truly outdoes itself here, defining everything about culture that is capitalized on and becomes alienated in society – and perversion, on the other hand, inasmuch as perversion represents, at the level of the logical subject, and through a series of gradations, a protest that, with regard to conforming, arises in the dimension of desire, insofar as desire is the subject's relation to his being.

Here we encounter "sublimation," a notorious notion that we will perhaps begin to discuss next year. In truth, nothing better justifies what I am in the process of endeavoring to propose than Freud's notion of sublimation.

What exactly is sublimation? What can it be, if we define it, as Freud does, as "a sexual activity insofar as it is desexualized"? How can we even conceptualize such a thing, when what is involved no longer includes a source, a direction of the tendency, or an object, involving instead the very nature of what is called, in this case, the energy invested.

In order to grasp to what degree this notion is problematic, I think it suffices to read an article by Glover in the International Journal of Psychoanalysis in which he broaches the topic of sublimation, with 571 the critical concerns that are uniquely his. This notion remains problematic, unless we define it as the very form into which desire flows. What Freud in fact indicates is that this form can be emptied of the sexual drive; or, more precisely stated, that the drive, far from being equatable with the substance of sexual relations, is this very form. Put differently, the drive can ultimately be reduced to the pure play of the signifier. Which is how we can define sublimation as well.

Sublimation, as I wrote somewhere, is that by which desire and the letter can be equated. Here – at a point as paradoxical as perversion is, perversion being understood in its most general form as what in human beings resists all normalization – we can see a discourse being produced, a process apparently starting from nothing [élaboration à vide] that we call sublimation, and which is, in both its nature and its products, distinct from the social value it will later be granted. The difficulties we find in attaching the notion of social value to the term "sublimation" are especially well brought out in the article by Glover that I mentioned.

Sublimation is thus truly placed at the level of the logical subject, where everything that is, strictly speaking, creative work in the realm of logos is established and unfolds. On that basis, cultural activities – with all the impacts and risks they involve, up to and including the revamping of formally established conformisms and even their explosion – come more or less to be inserted into society, finding their place at the social level.

To situate at its proper and organizing level what is at stake in desire, we could, at least provisionally, point to the closed circuit constituted by the four terms on the graph: d, ($◊a), S(Ⱥ), and ($◊D).

The problem we arrive at here is the same one I left you with last year in the paper I gave at the Royaumont Congress, "Direction of the Treatment."

The subject's desire, qua desire for desire, opens out onto the cut or pure being, manifested in Ⱥ in the form of lack. In the end, what desire does the subject confront in analysis if it is not the analyst's desire? It is precisely for this reason that it is so necessary that we 572 remain mindful of this dimension regarding the function of desire.

Psychoanalysis is not a simple reconstruction of the past, nor is it a reduction to pre-established norms; analysis is neither an epos nor an ethos. If I had to compare it to something, it would be to a narrative that would itself be the locus of the encounter at stake in the narrative.

The problem of analysis resides in the paradoxical situation in which we find the Other's desire that the subject must encounter – that is, our desire, which is only too present in what the subject assumes we are asking from him. Indeed, the Other's desire, which for us is the subject's desire, must not be guided toward our desire but toward an other. We help ripen the subject's desire for someone other than ourselves. We find ourselves in the paradoxical position of being desire's matchmakers, or its midwives – those who preside over its advent.

How can we occupy such a position? It can only be occupied by maintaining an artifice which is that of the whole of the fundamental rule of psychoanalysis. But what is the final mainspring of this artifice? As always, it is both the most trivial and yet the most hidden truth.

Psychoanalysis is undoubtedly a situation in which the analyst agrees to let all demands be addressed to him without responding to any of them. But is the mainspring of our presence found solely in the fact that we do not respond (it being clear that our not responding is far from absolute)? Must we not leave room for an element that is immanent in the situation and recurs at the end of each session? I mean the empty space [vide] to which our desire must be confined, the place that we leave for desire so that it can situate itself there – in short, the cut.

The cut is undoubtedly the most effective mode of psychoanalytic interpretation. Many analysts would like to make it mechanical and subject it to a preordained length of time. Well, I not only cut sessions altogether differently, but I add that it is one of the most effective methods of intervening. Let us emphasize this and develop it.

That said, let us not forget the presence, in this cut, of what we have learned to identify as the phallic object, which is latent in every relationship involving demand as the signifier of desire.

573 In closing today, and to remind you of something that will be a sort of pre-announcement of what I will talk about in class next year, I would like to conclude with a sentence that I will propose to you as an enigma. We shall see if you are any better at deciphering spoonerisms than the myriad visitors I have tested.

In a journal entitled Phantômas that came out in Brussels around 1953–4, the poet Désiré Viardot proposed a little hermetic enigma, and we shall see if someone in the audience can immediately find the key: "Women have a mark of fancy on their skin" [La femme a dans la peau un grain de fantaisie].

This mark [or: touch] of fancy is assuredly what is at stake, in the final analysis, in what modulates and models the relations of the subject on the person to whom he addresses his demands, whoever that may be. And it undoubtedly plays a role in the fact that we discovered the horizon of the subject who contains everything in the form of the universal Mother.

This is what makes it such that we can at times be mistaken about the subject's relation to the All, believing that it will be delivered up to us by analytic archetypes, whereas it is something else altogether that is involved – namely, the gap that opens out onto something radically new that is introduced by any and every cut based on speech.

Here it is not from women alone that we must wish for this touch of fancy – or this "touch of poetry" [grain de poésie] – it is from psychoanalysis itself.

July 1, 1959

APPENDIX

MARGINALIA ON THE SEMINAR ON DESIRE

575

Some useful references, along with associations that came to mind by Jacques-Alain Miller.

I Constructing the Graph

4. Fairbairn
Nowadays, when you come across a name like Fairbairn that you do not know, you look it up on Wikipedia and you find a solid article which, even to someone like me who knew him, is informative. There is a photo of him in uniform, but my impression is that it must be of someone who has the same name as him, the Lieut. Col. William E. Fairbairn [the photo has since been taken down]. In this case, I will simply provide the Wikipedia article [Miller provides the article found at https://fr.wikipedia.org/wiki/William_Ronald_Dodds_Fairbairn; the English-language Wikipedia site is far more extensive.]

After the entry, references are provided. His Psychoanalytic Studies of the Personality was published in 1952 by Tavistock and republished in paperback* in 1994 (under the Routledge imprint in the United States and Canada). 576

6. Roses and lilies [Les roses et les lys]
Do a Google search for these words and you find a Wikipedia article about a song written in honor of Henry IV. The song is entitled Vive Henri IV! and is said to have been "long popular in France." In the second stanza, added in 1770, one finds the following simplistic verses:

Comme nos pères
Chantons en vrais amis

Au choc des verres
Les roses et les lys.

[Let us sing – as true friends, just like our fathers did, clinking our glasses – to roses and lilies.]

What sorts of examples can we find of what Lacan calls "figurative poetry"? The simplest are the Blasons du corps féminin.

6. John Donne

Your turn to look up Donne. I could write at length about the man and his work. At Janson-de-Silly high school, I had an excellent English teacher by the name of Kerst, who wrote some fine textbooks. He had no compunction about making us read, translate, and comment on a poem by Donne entitled The Flea, one of the funniest and most erotic poems I have ever read. That gave me a taste for Donne and he remains my favorite English poet. When I met Lacan, I was happy that he knew and liked Donne's work. The fact that Lacan's theory accounts for what I had always experienced – namely, the strong libidinal content of signifying subtleties – played an important role in rallying me to his ideas. I very much admired Jean Fuzier's translation of Donne's poems into French.

577 6. The physical theory of love as opposed to the ecstatic theory of love

Here Lacan follows the work of Pierre Rousselot, Pour l'Histoire du problème de l'amour au Moyen Age [The Problem of Love in the Middle Ages: A Historical Contribution (Milwaukee WI: Marquette University Press, 2002)], Rousselot having invented this distinction. Those who believe in the physical – that is, natural – conception of love base love on "the natural propensity beings have to seek their own good." Those who believe in the ecstatic conception of love juxtapose love for others with selfish inclinations; to their way of thinking, the more love places the subject "outside of himself," the more closely it corresponds to its concept.

Rousselot was a Jesuit and was Henri de Lubac's teacher. I heard about Rousselot's work through Lacan, but I already knew Lubac from his Drame de l'humanisme athée ["Drama (or Tragedy) of Atheistic Humanism"]. François Regnault had me read his treatise on the four meanings of the Scriptures, and gave me Lubac's La Postérité spirituelle de Joachim de Fiore [Paris: Editions du Cerf, 2014 (1979–81)] for my birthday. Such admirable scholars! The tragedy of my own atheistic humanism is that I do not appeal to Jesuits. They flocked to Lacan but have deserted me, holding me responsible for Lacan's drift toward logic. Gentlemen, this is a false and absurd notion, rotten to the core, but as André Maurois, who is quoted in the Robert dictionary under the heading faux [false], once said, "nothing is more difficult to refute than what is completely false."

7–8. Aristotle on brutishness [or: beastiality]; Spinoza and desire; Lalande's Vocabulaire technique et critique de la philosophie [a dictionary]
Look them up yourselves! "Charming Lalande" suggests that Lacan knew him. I know nothing about it. And in my day, people did not read his dictionary.

9. Rauh and Revault d'Allonnes
Check them out yourself.

11. The stimulus-response cycle
People spent a lot of time thinking about this back then. Someone could write a book on its history, and perhaps has already done so. There is, in any case, a well-known book by Canguilhem, La Formation du concept de reflexe aux XVII^e^ et XVIII^e^ siècles (Paris: 578 PUF, 1955; it was republished by Vrin in Paris in 1994). Regarding the reflex arc in Lacan's work, one should at least be familiar with (1) Der Aufbau des Organismus, by Kurt Goldstein [The Hague: Martinus Nijhoff, 1934; The Organism: A Holistic Approach to Biology Derived from Pathological Data in Man (New York: Zone Books, 1995)], and (2) Merleau-Ponty's second thesis, The Structure of Behavior, which was first published by PUF in 1942 [Boston: Beacon Press, 1963]. Lacan never stopped reformulating his notions about this.

11. Three is the minimum number of terms
Lacan is thinking of the schema found in The Meaning of Meaning, by I. A. Richards and C. K. Ogden (New York: Harcourt, Brace, 1945 [1923]).

12. The graph
In Lacan's earlier work, see Seminar V where Lacan introduces the first stage of the graph; in his later work, see the article in which he finalizes his conception four years later: "The Subversion of the Subject and the Dialectic of Desire in the Freudian Unconscious," Écrits, pp. 671–702. As Lacan himself indicates, this article, which summarized the remarks he made in 1960 at the famous colloquium in Royaumont which was in theory designed to make his ideas known outside of the circle of his students, was not published as planned, and was not made known to the public or to myself until 1966 with the publication of Écrits.

15. Jacques Cazotte's The Devil in Love
The Wikipedia.fr article on Cazotte, who died by the guillotine, is excellent. Nevertheless, it fails to mention the following: the very fine text by Nerval on Cazotte in Les Illuminés, which one must read; the preface by Nodier on Cazotte in his edition of the Contes [Tales]; Breton's preface to the 1954 edition of Melmoth ou l'Homme errant (published by Pauvert); Bastien's 1816–17 edition of the Oeuvres badines et morals, historiques et philosophiques, which was the first complete edition of the work with the exception of two brochures written on the occasion of the Querelle des Bouffons. I was familiar with Cazotte's work, and had read The Devil in Love, before meeting 579 Lacan, through Nerval, Nodier, and Breton, and through a book that became very well known by Max Milner, Le Diable dans la littérature française, de Cazotte à Baudelaire, 1772–1861, which I purchased at Corti's bookshop which I would stop by at after school at Louis-le-Grand. A textbook published by Hatier in 1984 continued the study from Cazotte to Gracq. Pierre Castex, in his Anthologie du conte fantastique français (Paris: Corti, 1963), considers Cazotte to be "the true inventor of modern fantastical literature." Borges wrote a preface for the edition of The Devil in Love that came out in La Bibliothèque de Babel; it is intelligently discussed by Ricardo Romero Rozas in Jorge Luis Borges et la littérature française (Paris: L'Harmattan, 2011), which I have in the form of an e-book. Many different editions of The Devil in Love are available today.

16. The "bar"
See Écrits, pp. 414–17.

17. Hilflosigkeit
On this topic, see Freud's Inhibitions, Symptoms, and Anxiety, and Lacan's Seminar X.

18. Urbild
This term is repeatedly found in Lacan's earliest texts and Seminars devoted to the imaginary in its relations with the symbolic. The same is true of references to mirror schemas.

19. Man thinks with his soul
This is one of Lacan's favorite sentences. We find this use of the word "with" in the title of "Kant with Sade." By highlighting the instrumental nature of the soul, Lacan is fully aligned with Aristotle's De anima [On the Soul]. According to Aristotle, the soul is analogous to the hand (432a1).

20. Darwin 580

Lacan is mistaken in thinking that he read this anecdote in Darwin's book, The Expression of the Emotions in Man and Animals. It is found in The Life and Letters of Charles Darwin, Including an Autobiographical Chapter, which was edited by his son, Francis Darwin (London: John Murray, 1887); here is the relevant passage from volume 1, page 75:

> Of other great literary men, I once met Sydney Smith at Dean Milman's house. There was something inexplicably amusing in every word which he uttered. Perhaps this was partly due to the expectation of being amused. He was talking about Lady Cork, who was then extremely old. This was the lady who, as he said, was once so much affected by one of his charity sermons, that she borrowed a guinea from a friend to put in the plate. He now said "It is generally believed that my dear old friend Lady Cork has been overlooked," and he said this in such a manner that no one could for a moment doubt that he meant that his dear old friend had been overlooked by the devil. How he managed to express this I know not.

Who was Sydney Smith? "An English wit, writer and Anglican cleric," according to Wikipedia.org, which provides a fine article on him. We learn there that he may have been the model for Henry Tilney, the hero of Northanger Abbey, which is perhaps Jane Austen's most beautiful novel.

22. Volpone

This is a reference to the play by Ben Jonson, Volpone, or the Fox, a fox hated by Christine Angot who only liked hedgehogs.

The entire text has been made available online by Project Gutenberg, and includes the following introduction:

> The greatest of English dramatists except Shakespeare, the first literary dictator and poet-laureate, a writer of verse, prose, satire, and criticism who most potently of all the men of his time affected the subsequent course of English letters: such was Ben Jonson.

I first discovered the play through the film by Maurice Tourneur made in 1941, starring Harry Baur (as Volpone), Louis Jouvet, and Charles Dullin. I liked the film because the minor role of Voltore was played by Jean Témerson, the younger brother of Louis 581 Témerson (known as Bébé), who was a neighbor of mine and had been wounded in the First World War; he and his wife Juliette (often called Yéyette) would look after my brother and me when my parents went out. Bébé's wisdom had a profound influence on me. He was a serious marcheur [womanizer], as people put it at the time, and he strongly advised me not to defer experiencing the pleasures the opposite sex could offer me. It is to him that I owe having understood already at ten years of age the meaning of the expression, rarely used today, "half-virgin" [demi-vierge]. The Témersons were Jewish, and acting in a film in 1941 must have been rather complicated for them. When I read the stenography of this Seminar for the first time, I was enchanted to see that Lacan knew the play.

The article provided by Wikipedia.org is solid. I would like to have read everything listed under the heading "further readings," but the truth is that I have read none of the works included there.

23. The absolute master
This is an allusion to Hegel's master/slave dialectic.

23. "The tribe's words"
This is a reference to Mallarmé's verse "donner un sens plus pur aux mots de la tribu," found in Le Tombeau d'Edgar Poe. [In English, see "The Tomb of Edgar Poe," translated by Peter Manson (Miami, FL: Miami University Press, 2013):

> They, like an upstart hydra hearing the angel once > purify the meaning of tribal words > proclaimed out loud the prophecy drunk > without honour in the tide of some black mixture.]

24. Ear, skin, even the phallus
The pointy leaves of red Romaine lettuce are known in France as oreilles du diable, "devil's ears." The sea, when it is whipped up by a choppy swell, is described as la peau du diable, "the devil's skin." The devil's tail [or: dick, queue] figures in the French expression, tirer le diable par la queue [literally, to pull the devil by the tail; figuratively, to live from hand to mouth].

II Further Explanation

Here and there in the chapter: Glover, Sartre, Judge Schreber, Abelard and Heloise, and Freud
I'll let you look them up yourselves.

III The Dream about the Dead Father

582

50. Marjorie Brierley
Brierley was a Kleinian analyst (1893–1984) whose contributions were collected in Trends in Psycho-Analysis (London: Hogarth, 1951). Her article "Affects in Theory and Practice" [IJP 18 (1937): 256–68] had a significant impact.

55. Believe we believe, as Prévert puts it
A reference to Jacques Prévert's famous "Tentative de déscription d'un dîner de têtes à Paris-France" (in Paroles [Paris: Gallimard, 1949], p. 7).

56. Psychologists from what is known as the Marburg School; Brentano Brentano is a crossroads where Freud, Husserl, and Heidegger all meet up. Freud was especially interested in his Psychologie vom empirischen Standpunkt (Leipzig: Duncker & Humblot, 1874) [Psychology from an Empirical Standpoint (London and New York: Routledge, 1973)], from which Husserl drew the notion of intentionality, and Heidegger was especially interested in his book on Aristotle, Von der mannigfachen Bedeutung des Seienden nach Aristoteles [Hildesheim, Zurich, and New York: Georg Olms, 1984 (1862); On the Several Senses of Being in Aristotle (Berkeley, CA: University of California Press, 1975)]. Freud and Husserl both came from Moravia. Judith and I made a pilgrimage to Prague when Czechoslovakia still existed. We visited the Spielberg in memory of Fabrice del Dongo; Freiberg (Pfibor) in memory of Freud; Prostejov in memory of Husserl; and the Kromeriz Castle to contemplate Titian's The Flaying of Marsyas for a full hour. Ernst Mach was also born in Moravia, as was Gödel, not to mention Mendel, Mucha, Schumpeter, Zatopeck, or Alfred Brendel. Or Janacek or Kundera. It is a place where the Spirit has passed.

The Austro-Hungarian Empire was a prison for certain peoples, but it also allowed kids born in the boonies like Freud and Husserl to have fine careers, one in Vienna, and the other in Germany.

Lacan was fond of empires, and at the age of twenty he thought of moving to the French colonies, partly in order to spread Charles Maurras's ideas.

Brentano was the nephew of Bettina von Arnim, a strange bird. Wikipedia has a suggestive article on her.

583

IV Little Anna's Dream

71. Binet

This example has become famous since the publication of Seminar XI, The Four Fundamental Concepts of Psychoanalysis, in which Lacan referred to it. It comes from Alfred Binet and Théodore Simon, La Mesure de développement de l'intelligence chez les jeunes enfants (1905), in the chapter entitled "critique of absurd sentences," which can now be found in the form of an e-book published by L'Harmattan. I'd like to publish e-books from now on. I want to, I just don't know how to.

Binet was born Alfredo Binetti and was from Nice. He was Babinski's protégé. "He married the daughter of the embryologist, Édouard-Gérard Balbiani, and began studying natural science at the Sorbonne under his father-in-law's supervision." Isn't that unbelievable! He studied under the supervision of his wife's father! Isn't that against the law? And such a one claims to measure intelligence!

V The Dream about the Dead Father (II)

86. Être une belle fille ["To be a beautiful blonde"]

The poetess in question is Lise Deharme (1898–1980), who was one of Surrealism's muses. André Breton, whom she is said to have "fascinated," turned her into the character Lise Meyer in his novel Nadja. She was a brunette and somber. She established a literary salon in Neuilly and, in 1933, created an ephemeral journal, Le Phare de Neuilly, to which Lacan contributed his well-known sonnet, Hiatus irrationalis. That same year, she brought out a small collection of poetry, Cahier de curieuse personne (Paris: Cahiers Libres, 1933), in which we find the poem entitled Voeux secrets (p. 27). The text of the poem is preceded by an epigraph from Louis Aragon's work: "Des chansons sortaient de la bouche des égouts" [Songs came out of the mouth of sewers (or manholes)], which comes from his poem, Transfiguration de Paris (found in La Grande Gaîté [Paris: Gallimard, 1929]).

VII Desire's Phallic Mediation 584

115. Trotsky's dream
See Trotsky's Diary in Exile, 1935 (Cambridge, MA, and London: Harvard University Press, 1976). Trotsky was better than the Trotskyites, just as Lacan was better than the Lacanians. For Jesus and his followers, that is obvious. Have masters always been better than their disciples? No. Consider, for example, Aristotle and Alexander the Great. Or Raymond Aron and Kissinger. In science, the disciple is there to go further than the master. But a problem arises when the scientific spirit disappears. Yet in science, too, it is something of a knife fight.

123. A recent novel
The novel in question was Histoire d'O, which was overly kitsch. I never liked the story. It's shoddy. It was clear that it was "Made in Gallimard," just as Robbe-Grillet's eroticism was "Made in Minuit." I read it shortly after beginning my studies at l'École normale supérieure. The only funny moment comes right at the beginning, when he asks O to take off her panties in the taxi. Nothing to write home about. Sade's Juliette and Justine are solid gold ingots. No comparison.

VIII The Little Cough as a Message

142. Ella Sharpe
See Ella Freeman Sharpe, Dream Analysis (London: The Hogarth Press and the Institute of Psycho-Analysis, 1937). A new edition came out in 1978 with a preface by Masud Khan.

IX The Fantasy about the Barking Dog 585

166. Darwin
Darwin granted his young disciple George John Romanes access to his notes. The anecdote is recounted in a book written by Romanes, Mental Evolution in Man: Origin of Human Faculty [London: Kegan Paul, Trench & Co., 1888], in Chapter 13 entitled "Roots of Language," p. 283. Psychologists who specialize in language acquisition consider the following passage to be the first observation of the phenomenon that is known today as "overextension":

For instance, the late Mr. Darwin gave me the following particulars with regard to a grandchild of his own, who was then living in his house. I quote the account from notes taken at the time.

"The child, who was just beginning to speak, called a duck 'quack'; and, by special association, it also called water 'quack.' By an appreciation of the resemblance of qualities, it next extended the term 'quack' to denote all birds and insects on the one hand, and all fluid substances on the other. Lastly, by a still more delicate appreciation of resemblance, the child eventually called all coins 'quack,' because on the back of a French sou it had once seen the representation of an eagle. Hence, to the child, the sign 'quack,' from having originally had a very specialized meaning, became more and more extended in its signification, until it now serves to designate such apparently different objects as 'fly,' 'wine,' and 'coin.'"

X The Image of the Inside-Out Glove

178. Limericks

I am inclined to think that the collection Lacan consulted was the one that was, at the time, the most complete: The Limerick: 1700 Examples with Notes, Variants, and Index by Gershon Legman, published in English in Paris by the École des Haute Études in 1953. The author, who was an American persecuted for obscenity by the U.S. Postal Service, was forced to go into exile. He later brought out The New Limerick: 2750 Unpublished Examples, American and 586 British (New York: Crown Publishers, 1977). The article about him on Wikipedia.org depicts him as a rather colorful nonconformist.

Just for the heck of it, I will provide here a few other vaginal limericks:

There was a fat lady of China
Who'd a really enormous vagina,
And when she was dead
They painted it red,
And used it for docking a liner.

There once was a lady from China
Who went for a cruise on a liner
She slipped on the deck
And twisted her neck
And now she can see right behind her.

The was a young lady from Cue Who filled her vagina with glue.
She said with a grin,
"If they pay to get in, They'll pay to get out of it too . . ."

180. Christina, Queen of Sweden
The flattering physician was French: the abbot Bourdelot. I assume that Lacan had read the anecdote in René-Jean Denichou's doctoral dissertation in medicine entitled Un Médecin du Grand Siècle: l'abbé Bourdelot (Paris: Louis Arnette, 1928). Dr. Bertrand Lahutte tried to find the book for me at the Bibliothèque interuniversitaire de santé, but it was not there.

XI Sacrificing the Taboo Queen 587

198. Femina penem devoret
The stenography reads "femina curam et penem devoret," which is obviously erroneous. No matter how I varied the terms or put them together, I was unable to find any corresponding literary or medical expression using Google. Nor was I able to find any enlightenment in [Krafft-Ebing's] Psychopathia Sexualis, in James Noel Adam's Latin Sexual Vocabulary (Baltimore: Johns Hopkins University Press, 1982), or in several other collections of maxims. Nevertheless, Google provided one and only one occurrence of two of the words together: penem devoret. It occurs in a passage of the German edition of the Kamasutra (II, 9, 19) regarding the "mouth congress," auparishtaka, in the ultimate form known as sangara (in Latin, devoratio), in which the partner puts the entire penis in his or her mouth in order to stimulate it to ejaculation.

In any case, longstanding medical tradition has generally preferred to employ Latin when sexual, salacious, and scabrous matters are being discussed. In this case, the formulation chosen by Lacan undoubtedly refers to fellatio, which he figuratively associated with the words "to get my penis" before rejecting this reading. It is possible that we are not dealing here with a true citation, but merely an approximate allusion.

I have opted to provide in the text a reading which, although incomplete, is correct; it signifies that "the woman eats up" or "swallows the penis."

200. Roland Penrose
Lacan may have known him when the two associated with Picasso. Penrose brought surrealism to England and became the main British surrealist artist. The date Lacan provides here suggests that the work in question might have been presented in Paris in 1947 at the famous Surrealist exhibition in Aimé Maeght's gallery. I have never seen a reproduction of it, nor do I know where it is today.

588 209. Lewis Carroll
The verses cited come from The Mad Gardener's Song, which is found in Sylvie and Bruno:

He thought he saw a Garden-Door
That opened with a key:
He looked again, and found it was A Double Rule of Three:
"And all its mystery," he said,
"Is clear as day to me!"

XII The Laughter of the Immortal Gods

218. St. Augustine
This passage, which is often mentioned by Lacan, is found in Chapter 7 of Book I of Augustine's Confessions.

229. The laughter of the gods
This episode is narrated in the Odyssey, Book 8, lines 266–369. It has often been represented in art, but people generally leave out the gods who have been summoned by Vulcan. You can find them in the painting by Maarten van Heemskerck, Vulcan, Venus, and Mars ([a.k.a. Mars and Venus Trapped in Vulcan's Net] c. 1540), which is displayed at the Kunsthistorisches Museum in Vienna.

XIII Impossible Action

234. These two Alice tales are virtually an epic poem of phallic avatars Lacan commented on this in a charming little paper that I published in the journal Ornicar? [50 (2002): 9–12], entitling it "Hommage rendu à Lewis Carroll."

239. Spell out the great tragedy of Hamlet 589
I have relied here on the text of Hamlet provided in 2006 by Ann Thompson and Neil Taylor in The Arden Shakespeare, which is now in its third edition since 1899. The text has a reputation for being the best, and the notes it provides help resolve various difficulties.

240. A poison, mysteriously named Hebenon
The reader can find a very complete discussion of the "cursed hebona" (Hamlet, I, i) and the many hypotheses about it put forward over the centuries in the excellent study by Anatoly Lieberman entitled An Analytic Dictionary of English Etymology: An Introduction (Minneapolis, MN: University of Minnesota Press, 2008), pp. 110–11. Lieberman concludes that "hebona" undoubtedly stands for "henbane," but that it is impossible to know why Shakespeare, and Marlowe before him (who speaks of the "juice of Hebon" in The Jew of Malta, 1589) did not use its real name: "It remains a mystery."

It seems to me that the two poets might well have balked at the triviality of the word "henbane," which literally signifies "chicken poison." In French, the plant in question, Hyoscyamus niger, is also known as "pigs' beans."

It is of some interest to know the pharmacological profile and historical fate of this toxic plant. Like belladonna [or deadly nightshade] and daturas [or devil's trumpets], it has an impact on the central nervous system. It has anesthetic effects, can induce drunkenness, sleep, and/or visual hallucinations, and gives the subject the feeling he is flying. It was part and parcel of the pharmacopeia of black magic. Its use as a hallucinogen was already mentioned in the Sumerian clay tablets; it was used as an aphrodisiac in the Middle Ages, where it was called "l'herbe au somme" (the sleeping herb or grass); it was used in making a cream that sorcerers were said, in the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries, to smear on their bodies before flying off to their witching-hour ceremonies. See, among others: Anthony John Carter, "Narcosis and Nightshade," British Medical Journal, 313 (1996): 1630–2; Anthony John Carter, "Myths and Mandrakes," Journal of the Royal Society of Medicine 96 (2003): 144–7; Claude Myers, "Mythologies, histoires, actualités 590 des drogues" (Paris: L'Harmattan, 2007); and the well-documented Wikipedia.fr article on jusquiame noire.

The infamous Dr. Crippen supposedly poisoned his wife in 1910 with a poisonous alkaloid extracted from henbane, scopolamine.

244. Ophelia floating in her dress
I initially imagined that I would put Millais's Ophelia on the cover of Seminar VI. But at the last moment I balked. To illustrate desire, one can do better. I preferred the sinuous, luminous body of Bronzino's Venus, surrounded by enigmatic figures whose meaning has never been completely discovered. Lacan liked this canvas.

246. Letourneur
Pierre-Prime-Félicien Letourneur, libraire du Roy (the King's bookseller), was the first person to bring Shakespeare to France. He translated all of Shakespeare's work, including Hamlet in 1779. This was the translation that Raymond Queneau included in his collection, Écrivains célèbres (Paris: Mazenod, 1971).

XIV The Desire Trap

252. The Impediment of Adipose
The article in question, entitled "The Impediment of Adipose: A Celebrated Case," was published in Popular Science Monthly 17 (1880). Its author was Euphemia Vale Blake. It can be found on Wikisource.

252. Someone by the name of Vining
Edward Payson Vining, The Mystery of Hamlet: An Attempt to Solve an Old Problem (Philadelphia: J. B. Lippincott & Co., 1881).
591 "For Vining, Hamlet was not only a 'womanly man,' but 'in very deed a woman, desperately striving to fill a place for which she was by nature unfitted . . .'"

252. Goethe
See Wolfgang Höllrigl's Wenn Shakespeare und Goethe Bridge gespielt hätten. Ein heiterer Versuch, Dichtern und Schriftstellern, die über Bridge nichts geschrieben haben, zu untersteen, sie hätten das getan! (Munich: Idea Verlag, 1999).

253. Coleridge
Samuel Taylor Coleridge, Lectures and Notes on Shakespeare and Other English Poets (London: G. Bell, 1883).

253. Hazlitt
William Haziett, Lectures on the Literature of the Age of Elizabeth, and Characters of Shakespeare's Plays (London: R. Hunter, 1817).

267. M. Valdemar
Valdemar is a character invented by Edgar Allan Poe in his 1845 story, "The Facts in the Case of M. Valdemar," which was separately republished as Mesmerism in Articulo Mortis, and later as "The Last Days of M. Valdemar." Like "The Purloined Letter," it was included in a collection prepared by Baudelaire, Histoires extraordinaires (1856). Lacan refers to it on page 486 of Écrits: he compares the IPA to M. Valdemar, and tells us that his own "return to Freud" amounts to giving a decent burial to an organization that has outlived its purpose.

XV The Mother's Desire 592

269. Dover Wilson
John Dover Wilson, What Happens in Hamlet (Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University Press, 1951 [1935]).

271. Kyd
It seems that the source of Shakespeare's Hamlet was a play by Thomas Kyd that has now been lost, and that scholars designate as the Ur-Hamlet.

271. T. S. Eliot
See Eliot's "Hamlet and His Problems," an essay written in 1919, which came out in 1920 in the collection The Sacred Wood: Essays on Poetry and Criticism. It was subsequently included in Eliot's Selected Essays, 1917–1932 (London: Faber and Faber, 1932).

277. An article that came out a few years ago
The article in question is "Hystérie et théâtre" by P. C. Racamier. It came out in the journal L'Évolution psychiatrique, 2 (1952): 257–89.

XVI There is No Other of the Other

292. A comment by Coleridge Coleridge's comment can be found in the annotations he made to his specially bound edition of Shakespeare, specifically those annotations made in preparation for the lecture he gave on January 7, 1819: "Hume himself could not but have faith in this Ghost dramatically, let his anti-ghostism be as strong as Sampson against ghosts less powerfully raised." The passage is included in Coleridge's Criticism of Shakespeare: A Selection, edited by R. A. Foakes (Detroit, MI: Wayne State University Press, 1989), p. 81.

593 This is a supposition on Coleridge's part, for Hume nowhere mentions the ghost in Hamlet. Hume's well-known critique of ghosts can be found in his Enquiry concerning Human Understanding (London: A. Millar, 1748), Section 10 entitled "Of Miracles."

296. "Oneille," as Jarry writes it

The word is found for the first time in Ubu roi: "Un soldat dit: Seigneur Ubu, voilà le ciseau à oneille qui tombe" (Act III, scene 8). It is found anew in Act IV, scene 5: "Père Ubu : Eh ! sire Cotice, votre oneille, comment va-t-elle? – Cotice : Aussi bien, Monsieuye, qu'elle peut aller tout en allant très mal." And so on.

In addition, L'Almanach du Père Ubu (1899) includes a calendar in which September 29 is the day of St. Oneille. L'Almanach de 1901 provides a "pataphysical calendar" on which April 25 becomes Flunky 6, the saints day of hussy Oneille. I did not look any further.

A recent volume devoted to Ubu enchaîné [Ubu Bound] says the following about the word "oneille": "The r in oreille (which emigrated to 'merdre' [a condensation of mère, mother, and merde, shit]) is replaced by an n in order to create a new Ubu-like neologism. 'L'oneille' is a part of the body that is subjected to Ubu's punishments: the oneilles are rubbed, pulled, twisted, ripped off, or plugged up by the gidouille [another made-up word meaning something like belly]. Such phonetic distortions roll off Ubu's tongue whenever he loses his cool (and one finds this also in vowels, such as 'ji ti . . .')." This passage is from the "Dossier pédagogique édité par la délégation à l'action culturelle de l'Académie de Caen," directed by Nicole Cellier and Ivan Perrot, 2012.

According to Carey Taylor, in "Le vocabulaire d'Alfred Jarry," Cahiers de l'Association international des études françaises, 11 (1959): 307–22, the word was probably a slang term used by Jarry's fellow students at his high school in Rennes.

Lastly, the Collège de patapsychique published in 1947, through Les Films Arquevit, a brochure entitled Zoneilles. It is a film script written by Michel Arnaud, Raymond Queneau, and Boris Vian.

594 XVIII Mourning and Desire

331. The way the wager was structured

The 2006 Arden edition considers the precise terms of the wager to constitute "an insoluble problem" (p. 444), and indicates that a debate on the topic in the Times Literary Supplement on February 6, 2004, was unable to clarify the matter.

XIX Phallophanies

348. The functions of castration, frustration, and deprivation Lacan maintains here, in Seminar VI, that prior to this he had left empty the squares corresponding to castration and deprivation in the "agent of frustration" column. However, in Seminar IV, two years earlier, we find on page 59 a table of the three functions, which was completed on page 215; in those two boxes we find "the imaginary father" and "the real father," the explanation for which is found on pages 219–21. Lacan had apparently forgotten he had already completed the table.

350. See Raymond Queneau's novel
Lacan often mentioned the novel by Queneau entitled Le Dimanche de la vie (Paris: Gallimard, 1952) [The Sunday of Life (Surrey, UK: Alma Books, 2013)], seeing in it an illustration of what awaits man when he arrives at "absolute knowledge" (das absolute Wissen), assuming it exists, this being the final stage of the trajectory proposed in Hegel's Phenomenology of Spirit (1807).

There is no doubt but that Queneau's novel is full of indications and allusions to Hegel's work, whose presence is constant in Lacan's teaching – especially in the form of the famous master/slave dialectic that Kojève took to be its fundamental matrix. It is well known that Lacan and Queneau both attended the Seminar that Kojève devoted to Hegel's Phenomenology from 1933 to 1936. Queneau published a write-up of the Seminar in a book entitled Introduction à la lecture de Hegel: Leçons sur la Phénoménologie de l'Esprit professées de 1933 à 1939 à l'École des Hautes Études (Paris: Gallimard, 1947) [abridged and translated into English as Introduction to the Reading of Hegel: Lectures on the Phenomenology of Spirit (New York: Basic Books, 1969)]. As for Lacan, who did not often give such praise, he referred to Kojève as "mon maître" (my master or teacher) in Seminar VIII, Transference. In fact, the only other person that he 595 honored in this way was de Clérambault, whom he called "my only master in psychiatry" (Écrits, p. 51).

According to Lacan, Queneau's novel derides men who have attained absolute knowledge. Lacan mentions in this regard "the advent of the lazy bumpkin and of the good for nothing, demonstrating the knowledge that can satisfy animals in the form of absolute laziness" [Autres Écrits (Paris, Seuil: 2001), p. 331] as well as "the satiated rest of a sort of colossal seventh day on this Sunday of life on which the human animal can finally shove its muzzle in the grass, the great machine being henceforth calibrated down to the last carat of the materialized nothingness provided by this conception of knowledge" [Seminar IX, class given on November 22, 1961].

Lacan's interpretation here is not original. It stems directly from Kojève's work. According to Kojève, the attaining of absolute knowledge and the concomitant appearance of the "Sage" imply the disappearance of what he calls "Man," the end of history, and a return to our animal nature. To his way of thinking, the novel by his student Queneau described this "post-historical" state of humanity, and he said so in an article written shortly after the novel came out, "Les Romans de la sagesse" [Critique, LX (1952)]. This article had quite an impact.

Now, this doctrine of absolute knowledge is completely Kojèvian in inspiration. Hegel did not in any way intend to close his Phenomenology of Spirit on this Ubu-like "end of history" that inspired a bestseller by someone who was a neo-conservative at the time, The End of History and the Last Man (New York: The Free Press, 1992). Inspired by the fall of the Berlin Wall and the disappearance of the Soviet Union, Francis Fukuyama prophesied "the universalization of Western liberal democracy as the final form of human government."

At the end of Hegel's Phenomenology, as a science of consciousness, "pure knowledge distills out, as the final and absolute truth of this consciousness," which "is liberated from its immediacy and its concreteness," as Hegel wrote in his Science of Logic. As Gwendolyn Jarczyk and Pierre-Jean Labarrière, whose fine analysis I am following here, indicate, absolute knowledge is, rather, a "level of intelligibility" in which consciousness overcomes its dualism, allowing contingency to find its place in the element of the concept; see De Kojève à Hegel (Paris: Alvin Michel, 1996), p. 221, and the entirety of their conclusion.

596 Note, furthermore, that while Queneau's Sunday of Life refers to Hegel's Phenomenology of Spirit, the expression "the Sunday of life" is found in Hegel's Aesthetics, at the end of the chapter devoted to painting, from which the novel's epigraph is borrowed: "it is the Sunday of life which equalizes everything and removes all evil; people who are so wholeheartedly cheerful cannot be altogether evil and base" [G. W. F. Hegel, Aesthetics: Lectures on Fine Art, vol. 2, trans. T. M. Knox (Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1975), p. 877].

This passage stems from Hegel's solid praise of the Dutch Protestants, who "had overcome the Spanish despotism of church and crown" [p. 885]. According to him, the Dutch are heroic, prudent, and modest, and rose up "without any fear of exposing themselves to all sorts of danger in face of the tremendous repute of the Spanish domination of half the world" [p. 885]. Through painting, this population "wishes now in painting too to delight in this existence which is as powerful as just, satisfying, and comfortable" [p. 886]. The expression "the Sunday of life" is also found in the introduction to Hegel's Lectures on the History of Philosophy: it is the day of the Lord, that allows us to "devote ourselves to what is True, and to bring it to consciousness" (as cited in the Pléiade edition of his complete works, volume 3 [Paris: Gallimard, 2006], p. 1678).

Hegel's sympathy for the institution of the Sunday of life and for the Dutch bourgeoisie, which was industrious and courageous, without being prideful, is thus quite clear, as is Queneau's for these characters, "little people, who are not imbeciles," as he put it in an interview (cited in the above-mentioned edition, p. 1674). In L'Oeil écoute, Claudel also spoke about Dutch painting in positive terms, and Roland Barthes saw in Dutch painting "all history reach[ing] the grandeur of its own mystery" (in Essais Critiques [Paris: Seuil, 1964], p. 28 [A Barthes Reader (New York: Macmillan, 1983), p. 72]).

These positive appraisals contrast with the scorn with which Kojève and Lacan greet the characters in Queneau's The Sunday of Life. Must we see in this an aristocratic reaction to the "everyday folk" Queneau included in his novels and about whom he speaks tenderly? It is more complicated than that, and the three pals must be distinguished here.

Kojève could not identify with the rebellious people described by Hegel in his Aesthetics. He was, as it were, an Imperial. The admiration he had for Stalin is well documented, and he dreamt of a Latin Empire for France. The ambitions of the Habsburgs certainly did not seem monstrous to either Kojève or Hegel.

To the best of my knowledge, it was Queneau, not Kojève, who 597 mischievously fused the Sunday of life with absolute knowledge, and the chapter on painting in Hegel's Aesthetics with Chapter 8 of Hegel's Phenomenology. In this way he inscribed the everyday folk in his novels in the sweeping gesture of his sardonic master, who became a member of the Common Market's upper administration.

As for Lacan, the notion of wisdom – promoted by Kojève in "Les Romans de la sagesse" as a state of "perfect satisfaction [. . .] accompanied by a fullness of self-consciousness" – could not but repulse him. To praise the absence of division, whether in the subject, knowledge, or satisfaction, was contrary to his most consistently expressed views. The present Seminar clearly attests to this:

Hamlet, a king's son who pretends to be crazy, is the opposite of Valentin Brû [in Queneau's The Sunday of Life]. Valentin "devotes his vast leisure time," says Kojève jokingly, "to identifying the nothingness of his subjective certainty with the Annihilation of temporal Being-in-itself." Hamlet's bustling activity, which his uncertainty brings on, is deployed in the dimension of language; and time, with which he is grappling, is not "in itself," but "for others," calibrated to other people's time, as Lacan says. With Hamlet, Shakespeare reinvents the tragic hero, whereas Queneau incarnated the Kojevian Sage in the soldier Brû.

In homage to the master? Or to deride him? The question has long been raised whether Kojève, who published little, rushed to bless Queneau's novel. But this Sage was already a deriding of Hegel by his commentator.

Lacan spoke again about The Sunday of Life in his seminar later on. But I have said enough here.

353. A "capital . . . calf"
See Hamlet, III, ii, 101–2. Polonius indicates that he once acted the part of Julius Caesar, killed by Brutus, in a play. Hamlet qualifies Caesar as "so capital a calf." The Arden edition suggests that the adjective "capital" may imply a pun on "capitol," and indicates that "calf" also means fool.

598

XX The Fundamental Fantasy

361. "The Relation of Perversion-Formation to the Development of Reality-Sense."
I published a French translation, by Jean-Louis Henrion and Sophie Poloczanska, of this article in the journal Ornicar?, 43 (1987): 17–37.

368: Anything but fragrant flatus
See Ernest Jones's 1922 article, "A Study of the Holy Ghost Concept," found in Essays in Applied Psychoanalysis, Vol. 2 (London: Hogarth, 1951), pp. 358–73.

XXI In the Form of a Cut

375. The process of logical generation
In notes taken by those present at the Seminar, we find the following schema, which appears to represent a reworking by Lacan of the schema he had provided the week before, modified in order to show in what respect "it is not by examining the Other, but rather by considering what occurs at the level of demand that we are going to extend the process of logical generation":

Table A.1: The Process of Logical Generation

A	$D \rightarrow S(\not A)$
rA	S
a	$

To my mind, we have here a quick sketch that was designed to show a specific point in passing. I did not want to include it in the main body of the text since, in the remainder of class XXI, Lacan goes back to commenting on the fuller schema he had provided in class XX.

378. Let us reconsider, for example, Freud's claim, Wo Es war, soll Ich werden 599

This is the penultimate sentence in Lecture 31 of Freud's New Introductory Lectures on Psychoanalysis, entitled "The Dissection of the Psychical Personality." The last sentence is "It is a work of culture – not unlike the draining of the Zuider Zee" [SE XXII, p. 80].

383. Sie lieben also den Wahn wie sich selbst

This sentence is found in a letter to Wilhelm Fliess. See Briefe an Wilhelm Fliess (Frankfurt: S. Fischer, 1986), p. 110 [SE I, p. 212].

384. Breathing

Lacan mentions a breathing stage here, comparable to the oral or anal stage, in order to suggest that there is no such thing. Jean-Louis Tristani tried to demonstrate just the opposite in his book Le Stade du respir (Paris: Minuit, 1978).

386 and 387. Maine de Biran and Cocteau

I no longer have time to take up the Mémoire sur la decomposition de la pensée or La voix humaine.

XXII Cut and Fantasy

392. Imagine that a specular image can subsist independently of any subjective prop

Lacan is alluding here to The Invention of Morel, a novel by Adolfo Bioy Casares (who was a friend of Borges's) that Lacan commented on in Seminar II. The novel came out in 1940 and bears some affinity to H. G. Wells's novel, The Island of Doctor Moreau.

600 393. The fable of the white disks and the black disks Lacan is referring his audience to his paper, "Logical Time and the Assertion of Anticipated Certainty," which came out in the journal Cahiers d'art, 1940–4, and was republished in Écrits, pp. 161–75. A whole book was devoted to the study of this paper: Erik Porge, Se Compter trois. Le temps logique de Lacan (Paris: Erès, 1990). I did a detailed examination of the article in my course, L'Orientation lacanienne (forthcoming).

397. Plato long ago compared the philosopher to a good cook Lacan is alluding here to Plato's Phaedrus, 265e. A dialectician must be able to divide things "into species according to the natural formation, where the joint is, not breaking any part as a bad carver might."

398. A very interesting article by Kurt Eissler, that does not go too far The reference here is to Kurt Eissler's "The Function of Details in the Interpretation of Works of Literature," which came out in PQ 28 (1959): 1–20.

404. Walter Wilson Greg
Greg was a major Shakespearean scholar of the last century; Dover Wilson's What Happens in Hamlet, which came out in 1935, was dedicated to him. The book's "epistle dedicatory" is a bravura passage. Greg had published an article entitled "Hamlet's Hallucination" in The Modern Language Review in October 1917; in that article he made the point about Claudius mentioned by Lacan. Dover Wilson had a revelation when he read Greg's article a month later: "From the first, I realized that I had been born to answer it." He, in effect, dedicated his whole life to Hamlet. This extraordinary episode was the inspiration for Pierre Bayard's Enquête sur Hamlet. Le dialogue de sourds (Paris: Minuit, 2002).

601 XXIII The Function of the Subjective Slit in Perverse Fantasies

407. I am speaking about Being and the One
I would note here that Lacan was familiar with the work of Étienne Gilson. He very much appreciated his type of erudition.

408. English psychology
I balk at the thought of saying anything here about John Stuart Mill, whose work I studied in the past.

411. There cannot be satisfaction of one person without the satisfaction of all This is Lacan's version of communism, as inspired by Kojève. He first formulated it, or something like it, in the "Rome Report," if memory serves.

413. Tartuffe
Lacan is alluding here to the famous scene in Act V. It was in Lacan's company that I recall seeing the best production of Tartuffe I have ever seen, which was directed by Planchon. When I knew Lacan, he almost never went to performances anymore, except those of Fellini, Molière, and Mozart.

413. Arnolphe
Lacan commented on Molière's L'École des femmes in his Seminar. Arnolphe's "Ouf!" comes in Act V, Scene 9, line 1765. In the latest edition of Corneille's theatrical works published by Gallimard in the Pléiade edition, one finds a note by Georges Couton regarding "ouf."

413. Desire can be caught "by the tail"
Lacan is alluding here to the play by Picasso, Le Désir attrapé par la queue (Desire Caught by the Tail). The famous group photo by Man Ray was taken at a private performance of the play.

414. A fine case study that came out in Belgium in a little bulletin 602
Lacan is referring here to Ruth Lebovici's case study; see Écrits, p. 540.

415. The subject fears that his desire may disappear
This is the well-known "aphanisis" that captured Lacan's attention and that he returned to several times. He ends up saying the following on the topic: "there is no subject without aphanisis (disappearance) of the subject somewhere, and it is in this alienation, in this fundamental division, that the dialectic of the subject is established" (Seminar XI, p. 221). The whole of Chapter 17 [in Seminar XI] is worth reading, as is the paper he comments on there, "Position of the Unconscious" (Écrits, pp. 703–21).

416. Paul Éluard
The collection entitled Donner à voir [Paris: Gallimard, 1978] was first published in 1939; it can now be found in volume one of Éluard's complete works published by Gallimard in the Pléiade edition. I was unable to find the phrase "charmantes pulsions vitales" [charming life drives].

419. Anatole France [. . .] refers to the Comte de Gabalis
The stenography gives the name as Cabanis. The context shows that Lacan was not talking about the seventeenth-century physiologist, but was referring to a famous book by the abbot Henri de Montfaucon de Villars, Le Comte de Gabalis, ou Entretiens sur les sciences secrètes.

See the excellent edition of this work edited by Didier Kahn and published by Honoré Champion in 2010; it includes an adaptation by Blaise de Vignenère of the Liber de Nymphis by Paracelsus (1583). Be sure to read the fascinating introduction. Montfaucon de 603 Villars's style is borrowed from Pascal's in his Provinciales, and his ideas are borrowed from Descartes. He wishes to "destroy belief in the Devil's actions."

Lacan liked Anatole France's work. In La Rôtisserie de la reine Pédauque, France includes "editorial notes" referring to cabalists and their beliefs in sylphs, salamanders, and so on, especially in the Comte de Gabalis, the 1700 edition of which he recommends.

Coming after Lacan's borrowing of the question "Che vuoi?" from Jacques Cazotte, this allusion to Le Comte de Gabalis demonstrates Lacan's interest in literature noir, and also in the period that saw the decline of magic and the rise of scientific discourse.

XXIV The Dialectic of Desire in Neurosis

424. Unerkannt
The German term means less what is unknown than what is unrecognized. Lefebvre translated it into French as the non connu (not known). The word can be found in The Interpretation of Dreams, VI, D, regarding the dream's navel: "This [tangle] is the dream's navel, the spot where it reaches down into the unknown" [this is Strachey's translation in SE V, p. 525].

424. Little Hans's neurosis Lacan devoted half of Seminar IV to a commentary on little Hans. Hans having no recourse when faced with his mother's desire:

Hilflosigkeit. Freud uses the term in his 1917 metapsychological paper, "The Unconscious" [SE XIV, pp. 166–215].

427. The paper I gave at the Royaumont Congress
A reference to "Direction of the Treatment," Écrits, pp. 489–542.

430. The so-called law of marriage and kinship 604
Lacan is obviously thinking here of Lévi-Strauss's thesis, The Elementary Structures of Kinship.

432. Melanie Klein
The case of little Dick is related by Klein in her article, "The Importance of Symbol-Formation in the Development of the Ego" [IJP 11 (1930): 24–39].

432. Cybernetic schemas
See Seminar II, the chapter entitled "Psychoanalysis and Cybernetics" [and Écrits, pp. 33–46].

433. A child is being beaten Freud's article came out for the first time in Int. Z. Psychoanal., 5 (1919): 151–72 [SE XVII, pp. 179–204]. Lacan commented on it in Seminar V, the year before this one, and often referred to it. La Psychanalyse, the journal of the Société française de psychanalyse, of which Lacan was one of the editors, published a translation of it.

433. Diogenes the Cynic
Diogenes Laertius, in Book VI, 69, of Lives and Opinions of Eminent Philosophers, relates the following about Diogenes of Sinope, also known as the dog: "It was his habit to do everything in public, the works of Demeter and of Aphrodite alike. [. . .] Behaving indecently in public, he wished 'it were as easy to banish hunger by rubbing the belly.'"

XXV The Either/Or Concerning the Object 605

436. Our Parisian colleagues
Lacan is referring to the article by S. Nacht, R. Diatkine, and J. Favreau, "The Ego in Perverse Relationships," which came out in IJP [37 (1956): 404–13] and in the journal of the Société parisienne de psychanalyse the same year ["Le moi dans la relation perverse," RFP 20 (1956): 457–78].

437. Polymorphously perverse disposition
Polymorphously perverse tendencies or inclinations were brought out by Freud in his Three Essays on the Theory of Sexuality. This is common knowledge.

438. So-called tables of correlated stages
See Karl Abraham's 1916 paper, "The First Pregenital Stage of the Libido," which, according to Ferenczi, earned the author the Freud prize [in 1918]; see, also, his 1924 "Short Study of the Development of the Libido, Viewed in the Light of Mental Disorders." Both articles can be found in his Selected Papers on Psycho-Analysis (London: Hogarth Press, 1927). See Sandor Ferenczi's A Theory of Genitality (London: Karnac, 1989).

439. The supposed "bad distance at which the obsessive stays from the object"
The reference here is to Maurice Bouvet's notion that Lacan often takes aim at in the years that followed the 1953 split. See Bouvet's 1958 article, "Les variations de la technique (distance et variations)" [Variations in Technique (Distance and Variations)] in volume one of his Oeuvres psychanalytiques (Paris: Payot, 1967), pp. 251–93.

606 440. An article on "drug addictions"* written the year before The reference here is to Edward Glover's article "On the Aetiology of Drug-Addiction," IJP 13 (1932): 298–328.

440. Melanie Klein
Lacan is commenting here on her 1930 article, "The Importance of Symbol-Formation in the Development of the Ego" [IJP 11 (1930): 24–39].

447. An important thesis on the social signification of psychoanalysis Lacan is undoubtedly referring here to Serge Moscovici's thesis, which was published as La Psychanalyse, son image, son public (Paris: PUF, 1961).

449. "Your daughter is mute"
The expression is from Molière. It is spoken by Sganarelle, speaking about Lucinde, Géronte's daughter, in The Doctor in Spite of Himself, Act II, Scene 4. Here is the passage:

> Which is caused by the acridity of the humors engendered in the concavity of the diaphragm, it happens that these vapors

. . . Ossabandus, anorexia, mausoleum, amo, amas, amamus, candida albicians, tyranasaurus rex, potarium, invertabratum, quipsa milus. This is precisely what has rendered your daughter mute.

449. Nestroy
The sentence can be found in "The Question of Lay Analysis," which came out in 1926, regarding psychoanalysis as practiced by those who are not medical doctors [SE XX, pp. 183–258]. This was a crucial episode: Freud argued against the attempt that was being made by doctors to monopolize psychoanalysis. Here is the relevant passage:

> If I seem to be aggressive, that is only a way of defending myself. And when I think of all the mischief some analysts have done with the interpretation of dreams I might lose heart and echo the pessimistic pronouncement of our great satirist Nestroy when he says that every step forward is only half as big as it looks at first. (p. 193)

Johann Nestroy (1801–62) was, starting in 1833, a shining light in Austrian culture. He was a satirist. He used irony, insinuation, 607 and Viennese dialect to convey his criticism of the old regime that Metternich devoted himself to defending in Austria and in the part of Europe that was involved in the Holy Alliance. He wrote more than eighty plays from 1840 to 1850. He had a deep influence on Karl Kraus, and was cited several times by Freud, who appreciated his work.

XXVI The Function of Splitting in Perversion

454. Lolita
Lolita needs no introduction. The book, and then the film by Stanley Kubrick, have been discussed by numerous literary critics. Lacan's clinical commentary here stands in stark contrast to everything else I have read. Nabokov had nothing but scorn for psychoanalysis.

457. Beyond the Pleasure Principle
The year that Lacan devoted to Freud's Beyond the Pleasure Principle was that in which he gave Seminar II.

457. "I am thinking, therefore I am"
Lacan very often commented on and varied Descartes' formulation of the cogito. See, in particular, "The Instance of the Letter" (Écrits, p. 429) and "Subversion of the Subject" (Écrits, p. 694); in the latter Lacan identified the signified of the proper name with the square root of negative one, namely, "what the subject is missing in thinking he is exhaustively accounted for by his cogito – he is missing what is unthinkable about him." Later on, Lacan revamped this significantly in Seminar XII and in the summary of that Seminar which he wrote for the Annuaire de l'École des Hautes Études.

459. Gillespie
Here are the exact references to the articles by W. H. Gillespie that are cited by Lacan: "A Contribution to the Study of Fetishism," IJP
608 21 (1940): 401–15; "Notes on the Analysis of Sexual Perversions," IJP 33 (1952): 397–402; "The General Theory of Sexual Perversion," IJP 37 (1956): 396–403.

461. "Die Ichspaltung"
Freud stopped writing mid-sentence, as it were, while he was working on his article "Die Ichspaltung [The Splitting of the Ego] im Abwehrvorgang [in the Defensive Process]" [SE XXIII, pp. 275–8] and he left it unfinished. Lacan refers to it in the last sentence of his paper on "The Direction of the Treatment" (Écrits, p. 537).

462. The article I devoted to the case of André Gide Lacan is referring here to his paper entitled "The Youth of Gide, or the Letter and Desire" (Écrits, pp. 623–44). It originally came out in the journal Critique [131 (April 1958): 291–315], and discusses Jean Delay's book, The Youth of Gide, and Jean Schlumberger's book, Madeleine et André Gide.

462. Ungracious – or even "disgraced," as a certain writer put it – boy Lacan is referring here to Mauriac, who is cited by Jean Delay in La Jeunesse de Gide (The Youth of Gide), vol. I, p. 225 n.1.

463. Gide's history
The passages cited by Lacan come from Si le grain ne meurt. In the Pléiade edition of Gide's Journal, 1939–1949 [Paris: Gallimard, 1954], see pp. 386 and 387.

XXVII Toward Sublimation 609

474. Desire, cupiditas
The sentence is from Spinoza's Ethics. It opens the appendix to Book III entitled "General Definition of Emotions," and reads as follows: "Desire [cupiditas] is man's very essence, insofar as it is conceived to be determined, from any given affection of it, to do something."

477. Phallocentric conception
In his paper "On a Question Prior to Any Possible Treatment of Psychosis," Lacan makes the "problem of the perversions" revolve around a child's identification with the imaginary object of his mother's desire, insofar as she symbolizes it in the phallus. And he adds: "The phallocentrism produced by this dialectic is all that need concern us here" (Écrits, p. 463).

478. Paul-Jean Toulet
As a young man, Lacan had a special predilection for this poet. He cites here a poem from the collection entitled Les Contrerimes (1921), found in Œuvres complètes, published in 1986 by Robert Laffont. Here is the complete text of the poem in question, J'ai vu le Diable, l'autre nuit.

J'ai vu le Diable, l'autre nuit;
Et, dessous sa pelure,
Il n'est pas aisé de conclure S'il faut dire: Elle, ou: Lui.

Sa gorge, – avait l'air sous la faille,
De trembler de désir:
Tel, aux mains près de le saisir,
Un bel oiseau défaille.

610

Telle, à la soif, dans Blidah bleu, S'offre la pomme douce;
Ou bien l'orange, sous la mousse, Lorsque tout bas il pleut.

"Ah !" dit Satan, et le silence Frémissait à sa voix,
"Ils ne tombent pas tous, tu vois, Les fruits de la Science."

482. Ernst Kris's interpretation
Lacan is referring here to Kris's paper, "Ego Psychology and Interpretation in Psychoanalytic Therapy," which was presented in New York in December 1948, and published in PQ, 20, no. 1 (1951): 15–30. Lacan had mentioned it in "Function and Field of Speech and Language," but above all in his response to Hyppolite on pages 327–32 of Écrits. He often returned to it. I published a French translation of it by Jacques Adam in Ornicar? 46 (1988): 5–20.

483. "Neurosis and Psychosis"
This text by Freud can be found in SE XIX, pp. 149–53, and the passage in question is from pages 152–3. Lacan returned to sublimation at some length the next year in Seminar VII.

486. A mark of fancy
The journal Phantômas was the main organ of surrealism in Belgium. The first issue was printed on December 15, 1953. Désiré Viardot was one of the three members of the editorial board. Philippe Hellebois was willing to help me find the exact location of the spoonerism cited by Lacan. He found it in Désiré Viardot's Ripopée, Brussels (1956), p. 7, in the following form: "Like all women, I have a mark of fancy on my skin." This fifteen-page brochure is presented as the first work in the "collection of experimental literature" by Phantômas publishers.

Index

affects positional affects related to being 141
  unconscious 51–2
anal symbolism 106
animal dreams 62–3, 68, 69 animal psychology 105–6, 196 animal subjectivity 416–17 anxiety 3
  as "distress" 17–18, 19–20
"aphanisis" 100–1, 103, 195–6, 229, 424
  see also "fading of the subject" Aristotle 7, 19, 139
associationism 45–8 dreams 168, 173–4, 176–81, 189, 197–8, 199, 427
  "free association" 46, 138–9
Augustine, St. 218, 219

bad object 444–6, 463, 477 barking dog fantasy 161–7, 174–6, 197, 220 bed-wetting 154, 207–8, 228
behaviorism 368, 380–1
Being and the One 216, 218–19, 407–9
Belleforest, François de 291, 303, 304, 307, 318
Binet, Alfred 71, 72, 79
Boehm, Felix 368, 369
The Book of Common Prayer 200–1
Brandes, Georg 238–9, 241 breast/nipple 121, 219–20, 311, 383 breathing and voice 384
Brierley, Marjorie 50
Brosse, Jacques 105–6
Buffon, Comte de 105–6

"caprice" 102
car (dream image) 182, 186–7, 189, 206, 207, 221–2, 223–4, 228–9 Carroll, Lewis 167, 208–9, 233, 234 castration 35, 96, 100–1, 103, 117, 214, 367, 368, 396 complex 196–7, 201–2, 382, 385, 415, 458 frustration and deprivation 348–51
  Hamlet 257
  Other 229, 234
  see also Oedipus complex cave image in dream interpretation 177, 185, 186, 189, 195 Cazotte, Jacques 15
censorship 73–4, 79, 279
chess game metaphor 203, 204–6, 225 child case studies
  Dick 432–3, 446
  little Anna 62, 67–71, 72–7, 78
  little Hans 104, 178, 424–6 child development
  graph 13–15, 19
  phallus 121, 219–20, 477–8, 479
  see also object relations theory
"child is being beaten" 109–10, 121–5, 433–5

child–family relationship 476–7 child–mother relationship see mother childhood dreams 78–9, 136
  little Anna 62, 67–71, 72–7, 78 childhood fantasies/memories 149, 150, 190, 199–200 parents' sexual activity/primal scene 189, 190, 208, 227, 228, 423 pram 190, 200, 204, 206, 223, 227 childhood game (fort-da) 415 childhood language 163–7, 220
choice, drive and repetition 394
Christian religion 410, 411, 412, 419
Claudius (Hamlet) 240, 241, 242–3, 247–8, 253, 259, 261, 262–5, 267, 293, 308, 316–17, 328, 351–3, 404–5
Cocteau, Jean 387
Coleridge, Samuel Taylor 252, 253, 292
"colicky pain" 206–7, 227–8
comedy as desire trap 413
  see also jokes
conman's game 195–6, 199 consciousness and signifying chain 392 contiguity in word-association 46–8 continuity and fragmentation 29–30 contraphobic object 441
countertransference 202, 204 culture and society, perversion as protest against 482–5 cut/cutting 381, 382, 383–7, 388, 396–7, 398, 408, 421, 457, 459, 485–6 in literary works of art 400–1

Damourette, Jacques 95
Darwin, Charles and the Devil 20–4 and duck's quack 166–7 death see father's death death instinct 456, 457 defense against distress 19–20
  neurosis as 3, 4 Delay, Jean 462–4
"delusion" 382–3, 387–9 demand 17, 27, 28–30, 34, 43–4 call and wish 118 and fantasy 391–6 made to the Other 374–7 for phallus, women 447–9 for satisfaction 446–52 "depressive phase" 219, 443
Descartes, René 457
"desire"
  definitions 4–5, 8–9 and interpretation (overview) 10–24 developmental theory see child development; object relations theory dialectic of Being 218–19 dialectic of desire 430–2, 447–9, 451 dialectic with the Other 83–4 Diogenes the Cynic 433–4 disappearance of desire see "aphanisis"; "fading of the subject" discordance and foreclosure 81–3, 95, 421, 457 discourse/speech 26–36, 70–7, 88–94, 370–2, 374–7 childhood 163–7, 220
  Hamlet 273–7 poetic 5–6, 16, 85–7
  unconscious 359–60, 367, 454
  see also under Other displaced desire 105
"distance from the object" 439 psychoanalysis as adjustment of 475 "distress" 17–18, 19–20
dog barking 161–7, 174–6, 197, 220 masturbating 167–70, 174, 182–3, 225
  phallus 224
Donne, John 6

dream interpretation 133–41
  Freud 37–8, 43–5, 52–9, 60–70, 71–3, 77, 78–9, 86–7, 88–94, 96–8, 102–3, 112–16, 134–8, 139–40, 144, 179, 235–6, 255, 360, 424
  graph of desire 89, 133–4, 136–8, 158–9, 168, 172–3, 181
  Sharpe 142–51, 152–70, 171–90, 191–209, 210–11, 220, 221–9, 233–4, 430 drives 49, 394, 453, 476
drug addiction 440
Dürer, Albrecht: Melencolia I 380

ego development 440–1, 446 in discourse 36 ego-ideal 18–19, 169 id and superego 40, 239
  in neurosis 451–2 and Other 116, 172–3, 204, 432–3 pressure function 386 splitting 460–1 structuring elements of 364
"ego distortion" 475
Einstein, Albert 402
Eissler, Kurt 398–400, 401 either/or of object 451 Eliot, T. S. 106
elision 56, 58
erogenous phases 438
exhibitionism 416, 417–18, 419–20, 422–3, 424 expectation (Erwartung) 125, 295, 425
"externalization" 443–4

"fading of the subject" 305, 310–11, 377, 382–3, 424
  see also "aphanisis" Fairbairn, William Ronald Dodds 4 fantasy 389, 396–8, 422–4 constructed retrospectively 443 construction stages 434–5 and dream, link between 173–6, 179, 185, 224
  graph of desire 391–6 object a in 382–5 paradoxes of 309–10, 311–13 and the subject of unconscious discourse 454 synchronistic function 378–9 see also neurosis; perverse fantasies father, identification with 108–9 father's death (dream interpretation)
  Freud 53–9, 71–2, 77, 88–94, 96–8, 112–16, 144, 235–6
  Sharpe 144, 146, 184, 203–4, 222–3, 226 father's death and ghost (Hamlet) 235–6, 239–44, 247, 253–4, 258, 259, 264, 265, 274, 278–9, 296–7, 401–5 see also Oedipus complex, Hamlet fear of the object 109 female genitals (dream and fantasy) 176–81, 185–7, 188–9, 195, 197, 211 feminine and masculine, non-separation of 190 Ferenczi, Sandor 62, 438
fetishism/fetishization 312–13, 439, 478–9 Fliess, Wilhelm 66, 234
foreclosure and discordance 81–3, 95, 421, 457 and negation 58, 76–7, 81–3, 95 fort-da game 415 fragmentation and continuity 29–30 in dreams 137, 138, 139–40 of signifier 129, 137 symbolic and imaginary 128–9
France, Anatole 419
"free association" 46, 138–9
Freud, Sigmund 3, 4, 5, 7–8, 481
  anal symbolism 106
  and behaviorism 380–1

Freud, Sigmund (cont.)
case studies Dora 465
little Hans 104, 178, 424–6 see also little Anna's dream
castration 367, 385
"child is being beaten" 109–10, 121–5, 433–5 delusions 383
discontent in civilization 412 dreams see under dream interpretation drive 476
expectation (Erwartung) 125, 295, 425 and graph of desire 17–18, 26, 34, 35, 37–8, 39, 40
homosexuality 368
I and unconscious desire 377–8
"kites" 261 law 429
masochism 456
minus phi 350
mirror illusion 128
mourning 287, 335–6, 345–7
neurosis 458
Oedipus complex 344–8, 447
see also Oedipus complex, Hamlet
penis envy 125–6, 215
phallic phase 117–18
phallus, fear of losing 431–2
"polymorphously perverse disposition" 437
repression 279
social context and sublimation 483–4
unconscious 48–52
the uncanny 320
women's purpose 107–8
"Freudian thing," desire as 358–60 fundamental fantasy see ($$ \lozenge a$) funeral rites 337, 340 garden metaphor of womb 208–9

"genital desire" 4, 410 genital maturity 364 genitals see female genitals (dream and fantasy); phallus Gide, André 462–4
Gillespie, W. H. 459–62
Glover, Edward 30–1, 50, 361–3, 439–40, 441–2, 481, 482, 484
Goethe, J. W. von 236, 252–3 good and bad objects 443–6, 463, 477 Granoff, Wladimir 63
graph of desire
first stage 11–13, 23 second stage 13–17, 23
third stage 17–20, 23
two levels and four trajectories 26–36 two topographies, relationship between 39–40 graph of desire (illustrations/applications) childhood language 165–6
Darwin and the Devil 20–4 dream interpretation 89, 133–4, 136–8, 158–9, 168, 172–3, 181
fantasy 391–6
Freud 36–40
Hamlet 282–90, 297–300, 309–10 problem of psychoanalysis 485 see also S(Ⱥ); ($$ \lozenge a$) Greg, Walter Wilson 404–5 half-dead, instance of 58–9 hallucinations 52, 63–5, 396

Hamlet 234–48, 413
Act I 258–9
Act II 259–63
Act III 263–5
Act IV 266 Act V 266–8
desire 277–82, 289–90, 291
graph 282–90, 297–300, 309–10
encounter with death 292–7 English performances 256–7 father see father's death and ghost; Oedipus complex history of commentaries 250–6 history of 249–50
as mirror 270–2

mode of discourse 273–7 mother 264, 265, 280–2, 308–9, 321, 339, 352
mourning and crime 341–4 mourning and desire cemetery scene 333–8, 340
having no object(ive) and fantasy of object of/in desire ($$\Diamond a$) 324–8 procrastination and precipitation 323–4 taking action and equivocation 328–33 no Other of the Other 324
"play scene" 280–2 and Shakespearean women characters 300–5 truth and fantasy 401–6 see also Ophelia and main characters harmony 364, 365
Hartmann, Heinz 364 hidden signifier 159, 299–300 hippopotamus, behavior of 106 Homer 229, 304
homological relationship 36
homosexuality 368–9, 462–7
hood (dream image) 177, 178, 181–2, 183–4, 186–7, 192, 199, 206, 211, 221 Horatio (Hamlet) 259, 262, 292, 404
hysteria
lived experience 51 obsession and neurosis 289–90, 295, 427–9

I (the symbol) as ego-ideal 223 identification with mother/phallus 233–4 integration with reality 457 Other's image and 220 statement and enunciation 71–2, 74–6, 78–9, 82–3, 88–94, 139 subject of becoming 378 two levels of 31–3 idea (Vorstellung) 51–2, 63, 64, 67 and representation (Vorstellungsrepräsentanz) 49, 50–1, 52, 55 identification early 473 with father 108–9 and mourning 335–6
with the Other 30–1, 126 stages 213, 214 imaginary and symbolic 19–20, 128–9 indestructible desire 86–7 initiation rites, mutilation in 384–6 inscription (Niederschriften) 66, 68 instinct 65, 66, 453
"internalization" of bad object 444–6 and introjection 443–4

jealousy 220
and mourning 333–8 women 449–50
jokes limerick 177–8, 180–1
and unconscious 60–1
Jones, Ernest 97, 100–1, 107, 108, 117, 120–1, 126, 194, 196, 219, 384, 415, 424
Hamlet 234, 241, 251–6, 269–70, 278, 279
jouissance blocking desire 427 false 190 fantasies 463–4 legal term 105
masochistic 456
masturbatory 433–4 phallus as instrument of 429 of voyeur 419–20
see also satisfaction of desire

Klein, Melanie 189, 212, 215–16, 219–20, 225–6, 311–12, 362, 432, 440–1, 443–6, 472, 477–8 knowledge 365, 379–80, 381, 397
Kris, Ernst 482

L schema, the Other in 116–17, 204
Laertes (Hamlet) 247, 259, 266, 267, 268, 288–9, 317, 329–32, 333, 334, 336
Lalande, André 8, 9, 10
Last Judgment 412
"latent dream-thoughts" 134, 138
law 105, 429–30
Lear, Edward 167
Lebovici, Ruth 414, 416
Lévi-Strauss, Claude 107
libido 4–5, 6–7, 216–17, 305, 438, 441
limerick (young lady from China) 177–8, 180–1 literary works of art 398–401
  see also Hamlet little a 312, 313–14, 368, 372–3, 377, 378, 415, 449–50, 478, 479 and capital A 370–1, 372 construction and types 382–5, 387–8 dream analysis 105, 109, 109–10 as the Other's desire 421 little Anna's dream 62, 67–71, 72–7, 78
"little cough" 148–50, 156–9, 169–70, 173–6, 194, 206, 224, 225 little Hans 104, 178, 424–6
Loening, Richard 254
Lolita 455
love 4–5, 6, 129, 410, 450
Lustprinzip see pleasure principle

Maine de Biran 386
Marburg School 56
Marx, Karl/Marxism 106–7, 313, 396
masochism 123, 455–6
masturbation 144–5, 149, 150–1, 155–6, 176–7, 185, 188, 190, 192, 198, 211
  dog 167–70, 174, 182–3, 225
masturbatory jouissance 433–4 mathematical metaphor of phallus 327 "mature desire" 364 metaphors cherries as lips 47–8 dreams as 56–7 garden as womb 208–9
  of phallus 327, 420–1 psychoanalysis as chess game 203, 204–6, 225 metonymy 23, 46, 458, 464
Mill, John Stuart 107
Millais,John Everett 267 mirror, Hamlet as 270–2 mirror illusion 18–19, 126–8, 217
mirror stage 386, 444 Molière 413
mother 31
  body in object relations theory 212, 215–20, 311–12, 383, 443–4
  Hamlet 264, 265, 280–2, 308–9, 321, 339, 352
  I as identification with 233–4 phallic mother fantasy 414
mourning see under Hamlet mouth and vagina 177–9, 181, 185, 186 mutilation in initiation rites 384–6

narcissism 104, 109, 216, 218, 386
negation (Verneinung) 79–80, 81–3, 95, 214, 421 and foreclosure 58, 76–7, 81–2, 95 neurosis
  as defense 3, 4 essence and characterization 120, 451–2, 458–9
  Hamlet 324
  historical and modern psychoanalysis 471–2 hysteria, obsession and 289–90, 295, 427–9 as not to want the Other to be castrated 229 and paranoid forms of psychosis 440 phallus, loss of/absent 431 structure of fantasy 423–6 see also little Hans; perverse fantasies; perversion

Niederschriften see inscription
"no recourse" when faced with the Other's desire 425
"not one" 421, 431

object
and desire 409–10
either/or of 451
function of 412–13
and signifier 478
split 460
and subject 84–5, 98–101, 102–5 object relations theory 438–42, 443–6, 481
mourning 335–6
Other's desire and 307–13
"object-seeking" 4, 6–7, 305
"objectivity" 361–2, 365 obsession, hysteria and neurosis 289–90, 295, 427–9 obsessive fantasy 433–4 obsessive neurosis 440
Oedipus complex 185–6, 213, 344–8, 421, 450–1
dream interpretation 91, 93, 96–7, 103–4
girls/women 125–6, 447–9
Hamlet 278–9, 295–7, 317, 351–4
Freud 235–7, 241–2, 245–7, 248, 251, 255, 257, 293–4, 341–2, 344
mourning and crime 341–4
and phallus 345–7, 351–4
omnipotence 183, 184–5, 189, 192, 225
One and the Other 217
Ophelia (Hamlet) 238, 244–5, 259, 265, 267, 302–5, 306–7 cemetery scene 333–8, 340
as desire trap 307
optimal genital development 120
"oral-anal" phase 118, 362–3, 383–4 oral-sadistic stage 383
Other castration 229, 234 demand made to 374–7 dialectic with 83–4
discourse/speech 367, 375–7, 456
Hamlet 276, 282–7, 294–5
and signifier 158–9, 168, 172–3 and ego 116, 172–3, 204 and exhibitionist/voyeur 417–18, 420, 423, 424 and hysterics/obsessives 427, 428–9 identification with 30–1, 126 image and I 220
L schema 116–17, 204 and no Other of the Other 324, 372
"not knowing" 240–1
One and 217
and phallus 212–13, 225, 300
and phobic object 425–6 real (rA) relationship 374–5, 429 relationship with 13, 14–15, 16–17, 18–19, 23, 34 and S(Ⱥ) 297–300, 324, 395, 449–50 signifier 158–9, 168, 172–3, 395
and mourning 336–7
in synchronic relationship 370–2 see also little a Other's desire 476, 478, 479, 480–1, 485
in neurosis 466
object relations theory 307–13

pain
"colicky pain" 206–7, 227–8 and death of father 90–3, 96, 113, 115–16 paranoid phase 362–3, 440, 443 parents' sexual activity/primal scene 189, 190, 208, 227, 228, 423
Pascal, Blaise 318 paternal metaphor, phallus as 421 penis see phallus
penis envy 125–6, 215
Penrose, Roger 200
perverse fantasies 416, 420–1, 422–3, 437–42 and neurotic fantasy, distinction 314–15

perverse fantasies (cont.)
and perversion, distinction 436–7, 454–5 subjective slit in 418, 419, 420, 424 perversion 362, 459–62
as brutishness 7
function of 442
function of splitting in 460–7 and perverse fantasies, distinction 436–7, 454–5 as protest 482–5 transitory, during psychoanalysis 414–15, 482
see also women/girls
phallic mother fantasy 414
phallic phase 117, 120–1, 219, 350
in women/girls 125–6, 194, 214–15
phallic woman fantasy 180
phallus 429–31, 464, 465–6 artificial phallophanies of analysis 368 barred 452
"big enough" 99–100 in child development 121, 219–20, 477–8, 479 and dialectic of Being 218–19
dog 224
in dream 144, 187, 191, 197–8, 199, 208, 211, 224–5
Hamlet 330, 331, 333, 345–7, 351–4
in initiation rites 385, 386 loss of/absent 345–7, 373, 431–2
see also castration mathematical metaphor of 327 and object of desire 321 in Oedipus complex 345–7, 351–4, 450–1 and the Other 212–13, 225, 300 as paternal metaphor 420–1 in psychoanalytic experience 212 as signifier 23–4, 101, 104, 120, 128–9, 204–6, 211, 213, 214, 225–6, 385, 429, 448, 478, 479, 486
and subject 213, 214
tumescence/pressure 386–7
see also women/girls phobias 425–6, 441–2, 482
Piaget, Jean 71, 72
Picasso, Pablo 123–4, 413
Pichon, Edouard 81–2, 95
Plato 47, 216, 397
pleasure principle and idea (Vorstellung) 63, 64, 67 and reality principle 52, 65–6, 67, 112, 358–9, 360–1 "pleasure-seeking" 4, 6–7, 305 poetic discourse/poetry 5–6, 16, 85–7 Polonius (Hamlet) 232, 237, 245, 259–60, 265, 266, 319, 321, 337–8, 353
"polymorphously perverse disposition" 437
pram in childhood memories 190, 200, 204, 206, 223, 227 pregenital object 382, 383, 396–7 primal scene/parents' sexual activity 189, 190, 208, 227, 228, 423 primary process 52, 63–7 primary masochism 123 prisoners' fable 393–4 projection 443–4
Proudhon, Pierre-Joseph 106–7 psychoanalytic theory 3–4, 9–10 and reality 436–7
see also object relations theory; specific theorists psychoanalytic experience 357–60, 446–7, 471–7, 481, 482–6 chess game metaphor 203, 204–6, 225
phallus in 212 subject and object 84–5, 98–101, 102–5 symptoms 111–12
unconscious vocabulary 119

Queen of Sweden 180
Queneau, Raymond 229, 350

Raimund, Ferdinand 399, 401 Rank, Otto 262–3

real and object 479–80 reality 379–81, 396–8
  and desire 361–6
  developmental construction of 439–42 and fantasy "cure" 414–15 presumed by analyst 473 and psychoanalytic theory 436–7 of subject 381 and symbolic 408 reality principle and pleasure principle 52, 65–6, 67, 112, 358–9, 360–1 reality testing 442 realization of desire 412 religion 410, 411, 412, 419
Renoir, Jean 85 representation (Vorstellungsrepräsentanz) 49, 50–1, 52, 55 repressed representation 49, 50–1, 55 repressed signifiers 140
repression
  censorship 73–4, 79, 279
  and elision 56, 58
  topology of 69–70, 73–4, 75–7
  and unconscious 39–40
Riviere, Joan 194
Rosencrantz and Guildenstern (Hamlet) 237, 260, 316, 323
The Rules of the Game (film) 85

($$\lozenge a$) 19, 366–7 in dream analysis 94, 96, 98, 105, 109–10, 168, 214
  Hamlet 286, 302, 305, 309–10, 320, 326–8
  in neurosis 428, 452
  perverse fantasies 454
  phallic mediation 116–17, 119, 120, 126
  see also little a
S(Ⱥ) and the Other 297–300, 324, 395, 449–50
Sand, George 463
Sartre, Jean-Paul 32, 43
satisfaction of desire 44–5, 101–2, 411–12 demand for 446–52
  see also jouissance
Saxo Grammaticus 291, 307, 318
Schreber, Judge 387, 388, 480 scientific knowledge 365, 379–80, 381, 397 sensory experience 10–11 sexual activity, parents'/primal scene 189, 190, 208, 227, 228, 423 sexual dreams 37–8
  see also dream interpretation, Sharpe sexual fantasies concerning analyst 160–1, 169, 414, 481 sexual perversion see perverse fantasies; perversion Shakespeare, William 238–9, 251, 271
  First Folio 250
  Raimund 399, 401
  Sonnets 275, 344, 354, 371 women characters 300–5
  see also Hamlet
Sharpe, Ella
  Dream Analysis 142ff.
  Hamlet 234–5, 238, 249, 250–1, 273, 318
  see also dream interpretation, Sharpe
"shifter symbols" 367–8 signification effect 138 and fetishization 313 signifying systems 67, 70
signifier(s) 5, 11, 48, 49
  in dreams 55, 56, 57–8, 77, 159, 162–3 in fantasy 163–70
  function of 443
  and object 478
  phallus see under phallus primary process 52, 66–7 and signified 16–17
  and subject 44, 360, 367–8
  topology of 66–7
  and trace 80

signifying chain(s) 10, 11–13, 16–17, 45, 57–8, 172, 408 child case study (Dick) 432–3, 446 child–family relationship 476–7 facets 138–40, 391–5 fantasy 391–6
Hamlet 246, 294, 309–10
signifying order 409 similarity of signifier, principle of 16–17 sister's sandal straps (dream image) 199–200, 201, 221, 222, 223, 233
Smith, Sydney 20–4
Sonnets (Shakespeare) 354
Sophocles 236
speech see discourse/speech Spinoza, Baruch 7–8, 125, 474 splitting function in perversion 460–7 statement and enunciation 71–2, 74–6, 78–9, 82–3, 88–94, 113–14, 135–8, 139, 139–40 subject hidden 198
metonym of being 23
and object 84–5, 98–101, 102–5 and the Other see Other and phallus 213, 214
and signifier 44, 360, 367–8 speaking 26–7, 32–4, 38, 40
unconscious 23, 478
wishing (Wunsch) 44–5 subjective slit in perverse fantasies 418, 419, 420, 424 subjectivity and desire 474 sublimation 484–5
substitution
in neurosis 451, 455, 465–6 principle of 16 subtraction 55 suicide (Hamlet)
Ophelia 244, 316
"to be or not to be" 234, 246–7, 249, 264, 430–1
superego 40, 239
symbolic and imaginary 19–20, 128–9 symbolic and real 408
symptoms 111–12
synchrony 270–3, 366–9 and diachrony 360 function of fantasy 378–9

Toulet, P.-J. 478–9
transference 188, 203, 474–5, 481
countertransference 202, 204
"transitional object" 415
transitory perversion during psychoanalysis 414–15, 482
Troilus and Cressida (Shakespeare) 301
Trotsky, Leon 115
Twelfth Night (Shakespeare) 301–2

unconscious 23, 48–52, 393–4, 395
"free association" 46, 138–9
Hamlet 273, 276, 277, 297, 299, 300
and jokes 60–1 and repression 39–40 scruples of conscience 237–8, 242–4 women and phallus 448–9 see also dream interpretation; fantasy unconscious articulations 34, 394 unconscious desire 378–9 unconscious discourse 359–60, 367, 454 unconscious fantasies, structure of 437 unconscious incestuous position 121 unconscious signifiers 35–6 unconscious subject 23, 478
"understanding" 25–6 use value and exchange value 106–7 vagina see female genitals Verneinung see negation Viardot, Désiré 486 voice(s) 387–9 breathing and 384

hallucinatory 396
Vorstellung see idea voyeurism 314, 418–20, 422–3, 424

Weil, Simon 312, 372
Wilson, John Dover 269, 405
Winnicott, Donald 415 wish for father's death 53–6, 235–6, 240, 242 wishing (Wunsch) subject 44–5 women/girls genitals (dream and fantasy) 176–81, 185–7, 188–9, 195, 197, 211
  homosexuality 465
  jealousy 449–50
  Oedipus complex 125–6, 447–9
  phallic phase 125–6, 194, 214–15
  phallic woman fantasy 180
  phallus
    demand for 447–9 without 226–7 purpose 107–8 Shakespearean characters 300–5 see also mother word association 46–8

THE ETHICS OF PSYCHOANALYSIS

1959–1960

THE SEMINAR OF JACQUES LACAN
BOOK VII

Edited by Jacques-Alain Miller

Translated with Notes by Dennis Porter

By Jacques Lacan

TELEVISION

THE SEMINAR OF JACQUES LACAN BOOK I

THE SEMINAR OF JACQUES LACAN BOOK II

THE SEMINAR OF JACQUES LACAN BOOK III

THE SEMINAR OF JACQUES LACAN BOOK VII

ECRITS: A SELECTION

FEMININE SEXUALITY

THE FOUR FUNDAMENTAL CONCEPTS OF PSYCHO-ANALYSIS

THE SEMINAR OF JACQUES LACAN

Edited by Jacques-Alain Miller

BOOK VII

The Ethics of Psychoanalysis 1959–1960

TRANSLATED WITH NOTES BY

Dennis Porter

W · W · NORTON & COMPANY

NEW YORK LONDON

Originally published in French as Le Seminaire, Livre VII
L'ethique de la psychanalyse, 1959–1960 by Les Editions du Seuil, Paris, 1986

Copyright © 1986 by Les Editions du Seuil English translation copyright © 1992 W.W. Norton & Company, Inc.
First American edition 1992
All rights reserved
Printed in the United States of America

First published as a Norton paperback 1997

Library of Congress Cataloging-in-Publication Data
Lacan, Jacques, 1901–1981
[Ethique de la psychanalyse, 1959–1960. English]
The ethics of psychoanalysis, 1959–1960 / translated with notes by Dennis Porter.—1st ed.
p. cm.—(The Seminar of Jacques Lacan ; bk. 7)
Translation of: L'éthique de la psychanalyse, 1959–1960.
1. Psychoanalysis—Moral and ethical aspects. 2. Sublimation.
3. Pleasure. 4. Tragic, The. 5. Ethics—Psychological aspects.
I. Series: Lacan, Jacques, 1901– Séminaire de Jacques Lacan.
English ; bk. 7
BF173.L14613 1988 bk. 7
[BF 175]
150.19'5 s—dc20
[150.19'5] 91-46897

ISBN 0-393-03357-0
ISBN 0-393-31613-0 pbk.
W.W. Norton & Company, Inc.
500 Fifth Avenue, New York, N.Y. 10110
W.W. Norton & Company Ltd.
10 Coptic Street, London WC1A 1PU

1 2 3 4 5 6 7 8 9 0

CONTENTS

		page
	Translator's note	vii
I	Outline of the seminar	1
	INTRODUCTION TO THE THING
II	Pleasure and reality	19
III	Rereading the Entwurf	35
IV	Das Ding	43
V	Das Ding (II)	57
VI	On the moral law	71
	THE PROBLEM OF SUBLIMATION
VII	Drives and lures	87
VIII	The object and the thing	101
IX	On creation ex nihilo	115
X	Marginal comments	128
XI	Courtly love as anamorphosis	139
XII	A critique of Bernfeld	155
	THE PARADOX OF JOUISSANCE
XIII	The death of God	167
XIV	Love of one's neighbor	179
XV	The jouissance of transgression	191
XVI	The death drive	205

XVII The function of the good 218
XVIII The function of the beautiful 231

THE ESSENCE OF TRAGEDY
A Commentary on Sophocles's Antigone

XIX The splendor of Antigone 243
XX The articulations of the play 257
XXI Antigone between two deaths 270

THE TRAGIC DIMENSION OF ANALYTICAL EXPERIENCE

XXII The demand for happiness and the promise of analysis 291
XXIII The moral goals of psychoanalysis 302
XXIV The paradoxes of ethics or Have you acted in conformity with your desire? 311

Acknowledgments 326
Bibliography 327
Index 331

TRANSLATOR'S NOTE

Some of the problems of translating Jacques Lacan's Seminars into English have already been pointed out by the translators of Seminars I and II, John Forester and Sylvana Tomaselli, and there is no point in repeating their helpful comments here. It is, however, important to recall that the Seminars now in the process of being translated were delivered from notes to an audience that for the most part had been following the progress of Lacan's thought over many years and was composed to a great extent of psychoanalysts or psychoanalysts in training. These circumstances account in part for his non-academic mode of exposition and the frequent complexity of the syntax. They also explain the closeness Lacan apparently felt to his audience, the assumptions he was able to make about the knowledge his listeners possessed, the frequent references to previous Seminars or to other activities of the Société Française de Psychanalyse, and the apparent allusiveness of some of his remarks. The latter in particular seems to derive both from what he felt he could take for granted among those who knew his work well and from a pedagogical style that made great demands on a listener.

Jacques-Alain Miller's French edition of the Ethique de la Psychanalyse is without a critical apparatus, like the other Lacan Seminars that have so far been published. Miller reproduces Lacan's lectures virtually unmediated, and it seemed proper to model the English edition of the work on the French. As a consequence, footnotes have been kept to a minimum; they are chiefly limited to linguistic difficulties where for one reason or another English is unable to render fully the significance of the French–the most obvious of such cases is Lacan's not infrequent plays on words. However, a bibliography of authors and works cited by Lacan in the course of the Seminar is included. I have also followed the French edition in leaving German and Greek words in the original where Lacan did so in the context of analyzing German or Greek texts; in most cases, he gave at the same time a French equivalent or a paraphrase of a concept's meaning. Only in the case of titles have I given the English translation in brackets after the first occurrence.

The task of the translator is, I take it, a critically self-effacing one that insofar as possible avoids the temptation to play editor by reducing ambiguities or by "naturalizing" the strangeness of an original in its passage into the native idiom. Thus, the goals I gave myself were accuracy rather than elegance and a flexibility of tone that matches the different registers of Lacan's expository style. The excitement for those who encounter his Seminars in the original French is in the experience of a thought in the making. And it is important to render in the English this liveliness of a distinguished mind at work before an audience, even at the occasional cost of some awkwardnesses. The difficulty was in trying to render in a different linguistic code a captivating spoken word that sometimes meanders, throws out asides, refers backwards or anticipates future problems, moves through passages dense with difficult ideas, narrates an illustrative comic anecdote, draws out the forgotten etymological significance of a word or resorts suddenly to popular speech. The pleasure for the translator is in discovering equivalents for such movements within the very different resources of his own language.

It is for the most part not Lacan's psychoanalytic or philosophical discourse that causes difficulties, but his syntax and, given that the Norton edition of the Seminars has as its potential audience the English-speaking world as a whole, his use of familiar language and colloquialisms. As far as the former is concerned, Lacan frequently uses French prepositions and prepositional phrases in startlingly new ways; thus one of the most difficult words to translate turned out to be "de." As for Lacan's colloquialisms, it seemed to me important wherever possible to find equivalents that were not too obviously recognizable as "Americanisms" or as "Britishisms," but have a more general currency. Finally, a few minor errors in the French have been corrected in the translation.

I would like to thank my colleague Edward S. Phinney for help with the Greek and Susan Barrows both for her editorial support and for a careful reading of the manuscript.

DENNIS PORTER
Amherst, Massachusetts, October 1991

I

Outline of the seminar

THE ATTRACTION OF TRANSGRESSION[1]
FROM ARISTOTLE TO FREUD
THE REAL
THE THREE IDEALS

I announced that the title of my seminar this year was The Ethics of Psychoanalysis. I do not think that this is a subject whose choice is in any way surprising in itself, although it does leave open for some of you the question of what I might have in mind.

It was certainly not without some hesitation and even trepidation that I decided to tackle it. I, in fact, decided to do so because the subject follows directly from my seminar of last year, if it is true that we can consider that work as completely finished.

In any case, we must move forward. Given all that is implied by the phrase, the ethics of psychoanalysis will allow me, far more than anything else, to test the categories that I believe enable me, through my teaching, to give you the most suitable instruments for understanding what is new both in Freud's work and in the experience of psychoanalysis that derives from it.

New in relation to what? In relation to something that is both very general and very specific. Very general to the extent that the experience of psychoanalysis is highly significant for a certain moment in the history of man, namely, the one we are living in, although this does not imply we are able – far from it – to specify what the collective work we are engaged in means. Very specific, on the other hand, like our daily work, namely, in the way in which we have to respond in experience to what I have taught you to articulate as a demand, a patient's demand, to which our response gives an exact meaning. And in our response itself we must maintain the strictest discipline, so as not to let its deeply unconscious meaning be adulterated by that demand.

[1] Lacan's word here, "la faute," is particularly difficult to put into English because of the great range of its potential equivalents – from wrong, error, mistake to blame, misconduct and offense – and because the most obvious choice does not have the moral resonances of the French. "The Attraction of the Fault" not only does not suggest anything, but even manages to sound like pidgin English. And the same is true of "The Universe of the Fault."

In speaking of the ethics of psychoanalysis, I chose a word which to my mind was no accident. I might have said "morality" instead. If I say "ethics," you will soon see why. It is not because I take pleasure in using a term that is less common.

1

Let us begin by noting this – something that, in a word, makes the subject eminently accessible and even tempting. It is my belief that no one who is involved with psychoanalysis has not been drawn to treat the subject of its ethics. I am not the one who created the expression. Moreover, it is impossible not to acknowledge that we are submerged in what are strictly speaking moral problems.

Our experience has led us to explore further than has been attempted before the universe of transgression. That is the expression which, with an extra adjective, my colleague Hesnard uses. He refers to the morbid universe of transgression. And it is doubtless from this morbid point of view that we approach it at its highest point.

In truth, that point of view is impossible to dissociate from the universe of transgression as such. And the link between transgression and morbidity has not failed in our time to mark with its seal all thought about morals. It is even strange sometimes – something I have drawn your attention to before in my asides – to see in religious circles a certain vertigo seize those who are engaged in thinking about moral questions when they come face to face with what our experience has to offer. It is remarkable to see how they, as it were, give in to the temptation of an excessive and even comic optimism, and start to think that a decline of morbidity might lead transgression to vanish.

In fact, what we are dealing with is nothing less than the attraction of transgression.

And what is this transgression? It is certainly not the same as the one the patient commits with the expectation of being punished or punishing himself. When we speak of the need for punishment, we are certainly referring to a transgression which is on the path of this need and which is sought out to obtain this punishment. But that way we are only carried a little further toward some yet more obscure transgression which calls for punishment.

Is it the transgression that Freud's work points to from the beginning, the murder of the father, the great myth that he places at the origin of the development of civilization? Or is it that even more obscure and original transgression for which he finds a name at the end of his work, in a word, the death instinct, to the extent that man finds himself anchored deep within to its formidable dialectic?

It is between these two terms that one finds in Freud a body of thought, a development whose precise significance it will be our task to determine. But it is not, in truth, in the sphere either of practice or of theory that is to be found all that which makes me emphasize the importance of the ethical dimension in my experience and my teaching of Freud. In effect, as has been quite properly pointed out, not everything in ethics is simply related to the sense of obligation.

Moral experience as such, that is to say, the reference to sanctions, puts man in a certain relation to his own action that concerns not only an articulated law but also a direction, a trajectory, in a word, a good that he appeals to, thereby engendering an ideal of conduct. All that, too, properly speaking constitutes the dimension of ethics and is situated beyond the notion of a command, beyond what offers itself with a sense of obligation. That is why I believe it necessary to relate the dimension of our experience to the contribution of those who have attempted in our time to advance moral thought – I am, in fact, alluding to Fritz Rauh, whom we will be concerned with as one of our reference points in this exercise.

But I am certainly not one of those who gladly sets the sense of obligation aside. If there is, in fact, something that psychoanalysis has drawn attention to, it is, beyond the sense of obligation properly speaking, the importance, I would even say the omnipresence, of a sense of guilt. Certain internal tendencies of ethical thought attempt to evade what it must be said is this disagreeable aspect of moral experience. If I am certainly not one of those who attempt to soften, blunt, or attenuate the sense of guilt, it is because in my daily experience I am too insistently brought back to it and reminded of it.

It nevertheless remains true that analysis is the experience which has restored to favor in the strongest possible way the productive function of desire as such. This is so evidently the case that one can, in short, say that the genesis of the moral dimension in Freud's theoretical elaboration is located nowhere else than in desire itself. It is from the energy of desire that that agency is detached which at the end of its development will take the form of the censor.

Thus something is enclosed in a circle that was imposed on us, deduced from what is most characteristic in our experience.

A certain philosophy – it immediately preceded the one which is the nearest relative to the Freudian enterprise, the one which was transmitted to us in the nineteenth century – a certain eighteenth-century philosophy assumed as its task what might be called the naturalist liberation of desire. One might characterize this thought, this particularly practical thought, as that of the man of pleasure. Now the naturalist liberation of desire has failed. The more the theory, the more the work of social criticism, the more the sieve of that experience, which tended to limit obligation to certain precise functions in the social order, have raised in us the hope of relativizing the imperative, the contrary, or, in a word, conflictual character of moral experience, the more we have, in fact, witnessed a growth in the incidence of genuine pathologies. The naturalist liberation of desire has failed historically. We do not find ourselves in the presence of a man less weighed down with laws and duties than before the great critical experience of so-called libertine thought.

If we find ourselves led to consider even in retrospect the experience of that man of pleasure – through reflection on what psychoanalysis has contributed to the knowledge and the circumstances of perverse experience – we will soon see that in truth everything in this moral theory was to destine it to failure.

In effect, although the experience of the man of pleasure presents itself with an ideal of naturalist liberation, one has only to read the major authors – I mean those who in expressing themselves on the subject have adopted the boldest approaches to libertinage, and even to eroticism itself – to realize that this experience contains a note of defiance, a kind of trial by ordeal in relation to that which remains the terminal point of this argument, an undoubtedly diminished but nevertheless fixed term. And that is nothing less than the divine term.

As the creator of nature, God is summoned to account for the extreme anomalies whose existence the Marquis de Sade, Mirabeau, and Diderot, among others, have drawn our attention to. This challenge, this summoning, this trial by ordeal ought not to allow any other way out than the one that was, in effect, realized historically. He who submits himself to the ordeal finds at the end its premises, namely, the Other to whom this ordeal is addressed, in the last analysis its Judge. That is precisely what gives its special tone to this literature, which presents us with the dimension of the erotic in a way that has never been achieved since, never equaled. In the course of our investigation, we definitely must submit to our judgment that which in analysis has retained an affinity with, a relationship to, and a common root with, such an experience.

Here we are touching on a prespective that has been little explored in analysis. It seems that from the moment of those first soundings, from the sudden flash of light that the Freudian experience cast on the paradoxical origins of desire, on the polymorphously perverse character of its infantile forms, a general tendency has led psychoanalysts to reduce the paradoxical origins in order to show their convergence in a harmonious conclusion. This movement has on the whole characterized the progress of analytical thought to the point where it is worth asking if this theoretical progress was not leading in the end to an even more all-embracing moralism than any that has previously existed. Psychoanalysis would seem to have as its sole goal the calming of guilt – although we know well through our practical experience the difficulties and obstacles, indeed the reactions, that such an approach entails. This approach involves the taming of perverse jouissance, which is assumed to emerge from the demonstration of its universality, on the one hand, and its function, on the other.

No doubt the term "component," used for designating the perverse drive, is in this situation given its full weight. Last year we explored the expression "component drive"; in a whole section of our remarks we were concerned with the insights that analysis affords concerning the function of desire and with the deep finality of that really remarkable diversity, which explains the value of the catalogue of human instincts that analysis has allowed us to draw up.

Perhaps the question will only be seen in sharp relief, when one compares the position that our point of view of the term desire has led us to, with that which is, for example, articulated in the work of Aristotle in connection with ethics. I will give him an important place in my discussion, including particularly that work which lays out Aristotelian ethics in its most elaborate form, the Nicomachean Ethics. There are two points in Aristotle's work in which he shows how a whole register of desire is literally situated by him outside of the field of morality.

Where a certain category of desires is involved, there is, in effect, no ethical problem for Aristotle. Yet these very desires are nothing less than those notions that are situated in the forefront of our experience. A whole large field of what constitutes for us the sphere of sexual desires is simply classed by Aristotle in the realm of monstrous anomalies – he uses the term "bestiality" with reference to them. What occurs at this level has nothing to do with moral evaluation. The ethical questions that Aristotle raises are located altogether elsewhere – I will give you an idea later of their thrust and essence. That is a point of special importance.

On the other hand, if one believes that the whole of Aristotle's morality has lost none of its relevance for moral theory, then one can measure from that fact how subversive our experience is, since it serves to render his theory surprising, primitive, paradoxical and, in truth, incomprehensible.

But all that is just a stop on our journey. What I really want to do this morning is to give you an outline of this seminar.

2

We are faced with the question of what analysis allows us to formulate concerning the origin of morality.

Is its contribution limited to the elaboration of a mythology that is more credible and more secular than that which claims to be revealed? I have in mind the reconstructed mythology of Totem and Taboo, which starts out from the experience of the original murder of the father, from the circumstances that give rise to it and its consequences. From this point of view, it is the transformation of the energy of desire which makes possible the idea of the genesis of its repression. As a result, the transgression is not in this instance just something which is imposed on us in a formal way; it is instead something worthy of our praise, felix culpa, since it is at the origin of a higher complexity, something to which the realm of civilization owes its development.

In short, is everything limited to the genesis of the superego whose description is formulated, perfected, deepened, and made more complex as Freud's work progresses? We will see that this genesis of the superego is not simply a psychogenesis and a sociogenesis. Indeed, it is impossible to articulate it by limiting oneself merely to the register of collective needs. Something is imposed there whose jurisdiction is to be distinguished from pure and simple social necessity – it is properly speaking something whose unique scope I am trying to make you appreciate here in terms of the relation to the signifier and to the law of discourse. We must maintain the autonomy of this term if we want to be able to locate our experience precisely or simply correctly.

Here no doubt the distinction between culture and society contains something that might appear new or even divergent in comparison with what is found in a certain kind of teaching of the analytical experience. I hope, in fact, to point out to you the references to such a distinction and the scope they occupy in Freud himself, a distinction whose authority I am far from alone in promoting or emphasizing the need for.

And in order to draw your attention immediately to the work in which we will take up the problem, I refer you to Civilization and Its Discontents, published in 1922 and written by Freud after the working out of his second topic, that is to say after he had placed in the foreground the highly problematic notion of the death instinct. You will find expressed there in striking phrases the idea that what, in brief, happens in the progress of civilization, those discontents that are to be explored, is situated, as far as man is concerned, far above him – the man involved here being the one who finds himself at that turning point in history where Freud himself and his work are situated. We will come back to the significance of Freud's formula and I will draw your attention to its significance in the text. But I believe it to be important enough for me to point it out to you right away, and already sufficiently illuminated in my teaching, where I show the originality of the Freudian conversion in the relation of man to the logos.

This Civilization and Its Discontents that I invite you to get to know or to reread in the context of Freud's work is not just a set of notes. It is not the kind of thing one grants a practitioner or a scientist somewhat indulgently, as his way of making an excursion into philosophical inquiry without our giving it all the technical importance one would accord to such a thought coming from someone who considers himself to belong to the category of philosopher. Such a view of this work of Freud's is widespread among psychoanalysts and is definitely to be rejected. Civilization and Its Discontents is an indispensable work, unsurpassed for an understanding of Freud's thought and the summation of his experience. It illuminates, emphasizes, dissipates the ambiguities of wholly distinct points of the analytical experience and of what our view of man should be – given that it is with man, with an immemorial human demand, that we have to deal on a daily basis in our experience.

As I have already said, moral experience is not limited to that acceptance of necessity, to that form in which such experience presents itself in every individual case. Moral experience is not simply linked to that slow recognition of the function that was defined and made autonomous by Freud under the term of superego, nor to that exploration of its paradoxes, to what I have called the obscene and ferocious figure in which the moral agency appears when we seek it at its root.

The moral experience involved in psychoanalysis is the one that is summed up in the original imperative proposed in what might be called the Freudian ascetic experience, namely, that Wo es war, soll Ich werden with which Freud concludes the second part of his Vorlesungen (Introductory Lectures) on psychoanalysis. The root of this is given in an experience that deserves the term "moral experience," and is found at the very beginning of the entry of the patient into analysis.

That "I" which is supposed to come to be where "it" was, and which analysis has taught us to evaluate, is nothing more than that whose root we already found in the "I" which asks itself what it wants. It is not only questioned, but as it progresses in its experience, it asks itself that question and asks it precisely in the place where strange, paradoxical, and cruel commands are suggested to it by its morbid experience.

Will it or will it not submit itself to the duty that it feels within like a stranger, beyond, at another level? Should it or should it not submit itself to the half-unconscious, paradoxical, and morbid command of the superego, whose jurisdiction is moreover revealed increasingly as the analytical exploration goes forward and the patient sees that he is committed to its path?

If I may put it thus, isn't its true duty to oppose that command? One finds here something which belongs to the givens of our experience as well as to the givens of preanalysis. It is enough to see how the experience of an obsessional is structured at the beginning to know that the enigma concerning the term "duty" as such is always already formulated even before he formulates the demand for help, which is what he goes into analysis for.

In truth, although the response to the problem that we are proposing here is obviously illustrated in the conflict of an obsessional, it nevertheless has a universal validity; that is why there are different ethics and there is ethical thought. It is not simply the philsosopher's thought alone that seeks to justify duty, that duty on which we have shed a variety of light – genetical and originary, for example. The justification of that which presents itself with an immediate feeling of obligation, the justification of duty as such – not simply in one or other of its commands, but in the form imposed – is at the heart of an inquiry that is universal.

Are we analysts simply something that welcomes the suppliant then, something that gives him a place of refuge? Are we simply, but it is already a lot, something that must respond to a demand, to the demand not to suffer, at least without understanding why? – in the hope that through understanding the subject will be freed not only from his ignorance, but also from suffering itself.

Isn't it obvious that analytical ideals are normally to be found here? They are certainly not lacking. They grow in abundance. The evaluation, location, situation, and organization of values, as they say in a certain register of moral thought, that we propose to our patients, and around which we organize the assessments of their progress and the transformation of their way into a path, is supposed to be part of our work. For the moment I will mention three of these ideals.

The first is the ideal of human love.

Do I need to emphasize the role that we attribute to a certain idea of "love fulfilled"? That is an expression you must have learned to recognize and not only here, since, in truth, there is hardly an analyst who writes who has not drawn attention to it. And you know that I have often taken aim at the approximative and vague character, so tainted with an optimistic moralism, which marks the original articulations taking the form of the genitalization of desire. That is the ideal of genital love – a love that is supposed to be itself alone the model of a satisfying object relation: doctor-love, I would say if I wanted to emphasize in a comical way the tone of this ideology; love as hygiene, I would say, to suggest what analytical ambition seems to be limited to here.

It is a problem that I will not expand on indefinitely, since I have not stopped making you think about it since this seminar began. But so as to give it a more marked emphasis, I will point out that analytical thought seems to shirk its task when faced with the convergent character of our experience. This character is certainly not deniable, but the analyst seems to find in it a limit beyond which it is difficult for him to go. To say that the problems of moral experience are entirely resolved as far as monogamous union is concerned would be a formulation that is imprudent, excessive, and inadequate.

Analysis has brought a very important change of perspective on love by placing it at the center of ethical experience; it has also brought an original note, which was certainly different from the way in which love had previously been viewed by the moralistes and the philosophers in the economy of inter-human relations. Why then has analysis not gone further in the direction of the investigation of what should properly be called an erotics? That is something that deserves reflection.

In this connection the topic I have placed on the agenda of our forthcoming conference, namely, feminine sexuality, is one of the clearest of signs in the development of analysis of the lack I am referring to with regard to such an investigation. It is hardly necessary to recall what Jones learned from a source that to my mind is not especially qualified, but which, believe it or not, is nevertheless supposed at the very least to have transmitted in his exact words what it heard from Freud's own mouth. Jones tells us that this person told him confidentially that one day Freud said something like "After some thirty years of experience and thought, there is still one question to which I am still unable to find an answer; it is 'Was will das Weib?' " What does woman want? Or more precisely, "What does she desire?" The term "will" in this expression may have that meaning in German.

Have we gone much further on that subject? It will not be a waste of time if I show you the kind of avoidance that the progress of research in analysis has practiced in answering a question that cannot be said to have been invented by it. Let us just say that analysis, and the thought of Freud in particular, is connected to a time that articulated this question with a special emphasis. The Ibsenian context of the end of the nineteenth century in which Freud's thought matured cannot be overlooked here. And it is, in brief, very strange that analytical experience has if anything stifled, silenced, and evaded those areas of the problem of sexuality which relate to the point of view of feminine demand.

The second ideal, which is equally as remarkable in analytical experience, is what I shall call the ideal of authenticity.

I do not think I need to emphasize it particularly. It will not have escaped you that if psychoanalysis is a technique of unmasking, it presupposes such a point of view. But, in fact, it goes further than that.

It is not simply as a path, stage, or measure of progress that authenticity suggests itself to us; it is also quite simply as a certain norm for the finished product, as something desirable and, therefore, as a value. It is an ideal, but one on which we are led to impose clinical norms that are very precise. I will illustrate the point in the very subtle observations of Helene Deutsch concerning a type of character and of personality that one cannot describe as maladjusted or as failing to meet any of the norms demanded by social relations, but whose whole attitude and behavior are visible in the recognition – of whom? – of the other, of others, as if marked by that note that she calls in English "as if," and which in German is "als ob." I am touching here on the point that a certain register – which is not defined and is not simple and cannot be situated other than from a moral perspective – is present, controlling, insisted on in all our experience, and that it is necessary to calculate to what extent we are adequate to it.

That something harmonious, that full presence whose lack we as clinicians can so precisely gauge – doesn't our technique stop half-way toward what is required to achieve it, the technique that I have christened "unmasking"? Wouldn't it be interesting to wonder about the significance of our absence from the field of what might be called a science of virtues, a practical reason, the sphere of common sense? For in truth one cannot say that we ever intervene in the field of any virtue. We clear ways and paths, and we hope that what is called virtue will take root there.

Similarly, we have recently forged a third ideal, which I am not sure belongs to the original space of analytical experience, the ideal of non-dependence or, more precisely, of a kind of prophylaxis of dependence.

Isn't there a limit there, too, a fine boundary, which separates what we indicate to an adult subject as desirable in this register and the means we accord ourselves in our interventions so that he achieves it?

It is enough to remember the fundamental, constitutive reservations of the Freudian position concerning education in the broad sense. There is no doubt that all of us, and child analysts in particular, are led to encroach on this domain, to practice in the space of what I have called elsewhere an orthopedics in its etymological sense. But it is nevertheless striking that both in the means we employ and in the theoretical competence we insist on, the ethics of analysis – for there is one – involves effacement, setting aside, withdrawal, indeed, the absence of a dimension that one only has to mention in order to realize how much separates us from all ethical thought that preceded us. I mean the dimension of habits, good and bad habits.

It is something we refer to very little because psychoanalytic thought defines itself in very different terms, in terms of traumas and their persistence. We have obviously learned to decompose a given trauma, impression, or mark, but the very essence of the unconscious is defined in a different register from the one which Aristotle emphasizes in the Ethics in a play on words, ἔθος / ἦθος.[2]

There are extremely subtle distinctions that may be centered on the notion of character. Ethics for Aristotle is a science of character: the building of character, the dynamics of habits and, even more, action with relation to habits, training, education. You must take a look at his exemplary work, if only to understand the difference between our modes of thought and those of one of the most eminent forms of ethical thought.

[2] Both ἦθος and ἔθος derive from a Greek verb meaning "to repeat." Their meanings came to be differentiated insofar as ἦθος is active and refers to the capacity of creatures to form habits, whereas ἔθος connotes a condition in a passive sense.

3

So as to emphasize what today's premises are leading us toward, I will simply note that although the topics on which I have attempted to open up different perspectives are varied, I will try next time to start from a radical position. In order to point out the originality of the Freudian position in ethical matters, I must underline a slippage or a change of attitude relative to the question of morality as such.

In Aristotle the problem is that of a good, of a Sovereign Good. We will have to consider why he emphasized the problem of pleasure, its function in the mental economy of ethics from the beginning. It is something that we cannot avoid, not least because it is the reference point of the Freudian theory concerning the two systems φ and ψ, the two psychical agencies that he called the primary and secondary processes.

Is the same pleasure function at work in both of these articulations? It is almost impossible to isolate this difference if we do not realize what took place in the interval. Even if it is not my role and if the place I occupy here doesn't seem to make it obligatory, I will not, in fact, be able to avoid a certain inquiry into historical progress.

It is at this point that I must refer to those guiding terms, those terms of reference which I use, namely, the symbolic, the imaginary, and the real.

More than once at the time when I was discussing the symbolic and the imaginary and their reciprocal interaction, some of you wondered what after all was "the real." Well, as odd as it may seem to that superficial opinion which assumes any inquiry into ethics must concern the field of the ideal, if not of the unreal, I, on the contrary, will proceed instead from the other direction by going more deeply into the notion of the real. Insofar as Freud's position constitutes progress here, the question of ethics is to be articulated from the point of view of the location of man in relation to the real. To appreciate this, one has to look at what occurred in the interval between Aristotle and Freud.

At the beginning of the nineteenth century, there was the utilitarian conversion or reversion. We can define this moment – one that was no doubt fully conditioned historically – in terms of a radical decline of the function of the master, a function that obviously governs all of Aristotle's thought and determines its persistence over the centuries. It is in Hegel that we find expressed an extreme devalorization of the position of the master, since Hegel turns him into the great dupe, the magnificent cuckold of historical development, given that the virtue of progress passes by way of the vanquished, which is to say, of the slave, and his work. Originally, when he existed in his plenitude in Aristotle's time, the master was something very different from the Hegelian fiction, which is nothing more than his obverse, his negation, the sign of his disappearance. It is shortly before that terminal moment that in the wake of a certain revolution affecting interhuman relations, so-called utilitarian thought arose, and it is far from being made up of the pure and simple platitudes one imagines.

It is not just a matter of a thought that asks which goods are available on the market to be distributed and the best way to effect the distribution. One finds there an investigation of something of which Mr. Jakobson, who is here today, first found the key, the little latch, in a hint he gave me concerning the interest of a work of Jeremy Bentham's that is ordinarily neglected in the summary of his contribution traditionally given.

This personage is far from meriting the discredit, indeed the ridicule, which a certain critical philosophy might formulate concerning his role in the history of the development of ethics. We will see that it is in relation to a critical philosophy or, more properly, a linguistic one that his thought is developed. It is impossible to measure so well anywhere else the emphasis given in the course of this revolution to the term real, which in his thought is placed in opposition to the English term "fictitious."[3]

"Fictitious" does not mean illusory or deceptive as such. It is far from being translatable into French by "fictif," although this is something that the man who was the key to his success on the continent, Etienne Dumont, did not fail to do – he was also responsible for popularizing Bentham's thought. "Fictitious" means "fictif" but, as I have already explained to you, in the sense that every truth has the structure of fiction.

Bentham's effort is located in the dialectic of the relationship of language to the real so as to situate the good – pleasure in this case, which, as we will see, he articulates in a manner that is very different from Aristotle – on the side of the real. And it is within this opposition between fiction and reality that is to be found the rocking motion of Freudian experience.

Once the separation between the fictitious and the real has been effected, things are no longer situated where one might expect. In Freud the characteristic of pleasure, as that dimension which binds man, is to be found on the side of the fictitious. The fictitious is not, in effect, in its essence that which deceives, but is precisely what I call the symbolic.

That the unconscious is structured as a function of the symbolic, that it is the return of a sign that the pleasure principle makes man seek out, that the pleasurable element in that which directs man in his behavior without his knowledge (namely, that which gives him pleasure, because it is a form of euphony), that that which one seeks and finds again is the trace rather than the trail – one has to appreciate the great importance of all of this in Freud's thought, if one is to understand the function of reality.

[3] In English in the original.

Certainly Freud leaves no doubt, any more than Aristotle, that what man is seeking, his goal, is happiness. It's odd that in almost all languages happiness offers itself in terms of a meeting – τυχη. Except in English and even there it's very close. A kind of favorable divinity is involved. Bonheur in French suggests to us augurum, a good sign and a fortunate encounter. Glück is the same as gelück. "Happiness" is after all "happen"[4]; it, too, is an encounter, even if one does not feel the need to add the prefix, which strictly speaking indicates the happy character of the thing.

It is nevertheless not clear that all these terms are synonyms – I hardly need to remind you of the story of the individual who emigrated from Germany to America and who was asked, "Are you happy?" "Oh, yes, I am very happy," he answered, "I am really very, very happy, aber nicht glücklich!"

It does not escape Freud's attention that happiness as far as we are concerned is what must be offered as the goal of our striving, however ethical it might be. But what stands out clearly – in spite of the fact that it is not given sufficient importance on the grounds that we cease to listen to a man as soon as he steps outside his sphere of expertise – is that I prefer to read in Civilization and Its Discontents the idea Freud expresses there concerning happiness, namely, that absolutely nothing is prepared for it, either in the macrocosm or the microcosm.

That is the point which is completely new. Aristotle's thought on the subject of pleasure embodies the idea that pleasure has something irrefutable about it, and that it is situated at the guiding pole of human fulfillment, insofar as if there is something divine in man, it is in his bond to nature.

You should consider how far that notion of nature is different from ours, since it involves the exclusion of all bestial desires from what is properly speaking human fulfillment. Since Aristotle's time we have experienced a complete reversal of point of view. As far as Freud is concerned, everything that moves toward reality requires a certain tempering, a lowering of tone, of what is properly speaking the energy of pleasure.

That has a huge importance, although it may seem to you as men of our time rather banal. I have even heard it said that Lacan doesn't say much more than "The king is naked." Perhaps after all I was the one referred to, but let us assume the best, namely, that it had to do with my teaching. Of course, I do teach in a somewhat more humorous way than my critic thinks – I don't under the circumstances have to reflect on his hidden intentions. If I do say "The king is naked," it is not in the same way as the child who is supposed to have exposed the universal illusion, but more in the manner of Alphonse Allais, who gathered a crowd around him by announcing in a sonorous voice, "How shocking! Look at that woman! Beneath her dress she's stark naked!" Yet in truth I don't even say that.

[4] In English in the original.

If the king is, in fact, naked, it is only insofar as he is so beneath a certain number of clothes – no doubt fictitious but nevertheless essential to his nudity. And in connection with these clothes, as another good story of Alphonse Allais demonstrates, his very nakedness might never be naked enough. After all, a king can be skinned alive as easily as a female dancer.

In truth, the point of view of this absolutely closed character reminds us of the way in which the fictions of desire are organized. It is in this respect that the formulas I gave you last year on the fantasm are significant and that the notion of desire as desire of the Other assumes its full weight.

I will end today with a note concerning the Traumdeutung (The Interpretation of Dreams) taken from the Introduction to Psychoanalysis. A second factor that guides us, writes Freud, one that is much more important and is completely overlooked by the layman, is the following. It is certainly true that the satisfaction of a wish does give pleasure but, as is well known, the dreamer – I don't think I am going too far when I find here a Lacanian emphasis in a certain way of posing the problem – does not have a simple and unambiguous relationship to his wish. He rejects it, he censures it, he doesn't want it. Here we encounter the essential dimension of desire – it is always desire in the second degree, desire of desire.

In truth, we can expect Freudian analysis to create a little order in that sphere to which critical thought has turned in recent years, namely, the famous, indeed over-famous, theory of values – the very one that allows one of its proponents to say that the value of a thing is its desirability. Pay attention now – the point is to know if it is worthy of being desired, if it is desirable for one to desire it. The result is a kind of catalogue that in many ways might be compared to a second-hand clothes store in which one finds piled up the different judgments that down through the ages and up to our time have dominated human aspirations in their diversity and even their chaos.

The structure embodied in the imaginary relation as such, by reason of the fact that narcissistic man enters as a double into the dialectic of fiction, will perhaps find its explanation at the end of the inquiry we are conducting this year into the ethics of psychoanalysis. In the end you will see emerge the question posed by the fundamental character of masochism in the economy of the instincts.

No doubt something should remain open relative to the place we currently occupy in the development of erotics and to the treatment to be given, not simply to one individual or other, but to civilization and its discontents. Perhaps we should give up the hope of any genuine innovation in the field of ethics – and to a certain extent one might say that a sign of this is to be found in the fact that, in spite of all our theoretical progress, we haven't even been able to create a single new perversion. But it would be a definite sign that we have really arrived at the heart of the problem of existing perversions, if we managed to deepen our understanding of the economic role of masochism.

Since it is useful to give oneself a goal that is attainable, that will, I hope, in the end be the point with which we will conclude this year.

November 18, 1959

INTRODUCTION TO THE THING

II

Pleasure and reality

THE MORAL AGENCY ACTUALIZES THE REAL INERTIA AND RECTIFICATION REALITY IS PRECARIOUS OPPOSITION AND INTERSECTION OF THE PRINCIPLES

Honey is what I am trying to bring you, the honey of my reflections on something that, my goodness, I have been doing for a number of years and which is beginning to add up, but which, as time goes by, ends up not being that much out of proportion with the time you devote to it yourselves.

If the communication effect here sometimes presents difficulties, reflect on the experience of honey. Honey is either very hard or very fluid. If it's hard, it is difficult to cut, since there are no natural breaks. If it's very liquid, it is suddenly all over the place – I assume that you are all familiar with the experience of eating honey in bed at breakfast time.

Hence the problem of pots. The honey pot is reminiscent of the mustard pot that I have already dealt with. The two have exactly the same meaning now that we no longer imagine that the hexagons in which we tend to store our harvest have a natural relationship to the structure of the world. Consequently, the question we are raising is in the end always the same, i.e., what is the significance of the word?

This year we are more specifically concerned with realizing how the ethical question of our practice is intimately related to one that we have been in a position to glimpse for some time, namely, that the deep dissatisfaction we find in every psychology – including the one we have founded thanks to psychoanalysis – derives from the fact that it is nothing more than a mask, and sometimes even an alibi, of the effort to focus on the problem of our own action – something that is the essence and very foundation of all ethical reflection. In other words, we need to know if we have managed to do anything more than take a small step outside ethics and if, like the other psychologies, our own is simply another development of ethical reflection, of the search for a guide or a way, that in the last analysis may be formulated as follows: "Given our condition as men, what must we do in order to act in the right way?"

This reminder seems to me difficult to disagree with, when every day of our lives our action suggests to us that we are not far removed from that. Of course, things present themselves differently to us. Our way of introducing this action, of presenting and justifying it, is different. Its beginning is characterized by features of demand, appeal and urgency, whose specialized meaning places us closer to earth as far as the idea of the articulation of an ethics is concerned. But that does not change the fact that we may in the end, or at any point whatsoever, discover such an articulation once again in its completeness – the kind of articulation that has always given both meaning and arguments to those who have reflected on morals and have tried to elaborate their different ethics.

1

Last time I sketched an outline of what I wish to cover this year. It extends from the recognition of the omnipresence of the moral imperative, of its infiltration into all our experience, to the other pole, that is to say, the pleasure in a second degree we may paradoxically find there, namely, moral masochism.

In passing, I pointed out the unexpected and original approach I intend to develop with reference to those fundamental categories of the symbolic, the imaginary, and the real, that I use to orient you in your experience. My thesis, as I already indicated – and don't be surprised if it first appears confused, since it is the development of my argument that will give it weight – my thesis is that the moral law, the moral command, the presence of the moral agency in our activity, insofar as it is structured by the symbolic, is that through which the real is actualized – the real as such, the weight of the real.

A thesis that may appear to be both a trivial truth and a paradox. My thesis involves the idea that the moral law affirms itself in opposition to pleasure, and we can sense that to speak of the real in connection with the moral law seems to put into question the value of what we normally include in the notion of the ideal. Thus for the moment I will not attempt to polish further the blade of my argument, since what will likely constitute the thrust of my purpose has precisely to do with the meaning to be given to the term real – within that system of categories that I profess as a function of our practice as analysts.

That meaning isn't immediately accessible, although those among you who have wondered about the final significance I might give the term will nevertheless have already noticed that its meaning must have some relationship to that movement which traverses the whole of Freud's thought. It is a movement which makes him start with a first opposition between reality principle and pleasure principle in order, after a series of vacillations, oscillations and imperceptible changes in his references, to conclude at the end of the theoretic formulations by positing something beyond the pleasure principle that might well leave us wondering how it relates to the first opposition. Beyond the pleasure principle we encounter that opaque surface which to some has seemed so obscure that it is the antimony of all thought – not just biological but scientific in general – the surface that is known as the death instinct.

What is the death instinct? What is this law beyond all law, that can only be posited as a final structure, as a vanishing point of any reality that might be attained? In the coupling of pleasure principle and reality principle, the reality principle might seem to be a prolongation or an application of the pleasure principle. But, on the other hand, this dependent and limited position seems to cause something to emerge, something which controls in the broadest of senses the whole of our relationship to the world. It is this unveiling, this rediscovery, that Beyond the Pleasure Principle is about. And in this process, this progress, we see before our eyes the problematic character of that which Freud posits under the term reality.

Is it a question of daily reality, of immediate, social reality? Of conformity to established categories or accepted practices? Of the reality discovered by science or of the one which is yet to be discovered? Is it psychic reality?

It is on the road to the investigation of this reality that we find ourselves as analysts, and it leads us a long way from something that can be expressed under the category of wholeness. It leads us into a special area, that of psychic reality, which presents itself to us with the problematic character of a previously unequaled order.

I will, therefore, begin by attempting to explore the function that the term reality played in the thought of the inventor of psychoanalysis and, at the same time, in our own thought, the thought of those of us who have followed in his path. On the other hand, I will straight away point out to those who might be inclined to forget it, or who might think that I am following in this direction only by referring to the moral imperative in our experience – I will point out that moral action poses problems for us precisely to the extent that if analysis prepares us for it, it also in the end leaves us standing at the door.

Moral action is, in effect, grafted on to the real. It introduces something new into the real and thereby opens a path in which the point of our presence is legitimized. How is it that psychoanalysis prepares us for such action, if it is indeed true that this is the case? How is it that psychoanalysis leaves us ready, so to speak, to get down to work? And why does it lead us in that way? Why, too, does it stop at the threshold? That's where one finds the other pole on which I will focus what I hope to formulate here – it being understood that what I pointed to last time constitutes the limits of the things I have to say – and the extent to which we claim to be able to formulate an ethics. I will say right off that the ethical limits of psychoanalysis coincide with the limits of its practice. Its practice is only a preliminary to moral action as such – the so-called action being the one through which we enter the real.

Among all those who have undertaken the analysis of an ethics before me, Aristotle is to be classed among the most exemplary and certainly the most valid. Reading him is an exciting activity and I cannot recommend too highly that by way of an exercise you find out for yourselves – you will not be bored for a moment. Read the Nicomachaen Ethics, which of all his treatises scholars seem to attribute to him with the least hesitation and which is certainly the most readable. There are no doubt a number of difficulties to be found at the level of the text, in its digressions and in the order of his arguments. But skip over the passages that seem too complicated or acquire an edition with good notes that refers you to what it is sometimes essential to know about his logic in order to understand the problems that he raises. Above all, don't overburden yourself by trying to grasp everything paragraph by paragraph. Try instead to read him from beginning to end and you will certainly be rewarded.

One thing at least will emerge, something that to some extent the work has in common with all the other ethics – it tends to refer to an order. This order presents itself first of all as a science, an ἐπιστήμη, the science of what has to be done, the uncontested order which defines the norm of a certain character, ἔθος. Thus the problem is raised of the way in which that order may be established in a subject. How can a form of adequation be achieved in a subject so that he will enter that order and submit himself to it?

The establishment of an ἦθος is posited as differentiating a living being from an inanimate, inert being. As Aristotle points out, no matter how often you throw a stone in the air, it will never acquire the habit of its trajectory; man, on the other hand, acquires habits – that's what is meant by ἦθος. And this ἦθος has to be made to conform to the ἤθος, that is to an order that from the point of view of Aristotle's logic has to be brought together in a Sovereign Good, a point of insertion, attachment or convergence, in which a particular order is unified with a more universal knowledge, in which ethics becomes politics, and beyond that with an imitation of the cosmic order. The notions of macrocosm and microcosm are presupposed from the beginning in Aristotle's thought.

It is then a question of having a subject conform to something which in the real is not contested as presupposing the paths of that order. What is the problem constantly taken up and posed within Aristotelian ethics? Let us start with him who possesses this science. Of course, the one whom Aristotle addresses, that is the pupil or disciple, by the very fact that he listens is supposed to participate in this scientific discourse. The discourse in question, the ὀρθὸς λόγος, the right discourse, the appropriate discourse, is therefore already introduced by the very fact that the ethical question is posed. In that way the problem is clearly returned to the point where Socrates had left it with an excessive optimism that did not fail to strike his immediate successors – if the rule of action is in ὀρθὸς λόγος, if there can be no good action except in conformity with the latter, how is it possible that what Aristotle calls intemperance can survive? How is it possible that a subject's impulses draw him elsewhere? How is that to be explained?

However superficial this demand for an explanation may seem to us, since we believe we know so much more about the matter, it nevertheless constitutes the greater part of the substance of Aristotle's thought in the Ethics. I will come back to this later in connection with Freud's reflections on the same topic.

For Aristotle the problem is delimited by the conditions imposed by a certain human ideal that I already briefly referred to in passing as that of the master. It is a question for him of elucidating the relationship that may exist between ἀκολασία, intemperance, and the fault revealed relative to the essential virtue of the master, that is of the man whom Aristotle is addressing.

I think I indicated enough last time that the master in antiquity isn't exactly the heroic brute who is represented in the Hegelian dialectic, and who functions for Hegel as an axis and turning point. I will not elaborate here on what is representative of the type; it is enough to know that it is something that enables us to appreciate properly the contribution of Aristotle's ethics. This comment undoubtedly causes us to set limits on the value of his ethics, to historicize them, but one would be wrong to assume that that is the only conclusion to draw. From an Aristotelian perspective, the master in antiquity is a presence, a human condition joined in a much less narrowly critical way to the slave, than Hegel's perspective affirms. In fact, the problem posed is one that goes unresolved from an Hegelian perspective, that of a society of masters.

Other comments, too, may contribute equally to limit the significance for us of Aristotle's ethics. Note for example that the ideal of this master, like that of god at the center of an Aristotelian world governed by νοῦς, seems to be to avoid work as much as possible. I mean to leave the control of his slaves to his steward in order to concentrate on a contemplative ideal without which the ethics doesn't achieve its proper aim. That tells you how much idealization there is in the point of view of Aristotelian ethics.

Consequently, his ethics is localized, I would almost say limited to a social type, to a privileged representative of leisure – the very term σχολαστικός suggests it. Yet, on the other hand, it is all the more striking to realize how an ethics articulated within such specific conditions still remains full of resonances and lessons. The schemas it proposes are not useless. They may be found in partially unrecognizable forms at the level of our approach to Freud's experience. These schemas may be recomposed or transposed in such a way that we will not be putting our new honey into the same old containers.

One can say right off that the search for a way, for a truth, is not absent from our experience. For what else are we seeking in analysis if not a liberating truth?

But we must be careful. One must not always trust words and labels. This truth that we are seeking in a concrete experience is not that of a superior law. If the truth that we are seeking is a truth that frees, it is a truth that we will look for in a hiding place in our subject. It is a particular truth.

But if the form of its articulation that we find is the same in everyone though always different, it is because it appears to everyone in its intimate specificity with the character of an imperious Wunsch. Nothing can be compared to it that allows it to be judged from the outside. The quality that best characterizes it is that of being the true Wunsch, which was at the origin of an aberrant or atypical behavior.

We encounter this Wunsch with its particular, irreducible character as a modification that presupposes no other form of normalization than that of an experience of pleasure or of pain, but of a final experience from whence it springs and is subsequently preserved in the depths of the subject in an irreducible form. The Wunsch does not have the character of a universal law but, on the contrary, of the most particular of laws – even if it is universal that this particularity is to be found in every human being. We find it in a form that we have categorized as a regressive, infantile, unrealistic phase, characterized by a thought abandoned to desire, by desire taken to be reality.

That surely constitutes the text of our experience. But is that the whole of our discovery, is that the whole of our morality? That attenuation, that exposure to the light of day, that discovery of the thought of desire, of the truth of that thought? Do we expect that as a result of its mere disclosure the area will be swept clean for a different thought? In one way, it is indeed so, it is as simple as that. Yet at the same time if we formulate things thus, then everything remains veiled for us.

If the reward or the novelty of the psychoanalytic experience were limited to that, it wouldn't go much further than the dated notion that was born long before psychoanalysis, namely, that the child is father of the man. The phrase comes from Wordsworth, the English romantic poet, and is quoted respectfully by Freud.

It is no accident that we discover it in that period with its fresh, shattering, and even breathtaking quality, bursting forth at the beginning of the nineteenth century with the industrial revolution, in the country that was most advanced in experiencing its effects, in England. English romanticism has its own special features, which include the value given to childhood memories, to the whole world of childhood, to the ideals and wishes of the child. And the poets of the time drew on this not only for the source of their inspiration, but also for the development of their principal themes – in this respect they are radically different from the poets who preceded them and especially from that wonderful poetry of the seventeenth and early eighteenth century, which for a reason that escapes me is called metaphysical.

That reference to childhood, the idea of the child in man, the idea that something demands that a man be something other than a child, but that the demands of the child as such are perpetually felt in him, all of that in the sphere of psychology can be historically situated.

Another man who lived in the first half of the nineteenth century, a Victorian from the early period, the historian Macaulay, noted that at the time, rather than call you a dishonest man or a perfect idiot, one preferred the excellent weapon of affirming that your mind was not fully adult, that you retained characteristics of a juvenile mentality. This attitude, which is historically datable since you find no evidence of it in any previous history, is the sign of an interval, a break in historical development. In Pascal's time, when one speaks of childhood, it is simply to say that a child is not a man. And if one speaks of adult thought, it is in no way in order to discover there traces of infantile thought.

For us, the question is not posed in those terms. If we do nevertheless constantly pose it thus, if it is justified by the contents and the text of our relationship to the neurotic and by the reference in our experience to individual genesis, this also disguises what lies behind it. For in the end, no matter how true it may be, there is a very different tension between the thought that we have to deal with in the unconscious and the thought that we characterize, goodness knows why, as adult. We constantly come upon the fact that this adult thought runs out of steam relative to the famous child's thought that we use to judge our adult. We use it not as a foil, but as a reference point, a vanishing point, where unfulfillments and even degradations come together and reach their end. There is a perpetual contradiction in the reference we make to these things.

Before coming here today I read in Jones a kind of celebration of the sublime virtues of social pressure, without which our contemporaries, our fellow humans, would be vain, egotistical, sordid, sterile, etc. One is tempted to comment in the margin, "What are they but that?" And when we speak of the adult human being, what is our reference? Where is this model of the adult human being?

These considerations incite us to reexamine the true, solid backbone of Freud's thought. No doubt psychoanalysis has ended up ordering all the material of its experience in terms of an ideal development. But at its beginning it finds its terms in a wholly different system of references, to which development and genesis only give intermittent support – this is, I believe, something that I have made you appreciate sufficiently, even if I am obliged on this occasion to refer to it only in passing. The fundamental reference is the tension or, to designate it finally by its name, the opposition between the primary process and the secondary process, between the pleasure principle and the reality principle.

2

Freud in the course of his so-called auto-analysis writes in a short letter, it is number 73: "Meine Analyse geht weiter, my analysis continues. It is my principal interest, meine Hauptinteresse. Everything remains obscure, even the problems involved, but there is a feeling of comfort. It is as if," he writes, "one had only to reach into a larder and take what one wanted. The unpleasant thing," he says, "are the Stimmungen," in the most general sense we can give to that word, which has a special resonance in German, namely, moods or feelings, which by their very nature cover, hide – what precisely? Die Wirklichkeit, reality.

It is in terms of Wirklichkeit that Freud questions what presents itself to him as a Stimmung. The Stimmung is that which reveals to him what he has to look for in his auto-analysis, what he is questioning, the moment when he has the feeling of having, as in a dark room, in a larder or Vorratskammer, everything he needs, and that it is waiting there for him, in store for him. But he isn't led toward it by his Stimmungen. Such is the meaning of his sentence – the most unpleasant experience, das Unangenehmste, is the Stimmungen. Freud's experience begins with the search for the reality that is somewhere inside himself. And it is this that constitutes the originality of his point of departure. Moreover, he adds in the same vein that "even sexual excitement is for someone like me unusable in this approach. Even there I do not trust myself to see where are the final realities." And he adds, "I maintain my good humor in this whole business." Before achieving results, we must be patient a little longer.

I bring to your attention in passing a recent little book by Erich Fromm that I won't say I recommend to you, since it is a strangely discordant, almost insidious work, that is close to being defamatory. It is called Sigmund Freud's Mission and it makes insinuating points that are not without interest and that concern the special traits of Freud's personality, invariably seen from an obviously belittling point of view. In particular, he selects from the text Freud's sentences on sexual excitation in order to have us draw the conclusion that by the age of forty Freud was already impotent.

We are now in a position to analyze Freud's 1895 manuscript concerning his fundamental conception of the structure of the psyche, a manuscript that chance has placed in our hands. He had thought of calling it Psychology for the Use of Neurologists. Since he never published it, the draft remained attached to a packet of letters to Fliess, and it is available to us thanks to the acquisition of these collections.

It is, therefore, not only proper but necessary that we begin at that point our analysis of the meaning in Freud's thought of the thematics of the reality principle in opposition to the pleasure principle. Is there or is there not something distinctive relative to the development of his thought there, and at the same time to the directions taken by our own experience? It is here that we may find that hidden backbone which, I believe, is required on this occasion.

The opposition between the pleasure principle and the reality principle was rearticulated throughout Freud's work – 1895, the Entwurf (Project for a Scientific Psychology); 1900, Chapter VII of the Traumdeutung, with the first public rearticulation of the so-called primary and secondary processes, the one governed by the pleasure principle and the other by the reality principle; 1914, return to the article from which I selected the dream that I discussed at length last year, the dream of the dead father, "he didn't know"; the article, "Formulieringen über die Zwei Prinzipen des Psychischen Geschehens," that one might translate as "Of the Structure of the Psyche"; 1930, that Civilization and Its Discontents which, I promised you, we will get to by way of conclusion.

Others before Freud spoke of pleasure as a guiding function of ethics. Not only does Aristotle set great store by it, but he finds it impossible not to place it at the center of his ethical teaching. What is happiness if it doesn't contain the bloom of pleasure? A significant part of the discussion of the Nicomachaen Ethics is designed to restore the true function of pleasure to its proper place; strangely enough it is introduced in such a way that it is given a value that is not merely passive. Pleasure in Aristotle is an activity that is compared to the bloom given off by youthful activity – it is, if you like, a radiance. In addition, it is also the sign of the blossoming of an action, in the literal sense of ἐνέργεια, a word that expresses the true praxis as that which includes its own end.

Pleasure has no doubt been given other modulations down through the ages as sign, stigmatum, reward, or substance of the psychic life. But let us consider the case of the man who questions us directly, of Freud.

What cannot fail to strike us right away is that his pleasure principle is an inertia principle. Its function is to regulate by a kind of automatism everything that comes together through a process that, in his first formulation, Freud tends to present as dependent on a preformed apparatus that is strictly limited to the neuronic apparatus. The latter regulates the facilitations that it retains after having suffered their effects. It is essentially a matter of everything that results from a fundamental tendency to discharge in which a given quantity is destined to be expended. That is the point of view from which the functioning of the pleasure principle is first articulated.

That attempt at a hypothetical formulation is offered in a way that is unique in Freud's extant writings. And one shouldn't forget that he came to dislike it and didn't want to publish it. No doubt he wrote it in response to certain demands for coherence he made of himself when confronted by himself. But it must be said that this formulation apparently makes no reference to the clinical facts, which doubtless constituted for him the whole force of the demands he had to deal with. He discusses those questions with himself or with Fliess, which under the circumstances comes to the same thing. He presents himself with a probable and coherent representation, a working hypothesis, in order to respond to something whose concrete, experimental dimension is masked and avoided here.

He claims it is a question of explaining a normal functioning of the mind. In order to do this he starts with an apparatus whose basis is wholly antithetical to a result involving adequation and equilibrium. He starts with a system which naturally tends toward deception and error. That whole organism seems designed not to satisfy need, but to hallucinate such satisfaction. It is, therefore, appropriate that another apparatus is opposed to it, an apparatus that operates as an agency of reality; it presents itself essentially as a principle of correction, of a call to order. I am not exaggerating things. Freud himself insists that there must be a distinction between the two apparatuses, although he admits he can find no trace of them in the anatomical structures sustaining them.

The reality principle or that to which the functioning of the neuronic apparatus in the end owes it efficacy appears as an apparatus that goes much further than a mere checking up; it is rather a question of rectification. It operates in the mode of detour, precaution, touching up, restraint. It corrects and compensates for that which seems to be the natural inclination of the psychic apparatus, and it radically opposes it.

The conflict is introduced here at the base, at the origins of an organism which, let us say, seems after all to be destined to live. Nobody before Freud, and no other account of human behavior, had gone so far to emphasize its fundamentally conflictual character. No one else had gone so far in explaining the organism as a form of radical inadequation – to the point where the duality of the systems is designed to overcome the radical inadequation of one of them.

This opposition between the φ system and the ψ system, which is articulated throughout, seems almost like a wager. For what is there to justify it, if it isn't that experience of ungovernable quantities which Freud had to deal with in his experience of neurosis? That is the driving imperative behind the whole system.

We sense directly that the justification for giving such prominence to quantity as such has nothing to do with Freud's desire to bring his theory into conformity with the mechanistic ideas of Helmholtz and Brücke. For him it corresponds rather to the most direct kind of lived experience, namely, that of the inertia which at the level of symptoms presented him with obstacles whose irreversible character he recognized. It is here that one finds his first advance in darkness toward that Wirklichkeit, which is the point to which his questioning returns; it is the key, the distinctive feature of his whole system. I ask you to reread this text, without wondering along with the annotators, commentators and connotators who have edited it whether this or that is closer to psychological or physiological thought, whether this or that refers to Herbart, Helmholtz, or anyone else. And you will see that beneath a manner that is cool, abstract, scholastic, complex and arid, one can sense a lived experience, and that this experience is at bottom moral in kind.

People play the historian on this topic, as if to explain an author like Freud in terms of influences had any value, to explain him by means of a greater or lesser similarity between one of his formulas and those which had been used by some previous thinker in a context that was different. But since it is an exercise that people engage in, why shouldn't I do the same, in my own way? Isn't the functioning of the apparatus that supports the reality principle strangely similar to what one finds in Aristotle?

Freud's task is to explain how the activity of review and restraint functions or, in other words, how the apparatus which supports the secondary processes avoids the occurrence of catastrophes that would inevitably follow the lapse of too much or too little time or the abandonment to its own devices of the pleasure principle. If the latter is released too soon, the movement will be triggered simply by a Wunschgedanke; it will necessarily be painful and will give rise to unpleasure. If on the other hand the secondary apparatus intervenes too late, if it doesn't give the little discharge required to attempt the beginning of an adequate solution through action, then there will be a regressive discharge, that is to say, an hallucination, which is also a source of displeasure.

Well now, this theory is not unrelated to Aristotle's ideas concerning the question of how it is that someone who knows may be intemperate. Aristotle offers several solutions. I will skip the earlier ones, which introduce syllogistic and dialectical elements that are relatively remote from our concerns here. He also attempts a solution that is not dialectical but physical – he nevertheless advances it in the form of a syllogism of the desirable.

I believe that Chapter V of Book VII on pleasure is worth reading in its entirety. Beside the major premise – one must always taste what is sweet – there is a particular, concrete minor premise, i.e., this is sweet. And the principle of wrong action is to be found in the error of a particular judgment relative to the minor premise. Where is the error found? Precisely in the circumstance that the desire which is subjacent to the major premise causes the wrong judgment to be made concerning the reality of the supposed sweetness toward which the action is directed.

I can't help thinking that Freud, who had attended the lecture series given by Brentano on Aristotle in 1887, is transposing here the properly ethical articulation of the problem on to a hypothetical, mechanistic point of view. And he does so in a way that is purely formal and gives the question a completely different accent.

In truth, it is no more of a psychology than any other of those that were devised at the time. Let us have no illusions; as far as psychology is concerned, nothing has been achieved so far that is superior to Freud's Entwurf. Everything that has been devised concerning the functioning of the psyche under the assumption that the mechanisms of the nervous system can account for what is concretely perceived by us as the field of psychological action has a similar air of fanciful hypothesis.

If Freud returns to the logical and syllogistic articulations, which have always been used by ethical philosophers in their field, it is in order to give them a very different meaning. We must remember that in interpreting the true content of his thought, which is to say what I have taught you. The ὀρθὸς λόγος that concerns us here are not simply major premises; they concern rather the way in which I have taught you to articulate what goes on in the unconscious; they concern the discourse that is employed on the level of the pleasure principle.

It is in relation to this ὀρθός, ironically highlighted by inverted commas, that the reality principle has to guide the subject in order for him to complete a possible action.

3

From a Freudian point of view, the reality principle is presented as functioning in a way that is essentially precarious.

No previous philosophy has gone so far in that direction. It is not that reality is called into question; it is certainly not called into question in the way that the idealists did so. Compared to Freud the idealists of the philosophical tradition are small beer indeed, for in the last analysis they don't seriously contest that famous reality, they merely tame it. Idealism consists in affirming that we are the ones who give shape to reality, and that there is no point in looking any further. It is a comfortable position. Freud's position, or that of any sensible man for that matter, is something very different.

Reality is precarious. And it is precisely to the extent that access to it is so precarious that the commandments which trace its path are so tyrannical. As guides to the real, feelings are deceptive. That intuition which animates the whole auto-analysis of Freud expresses itself thus concerning the approach to the real. Its very movement can only begin to occur by means of a primary defense. The profound ambiguity of this approach to the real demanded by man is first inscribed in terms of a defense – a defense that already exists even before the conditions of repression as such are formulated.

In order to emphasize what I am calling the paradox of the relationship to the real in Freud, I will put this on the board – the pleasure principle on the one hand and reality principle on the other. Once you have been gently reassured by these two terms, things seem to go along by themselves. Speaking broadly, one can say that the unconscious is on one side and the conscious on the other. Please bear that in mind in your attempt to follow the points I am trying to bring out.

What are we led to articulate the apparatus of perception onto? Onto reality, of course. Yet, if we follow Freud's hypothesis, on what theoretically is the control of the pleasure principle exercised? Precisely on perception, and it is here that one finds the originality of his contribution. The primary process, as he tells us in the seventh part of the Traumdeutung, tends to be exercised toward an identity of perception. It doesn't matter whether it is real or hallucinated, such an identity will always tend to be established. If it isn't lucky enough to coincide with reality, it will be hallucinated. The risk is in the possibility of the primary process winning out.

On the other hand, what does the secondary process tend toward? Once again you should look at Chapter VII, but it is already articulated in the Entwurf. It tends toward an identity of thought. What does that mean? It means that the interior functioning of the psychic apparatus – I will discuss next time how it might be represented schematically – occurs as a kind of groping forward, a rectifying test, thanks to which the subject, led on by the discharges that follow along the Bahnungen already established, will conduct the series of tests or of detours that will gradually lead him to anastomosis and to moving beyond the testing of the surrounding system of different objects present at that moment of its experience. One might say that the backcloth of experience consists in the construction of a certain system of Wunsch or of Erwartung of pleasure, defined as anticipated pleasure, and which tends for this reason to realize itself autonomously in its own sphere, theoretically without expecting anything from the outside. It moves directly toward a fulfillment highly antithetical to whatever triggers it.

In this preliminary approach, thought ought to appear to be on the level of the reality principle, in the same column as the reality principle. But it is by no means the case, since as described by Freud, this process is in itself and by nature unconscious. Understand that unlike that which reaches the subject in the perceptual order from the outside world, nothing that takes place at the level of these tests – thanks to which, by means of approximations in the psyche, the facilitations are realized that enable the subject to make his action adequate – is perceptible as such. All thought by its very nature occurs according to unconscious means. It is doubtless not controlled by the pleasure principle, but it occurs in a space that as an unconscious space is to be considered as subject to the pleasure principle.

Of everything that occurs at the level of inner processes, and thought itself is such a process, according to Freud, the only signs of which the subject is consciously aware are signs of pleasure or pain. As with all the other unconscious processes, nothing else reaches the level of consciousness but those signs there.

How then do we have some apprehension of those processes of thought? Here again Freud responds in a fully articulated way – only insofar as words are uttered. An idea that, with the tendency to facility characteristic of all thought that in spite of itself is tainted by a kind of parallelism, is commonly interpreted as follows: "It is, of course, clear that what Freud is telling us there is that words are that which characterizes the transition into the preconscious." But the transition of what precisely?

Of what else but movements that belong to the unconscious? Freud tells us that the thought processes are only known to us through words, what we know of the unconscious reaches us as a function of words. The idea is articulated in the most precise and the most powerful of ways in the Entwurf. For example, without the cry that it elicits, we would only have the most confused notion of an unpleasant object, a notion that would indeed fail to detach it from the context of which it would simply be the evil center, the object would instead be stripped of the particularity of its context. Freud tells us that a hostile object is only acknowledged at the level of consciousness when pain causes the subject to utter a cry. The existence of the feindlicher Objekt as such is the cry of the subject. This notion is expressed in the Entwurf. The cry fulfills the function of a discharge; it plays the role of a bridge where something of what is happening may be seized and identified in the consciousness of the subject. This something would remain obscure and unconscious if the cry did not lend it, as far as the conscious is concerned, the sign that gives it its own weight, presence, structure. It gives it as well a potentiality due to the fact that the important objects for a human subject are speaking objects, which will allow him to see revealed in the discourse of others the processes that, in fact, inhabit his own unconscious.

We only grasp the unconscious finally when it is explicated, in that part of it which is articulated by passing into words. It is for this reason that we have the right – all the more so as the development of Freud's discovery will demonstrate – to recognize that the unconscious itself has in the end no other structure than the structure of language.

It is this that gives value to atomistic theories. The latter do not cover any of those things they claim to cover, namely, a certain number of atoms of the neuronic apparatus, supposedly individualized elements of the nervous system. But, on the other hand, the theories of relations of contiguity and continuity illustrate admirably the signifying structure as such, insofar as it is involved in any linguistic operation.

What do we see offered with this double intersection of the respective effects of the reality and pleasure principles on each other?

The reality principle controls what happens at the level of thought, but it is only insofar as something emerges from thought which can be articulated in words in interhuman experience that it is able as a principle of thought to come to the knowledge of the subject in his consciousness.

Conversely, the unconscious itself is to be situated at the level of elements, of logical components which are of the order of λόγος, articulated in the form of an ὀρθὸς λόγος hidden at the heart of the spot where the transitions, the transferences motivated by attraction and necessity, and the inertia of pleasure occur for the subject, those operations, in short, which cause one sign rather than another to be valorized for him – to the extent that this sign may be substituted for the earlier sign or, on the contrary, have transferred to it the affective charge attached to a first experience.

Thus at these three levels we see three orders emerge as follows.

First, let us say, there is a substance or a subject of psychic experience, which corresponds to the opposition reality principle / pleasure principle.

Next, there is the process of experience, which corresponds to the opposition between thought and perception. And what do we find here? The process is divided according to whether it is a question of perception, and, therefore, linked to the activity of hallucinating, to the pleasure principle, or to a question of thought. This is what Freud calls psychic reality. On one side is the process as fictional process. On the other are the processes of thought through which instinctual activity is effectively realized, that is to say, the appetitive process – a process of search, of recognition and, as Freud explained later, of recovery of the object. That is the other face of psychic reality, its unconscious process, which is also its appetitive process.

Finally, on the level of objectification or of the object, the known and the unknown are in opposition. It is because that which is known can only be known in words that that which is unknown offers itself as having a linguistic structure. This allows us to ask again the question of what is involved at the level of the subject.

Consequently, the oppositions fiction / appetite, knowable / unknowable divide up what takes place at the level of the process and of the object. What is involved at the level of the subject? We need to ask ourselves, what is the division of the two sides between the two principles at this level?

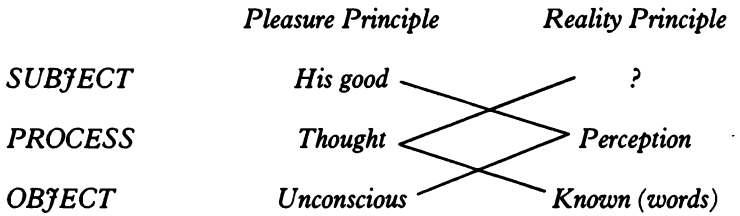
I would propose the following. As far as the pleasure principle is concerned, that which presents itself to the subject as a substance is his good.

Insofar as pleasure controls subjective activity, it is the good, the idea of the good, that sustains it. That is why ethical thinkers have at all times not been able to avoid trying to identify these two terms, which are after all fundamentally antithetical, namely, pleasure and the good.

But over and against that, how does one qualify the substratum of reality of subjective activity?

What is the new figure that Freud gave us in the opposition reality principle / pleasure principle? It is without a doubt a problematic figure. Freud doesn't for a moment consider identifying adequacy to reality with a specific good. In Civilization and Its Discontents he tells us that civilization or culture certainly asks too much of the subject. If there is indeed something that can be called his good or his happiness, there is nothing to be expected in that regard from the microcosm, nor moreover from the macrocosm.

It is with this question mark that I will end today.



November 25, 1959

III

Rereading the Entwurf

AN ETHICS NOT A PSYCHOLOGY HOW REALITY IS CONSTITUTED A TOPOLOGY OF SUBJECTIVITY

I have up till now taken account of a number of points in Freud's work. And last time you saw how I was led in particular to refer to that curiously situated work, the Entwurf.

You are aware of the reservations that one might have relative to the correspondence with Fliess. It is not a work as such; the text we have isn't complete. But it is certainly extremely valuable, and especially its supplementary material, among which the Entwurf has a special place.

1

The Entwurf is very revealing of a kind of substructure of Freud's thought. Its obvious relationship to all the formulations of his experience that Freud was led to offer subsequently makes it especially precious.

What I had to say about it last time expressed well enough the way in which it will appear in my commentary this year. Contrary to received opinion, I believe that the opposition between the pleasure principle and the reality principle or between the primary process and the secondary process concerns not so much the sphere of psychology as that of ethics properly speaking.

There was in Freud the perception of the proper dimension in which human action unfolds. And in the appearance of an ideal of mechanistic reduction acknowledged in the Entwurf, one should simply see a compensatory movement or the other face of Freud's discovery of the fact of neurosis, which is from the beginning seen in that ethical dimension where it is, in effect, situated. The proof of this is in the fact that conflict is in the foreground, and that from the outset this conflict concerns the moral order in what we might call a massive way.

That's not such a novelty. Every builder of an ethics has had to face the same problem. It is, in fact, in this connection that it is interesting to write a history, or a genealogy, of morals. Not in Nietzsche's sense, but as a series of ethical systems, i.e., of theoretical reflection on moral experience. That way one understands the central significance of problems that have been posed since the beginning and that have been pursued with a notable constancy.

After all, why is it necessary that thinkers in the field of ethics always return to the ethical problem of the relation of pleasure to the final good, whenever the guidance of human action from a moral point of view is concerned? Why do they always return to this same theme of pleasure? How does one explain that internal demand which constrains the ethical philosopher to try to reduce the antimonies associated with this theme? – from the fact that pleasure appears in many cases to be the end which is in opposition to moral effort, but that the latter has nevertheless to locate its ultimate point of reference there, a point of reference to which the good that is supposed to orient human action is finally reduced. That's an example, and by no means the only one, of the kind of knot which one comes upon in solutions to the problem. It is instructive for us to see the constancy with which the problem of conflict is posed within every discussion of morals.

Freud in this respect appears as no more than a descendent. Yet he contributes something unmatched in significance, something that has changed the problems of the ethical perspective for us to a degree that we are not yet aware of. That is why we need reference points, and I have already alluded to some of those that we will need to take account of this year.

One has to choose, since I don't intend to highlight all those writers who have discussed morals. I have discussed Aristotle because I believe that the Nicomachean Ethics is properly speaking the first book to be organized around the problem of an ethics. As you know, there are plenty of others around, before, after, and in Aristotle's work itself, who focus primarily on the problemn of pleasure. I will not be referring to Epictetus or Seneca here, but I will be discussing utilitarian theory insofar as it is significant for the new direction which culminated in Freud.

I will indicate today the interest of the analysis I will be giving of certain works in the same terms that Freud used in the Entwurf, when he designated something which, to my mind at least, is close to the language that I have taught you over the years to pay attention to in the functioning of the primary process, namely, Bahnung or facilitation.

As far as the statement of the problem of ethics is concerned, Freud's discourse facilitates something that allows us to go further than anyone has gone before in a domain that is essential to the problems of morality. That will be the inspiration for our discussion this year; it is around the term reality in the true meaning of the word – a term we always use in such a careless way – that the power of Freud's conception is situated. And it is a power that one can measure through the persistence of Freud's name in the development of our analytical activity.

It is obvious that it is not the poor little contribution to a physiology of fantasy involved, which explains the passionate interest we might take in reading the Entwurf.

You will no doubt be told that this text is difficult, but it is also exciting. Not so much in French as in German, for the French translation is extraordinarily awkward. It is wanting in precision, emphasis, and resonance throughout. In brief, I am obliged to evoke or to provoke at this point the sense of regret some of you may have that you don't know German. In German it is a brilliant, pure text; it suggests a virgin source and is altogether remarkable. The outlines of the French translation obliterate that and make it grey. Make the effort to read it and you will realize how true my comment is that one finds there something very different from a work constructed of hypotheses. It is Freud's first skirmish with that hyperbole of reality he had to deal with in his patients. There we have it; around forty years old he discovers the true dimensions, the profoundly meaningful life, of that reality.

It is not out of a vain concern to refer you to a text that I draw your attention to the Entwurf. Yet why not, after all? You all know that on occasion I know how to take liberties with Freud's texts and affirm my distance. If for example I have taught you the doctrine of the dominance of a signifier in a subject's unconscious chain, it is so as to emphasize certain characteristics of our experience. By virtue of a distinction that I don't fully agree with, a distinction that does nevertheless express something, the paper we heard last night called the above "the experience of the content." And it affirmed in opposition to it the scaffolding of concepts. Well now, this year I am proposing not simply to be faithful to the text of Freud and to be its exegete, as if it were the source of an unchanging truth that was the model, mold and dress code to be imposed on all our experience.

What are we going to do? We are going to look for the phylum and the development of the concepts in Freud – in the Entwurf, in Chapter VII of the Traumdeutung – where he publishes for the first time the opposition between the primary and the secondary processes, and his conception of the relationship between the conscious, the preconscious and the unconscious – in the introduction of narcissism into this economy; then in what is called the second topic, with its emphasis on the reciprocal functioning of the ego, the superego and the outside world, which gives a complete expression to things that we may have glimpsed as new shoots in the Entwurf; and finally in the later texts that are still centered around the same theme, "How is reality constituted for man?", namely, in the 1925 article on Verneinung, which we will look at again together, and in Civilization and Its Discontents, the discontents of man's situation in the world. The German term is Kultur, and we will perhaps have to try to define its exact meaning in Freud's writings. He never takes over concepts in a neutral, conventional sense; a concept has always for him a fully assumed significance.

It turns out then that if we are following so closely the development of Freud's metapsychology this year, it is in order to uncover the traces of a theory that reflects an ethical thought. The latter is, in fact, at the center of our work as analysts, however difficult it may be to realize it fully, and it is also the latter which holds together all those who constitute the analytic community – that dispersion, which often gives the impression of being a mere scattering, of a fundamental intuition that is taken up by each one of us from one perspective or another.

If we always return to Freud, it is because he started out with an initial, central intuition, which is ethical in kind. I believe it essential to emphasize that, if we are to understand our experience and animate it, and if we are not to lose our way and allow it to be degraded. That's the reason why I am tackling this subject this year.

2

Last time I was pleased to hear an echo, a kind of response.

Two of you who for other reasons are involved in rereading the Entwurf – because they are working on a lexicon and perhaps for personal reasons – came to tell me after my seminar how happy they were with the way in which I had discussed Freud's text; it helped justify the interest of their own rereading.

I, therefore, had no difficulty remembering – it is something of which I am painfully aware – that this seminar is a seminar, and that it would be a good idea if it were not simply the signifier "seminar" alone that maintained its right to such a denomination. That is why I asked one of the two people to come and tell us the thoughts inspired in him by the way in which I related the subject of this seminar to the Entwurf. You will hear Jean-Bertrand Lefèvre-Pontalis, but his colleague, Jean Laplanche, and he are currently equally on top of the Entwurf, a work that, as Valabrega noted just now, you really have to have fresh in your memory, if you are to say anything valid about it. Is that really true? I don't know, for one ends up realizing that it's not as complicated as all that.

Mr. Lefèvre-Pontalis: "There is a slight misunderstanding that I would like to clear up. I am by no means a specialist of the Entwurf and I haven't reread it – I am in the process of reading it. Dr. Lacan asked me to go over a number of points made in his seminar last week, including especially the question of the relation to reality, that he described as particularly problematic, if not downright paradoxical, in this early text of Freud." (Mr. Lefèvre-Pontalis's presentation followed.)

3

I would like to thank you for what you have done today. It will perhaps enable us to introduce this year a way of dividing up the seminar that will allow me to stop now and then, to take a rest, and at the same time have another use.

It seems to me that you presented with remarkable elegance the vital armature of a problem where one risks getting lost in details that are, I must say, extraordinarily tempting. I did occasionally regret that you didn't enter into the detail of the position of the Bahnung, on the one hand, and the Befriedigungserlebnis, on the other. I also regretted that you didn't remind us of the topology that the system φ , ψ, ω, presupposes. All that might perhaps have illuminated things. But it is clear that one could spend a whole term, indeed a year, simply in the attempt to rectify the distortions of certain of the Entwurf's original intuitions, distortions caused by the English translation.

I notice an example of this more or less at random. Bahnung is translated into English by "facilitation." It is obvious that the word has an exactly opposite meaning. Bahnung suggests the creation of a continuous way, a chain, and I even have the feeling that it can be related to the signifying chain insofar as Freud says that the development of the ψ apparatus replaces simple quantity by quantity plus Bahnung, that is to say its articulation. The English translation, "facilitation," slides over the thing.

The French translation was modeled on the English text. As a result, all its mistakes have been multiplied, and there are even cases where its text is absolutely unintelligible compared to a simple German text.

Nevertheless, I do believe that you emphasized the points that our following discussions will take up, discussions that will lead us back to the relationship between the reality principle and the pleasure principle. You showed the paradox involved by indicating that the pleasure principle cannot be inscribed in a biological system. Yet, my goodness, the mystery isn't so great if we see that this state of affairs is supported in the following way, namely, that the subject's experience of satisfaction is entirely dependent on the other, on the one whom Freud designates in a beautiful expression that you didn't emphasize, I am sorry to say, the Nebenmensch. I will have the opportunity to proffer a few quotations so as to show that it is through the intermediary of the Nebenmensch as speaking subject that everything that has to do with the thought processes is able to take shape in the subjectivity of the subject.

I ask you to refer to the double column table that I drew for you last time. This diagram will be of use to us until the end of our presentation and will enable us to conceive of the pleasure function and the reality function in a relationship that we will have to bind together more and more closely. If you approach them in another way, you end up with the paradox that you perhaps overemphasized today, namely, that there is no plausible reason why reality should be heard and should end up prevailing. Experience proves it to be overbundant for the human species, which for the time being is not in danger of extinction. The prospect is exactly the opposite. Pleasure in the human economy is only ever articulated in a certain relationship to this point, which is no doubt always left empty, enigmatic, but which presents a certain relationship to what man takes to be reality. And it is through this that we manage to approach ever more closely that intuition, that apperception of reality which animates the whole development of Freud's thought.

Freud posits that the ψ system must always contain a certain level of $Q\dot{\eta}$ quantity, which will play to the end an essential role. The discharge cannot, in effect, be complete, reach a zero level, after which the psychic apparatus achieves a final state of rest. The latter is certainly not the plausible goal or end of the functioning of the pleasure principle. Freud wonders, therefore – and this is something that the translation misses – how one can justify that it is at such a level that the quantity which regulates everything is maintained.

You perhaps skipped a little quickly over the reference to the ψ system and the φ system. If the one is related to exogenous stimulations, it isn't enough to say that the other is related to endogenous stimulations. An important part of the ψ system is, in fact, constituted of raw Q quantities from the outside which are transformed into quantities that are by no means comparable to those that characterize the ψ system, among which the latter system organizes whatever reaches it from the outside, and does so in a way that is clearly expressed by Freud as apparently being similar to Fechner's theory – it is a matter of the transformation of what is pure and simple quantity into "complication." Freud uses the same Latin term, complicationes.

Thus we have the following scheme. On the one hand is the φ system. On the other is the ψ system, which is a highly complex network capable of shrinkage and of Aufbau, that is to say of extension. At this point of the theory, there occurs between the two a crossing over, which is indicated in Freud's little diagram. Once a certain limit is passed, that which arrives as quantity is completely transformed as far as its structure is concerned. This notion of structure, of Aufbau, is represented by Freud as essential. He distinguishes in the ψ apparatus between its Aufbau, to retain quantity, and its function, which is to discharge it, die Funktion der Abfuhr. The function isn't simply to circulate and discharge; it appears at this level as split.

One must realize that this apparatus is presented to us as isolated in a living being. It is the nervous system that is being studied and the totality of the organism. The latter is an extremely important point whose significance is to my mind obvious. It affirms and sustains itself in a very different way from the hypotheses that Freud evokes nicely when he says that if one has a taste for them, one should only take them seriously once their arbitrary nature has been attenuated – die Willkürlichkeit der Constructio ad hoc. It seems obvious to me that this apparatus is a topology of subjectivity, of subjectivity insofar as it arises and is constructed on the surface of an organism.

There is also in the ψ system an important portion that Freud distinguishes from the part called the nucleus, namely, the Spinalneuronen, which are open to endogenous stimulation, a stimulation on the side where there is no apparatus transforming the quantities.

One finds there a wealth of material that, given your wholly legitimate purpose to simplify, you failed to mention. By way of linking up with what I will have to say next time, I will do so.

There is, for example, the notion of Schlüsselneuronen, which have a certain function in relation to that part of the ψ system which is turned toward endogeny and which receives its quantities. The Schlüsselneuronen are a particular form of discharge that occurs within the ψ system. Yet paradoxically that discharge has as its function to increase the pressure. He also calls these Schlüsselneuronen, motorische Neuronen and I don't think it is a mistake. They provoke stimulations that occur within the ψ system, a series of movements which increase the tension still further and which as a result are at the origin of current neuroses. And this is a problem which has been particularly neglected, but that is for us of great interest.

We will not go into that now, however. The important point is that everything that happens here offers the paradox of being in the same place as that in which the principle of articulation by the Bahnung reigns, the same place, too, in which the whole hallucinatory phenomenon of perception occurs, of that false reality to which, in brief, the human organism is predestined. It is again in this same place that the processes oriented and dominated by reality are unconsciously formed, insofar at least as it is a question of the subject finding the path to satisfaction. In this instance satisfaction should not be confused with the pleasure principle – this is a topic that emerges, oddly enough, at the end of the third part of the text. You could not, of course, lead us right through such a rich text. When Freud sketches out what the normal functioning of the apparatus might represent, he speaks not of specific reaction but of specific action as corresponding to satisfaction. There is a big system behind that spezifische Aktion, for it can only correspond, in fact, to the refound object. We find here the foundation of the principle of repetition in Freud, and it is something we will have to come back to. That specific action will always be missing something. It is not distinguishable from what takes place when a motor reaction occurs, for it is, in effect, a reaction, a pure act, the discharge of an action.

There is a very long passage that I will have occasion to come back to and to distill for you. There is no more vibrant commentary on the gap that is inherent in human experience, on the distance that is manifested in man between the articulation of a wish and what occurs when his desire sets out on the path of its realization. Freud expresses there the reason why there is always something that is far from finding satisfaction and which doesn't include the characteristics sought in a specific action. And he concludes with the words – I seem to remember that they are the last words of his paper –

"monotonous quality." Compared with anything the subject seeks out, that which occurs in the domain of motor discharge always has a diminished character.

We cannot avoid giving that remark the approbation of the most profound moral experience.

By way of concluding these thoughts today, I will draw your attention to the analogy that exists between, on the one hand, that search for an archaic – one might almost say a regressive – quality of indefinable pleasure which animates unconscious instinct as a whole and, on the other, that which is realized and satisfying in the fullest of senses, in the moral sense as such.

That is far more than an analogy; it reaches a level of profundity which has perhaps never previously been articulated as such.

December 2, 1959

IV

Das Ding

SACHE UND WORT
NIEDERSCHRIFTEN
NEBENMENSCH
FREMDE

I am going to try to speak to you about the thing – das Ding.

If I introduce this term, it is because there are certain ambiguities, certain insufficiencies, in relation to the true meaning in Freud of the opposition between reality principle and pleasure principle; that is to say in relation to the material which I am trying to explore with you this year, so as to make you understand its importance for our practice as an ethics. And these ambiguities have to do with something that is of the order of the signifier and even of the order of language. What we need here is a concrete, positive and particular signifier. And I don't find anything in the French language – I would be grateful to those who might be sufficiently stimulated by these remarks to suggest a solution – anything that could correspond to the subtle opposition in German, which it is not easy to bring out, between the two terms that mean "thing" – das Ding and die Sache.

1

We have only one word in French, the word "la chose" (thing), which derives from the Latin word "causa." Its etymological connection to the law suggests to us something that presents itself as the wrapping and designation of the concrete. There is no doubt that in German, too, "thing" in its original sense concerns the notion of a proceeding, deliberation, or legal debate. Das Ding may imply not so much a legal proceeding itself as the assembly which makes it possible, the Volksversammlung.

Don't imagine that this use of etymology, these insights, these etymological soundings, are what I prefer to guide myself by – although Freud does remind us all the time that in order to follow the track of the accumulated experience of tradition, of past generations, linguistic inquiry is the surest vehicle of the transmission of a development which marks psychic reality. Current practice, taking note of the use of the signifier in its synchrony, is infinitely more precious to us. We attach a far greater weight to the way in which Ding and Sache are used in current speech. Moreover, if we look up an etymological dictionary, we will find that Sache, too, originally had to do with a legal proceeding. Sache is the thing that is juridically questioned or, in our vocabulary, the transition to the symbolic order of a conflict between men.

Nevertheless, the two terms are not at all equivalent. For that matter you may have noted last time in Mr. Lefèvre-Pontalis's remarks a quotation of terms whose thrust, as he brought out in his presentation, was to raise this question, it seems to me, in opposition to my doctrine – and it is all the more praiseworthy in his case since he doesn't know German. It had to do with that passage in Freud's article entitled "The Unconscious," in which the representation of things, Sachvorstellung, is on every occasion opposed to that of words, Wortvorstellung.

I will not enter today into the discussion of the factors that would allow one to respond to that passage, so often invoked at least in the form of a question mark, by those of you who are inspired by my lectures to read Freud. It is a passage which appears to them to constitute an objection to the emphasis I place on signifying articulation as providing the true structure of the unconscious.

The passage in question seems to go against that, since it opposes Sachvorstellung, as belonging to the unconscious, to Wortvorstellung, as belonging to the preconscious. I would just beg those who stop at that passage – the majority of you presumably do not go and verify in Freud's texts what I affirm here in my commentaries – I would beg them to read together, one after the other, the article called "Die Verdrängung" or "Repression," which precedes the article on the unconscious, then that article itself, before arriving at the passage involved. I will just note for the rest of you that it has precisely to do with the question that the schizophrenic's attitude poses for Freud, that is to say, the manifestly extraordinary prevalence of affinities between words in what one might call the schizophrenic world.

Everything that I have just discussed seems to me to lead in only one direction, namely, that Verdrängung operates on nothing other than signifiers. The fundamental situation of repression is organized around a relationship of the subject to the signifier. As Freud emphasizes, it is only from that perspective that it is possible to speak in a precise, analytical sense – I would call it operational – of unconscious and conscious. He realizes that the special situation of the schizophrenic, more clearly than that of any other form of neurosis, places us in the presence of the problem of representation.

I will perhaps have the opportunity to come back to this text later. But you will note that by offering the solution he seems to be offering in opposing Wortvorstellung to Sachvorstellung, there is a problem, an impasse, that Freud himself emphasizes and that can be explained by the state of linguistics in his time. He, nevertheless, understood and formulated admirably the distinction to be made between the operation of language as a function – namely, the moment when it is articulated and, in effect, plays an essential role in the preconscious – and the structure of language, as a result of which those elements put in play in the unconscious are organized. In between, those coordinations are set up, those Bahnungen, that concatenation, which dominate its whole economy.

I have digressed too much, since today I only want to restrict myself to the remark that Freud speaks of Sachvorstellung and not Dingvorstellung. Moreover, it is no accident if the Sachvorstellungen are linked to Wortvorstellungen, since it tells us that there is a relationship between thing and word. The straw of words only appears to us as straw insofar as we have separated it from the grain of things, and it was first the straw which bore that grain.

I don't want to begin developing a theory of knowledge here, but it is obvious that the things of the human world are things in a universe structured by words, that language, symbolic processes, dominate and govern all. When we seek to explore the frontier between the animal and the human world, it is apparent to what extent the symbolic process as such doesn't function in the animal world – a phenomenon that can only be a matter of astonishment for us. A difference in the intelligence, the flexibility, and the complexity of the apparatuses involved cannot be the only means of explaining that absence. That man is caught up in symbolic processes of a kind to which no animal has access cannot be resolved in psychological terms, since it implies that we first have a complete and precise knowledge of what this symbolic process means.

The Sache is clearly the thing, a product of industry and of human action as governed by language. However implicit they may first be in the genesis of that action, things are always on the surface, always within range of an explanation. To the extent that it is subjacent to and implicit in every human action, that activity of which things are the fruit belongs to the preconscious order, that is to say, something that our interest can bring to consciousness, on condition that we pay enough attention to it, that we take notice of it. The word is there in a reciprocal position to the extent that it articulates itself, that it comes to explain itself beside the thing, to the extent also that an action – which is itself dominated by language, indeed by command – will have separated out this object and given it birth.

Sache and Wort are, therefore, closely linked; they form a couple. Das Ding is found somewhere else.

I would like today to show you this Ding in life and in the reality principle that Freud introduces at the beginning of his thought and that persists to the end. I will point out the reference to it in a given passage of the Entwurf on the reality principle and in the article entitled "Die Verneinung" or "Denegation" in which it is an essential point.

This Ding is not in the relationship – which is to some extent a calculated one insofar as it is explicable – that causes man to question his words as referring to things which they have moreover created. There is something different in das Ding.

What one finds in das Ding is the true secret. For the reality principle has a secret that, as Lefèvre-Pontalis pointed out last time, is paradoxical. If Freud speaks of the reality principle, it is in order to reveal to us that from a certain point of view it is always defeated; it only manages to affirm itself at the margin. And this is so by reason of a kind of pressure that one might say, if things didn't, in fact, go much further, Freud calls not "the vital needs" – as is often said in order to emphasize the secondary process – but die Not des Lebens in the German text. An infinitely stronger phrase. Something that wishes. "Need" and not "needs." Pressure, urgency. The state of Not is the state of emergency in life.

This Not des Lebens intervenes at the level of the secondary process, but in a deeper way than through that corrective activity; it intervenes so as to determine the $Q\dot{\eta}$ level – the quantity of energy conserved by the organism in proportion to the response – which is necessary for the conservation of life. Take note that it is at the level of secondary process that the level of this necessary determination is exercised.

Let us return to the reality principle that is thus invoked from the point of view of its necessity effect. This remark puts us on the track of what I call its secret, namely, the following: As soon as we try to articulate the reality principle so as to make it depend on the physical world to which Freud's purpose seems to require us to relate it, it is clear that it functions, in fact, to isolate the subject from reality.

We find in it nothing more than that which biology, in effect, teaches us, namely, that the structure of a living being is dominated by a process of homeostasis, of isolation from reality. Is that all Freud has to tell us when he speaks of the functioning of the reality principle? Apparently, yes. And he shows us that neither the quantitative element nor the qualitative element in reality enters the realm – the term he uses is Reich – of the secondary process.

Exterior quantity enters into contact with the apparatus called the φ system, that is to say, that part of the whole neuronic apparatus which is directly turned to the exterior or, roughly speaking, the nerve ends at the level of the skin, the tendons, and even the muscles and the bones, deep sensitivity. Everything is done so that Q quantity is definitely blocked, stopped in relation to that which is supported by another quantity, the $Q\dot{\eta}$ quantity – the latter determines the level that distinguishes the ψ apparatus within the neu-ronic whole. For the Entwurf is, in fact, the theory of a neuronic apparatus in relation to which the organism remains exterior, just as much as the outside world.

Let us turn to quality. There, too, the outside world doesn't lose all quality. But, as the theory of the sensory organs shows, this quality is inscribed in a discontinuous way, according to a scale cut off at each end and shortened in relation to the different sensory fields in question. A sensory apparatus, Freud tells us, doesn't only play the role of extinguisher or of shock-absorber, like the φ apparatus in general, but also plays the role of sieve.

He doesn't go any further in the direction of potential solutions that properly belong to the domain of the physiologist, of the man who wrote The Sensations, Mr. Piéron. The question of whether, in the field likely to provoke visual, auditory or other perceptions, the choice is made in this way or that is not pursued further. Still, we do have there also the notion of a deep subjectivization of the outside world. Something sifts, sieves, in such a way that reality is only perceived by man, in his natural, spontaneous state at least, as radically selected. Man deals with selected bits of reality.

In truth, that only occurs in a function which is localized in relation to the economy of the whole; it doesn't concern quality to the extent that it provides deeper information, that it achieves an essence, but only signs. Freud only sees them playing a role insofar as they are Qualitätszeichen, but the function of sign isn't significant in relation to opaque and enigmatic quality. It is a sign to the extent that it alerts us to the presence of something that has, in effect, to do with the outside world; it signals to consciousness that it has to deal with the outside world.

Consciousness has to come to terms with that outside world, and it has had to come to terms with it ever since men have existed and thought and tried out theories of knowledge. Freud doesn't take the problem any further except to note that it is certainly highly complex and that we are still a long way from being able to outline a solution of that which organically determines its particular genesis so precisely.

But given this, is that all that is involved when Freud speaks to us of the reality principle? Isn't this relation no more than that which certain theorists of behaviorism suggest to us? The kind which represents the fortunate encounters of an organism faced with a world where it doubtless finds something to eat and of which it is capable of assimilating certain elements, but which is in principle made up of random events and chance meetings, chaotic. Is that all Freud expresses when he speaks of the reality principle?

That is the question I am raising here today with the notion of das Ding.

2

Before going any further, I will once again draw your attention to the contents of the little table with its double column that I introduced two weeks ago (see p. 34).

In one column there is the Lustprinzip; in the other, the Realitätsprinzip. Unconscious activity is on the side of the pleasure principle. The reality principle dominates that which, whether conscious or preconscious, is in any case present in the order of reasoned discourse, articulatable, accessible and emerging from the preconscious. I pointed out that to the extent that they are dominated by the pleasure principle, the thought processes are unconscious, as Freud emphasizes. They are only available to consciousness to the extent that they can be verbalized, that a reasoned account brings them within range of the reality principle, within range of a consciousness that is perpetually alert, interested through the investment of its attention in discovering something that may happen, so as to allow it to find its bearings in the real world.

It is in his own words that the subject in the most precarious of ways manages to grasp the ruses thanks to which his ideas are made to fit together in his thought, ideas that often emerge in the most enigmatic of ways. The need to speak them, to articulate them, introduces within them an often artificial order. Freud liked to insist on this point when he said that one always finds reasons for finding this attitude or that mood come over one, one after the other, but there is after all nothing to confirm that the true cause of their successive emergence is given us. It is precisely this that analysis adds to our experience.

There is always an abundance of reasons to make us believe in some rational explanation for the sequentiality of our endopsychic forms. However, as we know, in the majority of cases their true connections are to be found somewhere completely different.

Thus the process of thought is to be found in the field of the unconscious – I mean that thought process through which access to reality finds its way, the Not des Lebens, which maintains at a certain level the investment of the apparatus. It is only accessible through the artifice of the spoken word. Freud even goes so far as to say that it is only insofar as relations are spoken that we can hear ourselves speak, that there is Bewegung, movement of speech – I don't think the use of this word is very common in German, and if Freud uses it, it is to emphasize the strangeness of the notion he insists on. It is only insofar as this Bewegung announces itself in the ω system that something may be known concerning whatever is introduced into the circuit to any degree – into the circuit that at the level of the φ apparatus tends above all to discharge itself through movement, so as to maintain tension at the lowest possible level.

The conscious subject is aware of what is involved in the process of Abfuhr, and appears under the sign of the pleasure principle only insofar as there is something centripetal in the movement, that there is a sense of movement toward speech, a sense of effort. And that would be limited to a dim perception, capable at the most of opposing in the world the two important qualities that Freud doesn't fail to characterize as monotonous – i.e., immobility and mobility, that which can move and that which it is impossible to move – if certain movements of a different structure didn't exist, that is, the articulated movements of words. That is once again something that is characterized by monotony, pallor, lack of color, but that is also the way everything that has to do with the thought processes reaches consciousness, with those tiny attempts to proceed from Vorstellung to Vorstellung, from representation to representation, around which the human world is organized. It is only insofar as something in the sensory-motor circuit manages to interest the ψ system at a certain level that something is perceived retroactively, something tangible, in the form of a Wortvorstellung.

That is how the conscious system, the ω system, can register something that happens in the psyche. Freud refers to it on a number of occasions, not without caution and sometimes ambiguously, as an endopsychic perception.

Let me emphasize further what is going on in the ψ system. From the Entwurf on, Freud isolates an Ich system. We will see its metamorphoses and transformations in subsequent developments of the theory, but it appears right away with all the ambiguity that Freud will reaffirm later when he says that the Ich is to a great extent unconscious.

The Ich is precisely defined in the Einführung des Ichs as a system that is uniformly invested with something which has a Gleichbesetzung – Freud did not write that term but I am following the drift of what he says relative to an equal, uniform investment. There is in the ψ system something that is constituted as an Ich and which is "eine Gruppe von Neuronen . . . . die konstant besetz ist, also dem durch die sekundäre Funktion erforderten Vorratsträger entspricht" – the term Vorrat in particular is repeated here. The maintenance of this investment characterizes a regulatory function there. And I am speaking of function here. If there is an unconscious, it is the Ich insofar as it is an unconscious function. And we have to deal with it insofar as it is regulated by that Besetzung, by that Gleichbesetzung. Whence the value of the decussation on which I insist and which we will see maintained in its duality throughout the development of Freud's thought.

Now the system which perceives and registers, and which will later be called the Wahrnehmungsbewusstsein, is not on the level of the ego to the extent that it maintains equal and uniform and, as far as possible constant, the Besetzung that regulates the functioning of thought. Consciousness is elsewhere; it is an apparatus that Freud has to invent, that he tells us is intermediary between the ψ system and the φ system, yet that at the same time everything in the text informs us we should not put at the boundary between them. The fact is that the ψ system enters directly, doubtless through an apparatus, and spreads itself directly throughout the φ system, where it only gives up a part of the quantity that it brings with it.

The ω system functions elsewhere in a more isolated position, one that is less easily situated than any other apparatus. In fact, it isn't from exterior quantity that the ω neurons extract their energy, Freud tells us; one can assume at most that they "sich die Periode aneignen," they appropriate the period. That is what I was alluding to just now when I was referring to the choice of sensory apparatus. It plays a guiding role there in relation to the contributions coming from the Qualitätszeichen, in order to allow with the least movement all those departures that are individualized as attention paid to this or that chosen point on the circuit, and that will permit a better approximation to the process than the pleasure principle would tend to make automatically.

As soon as Freud tries to articulate the function of this system, something strikes us about this coupling, this union, which seems a fusion, between Wahrnehmung, perception, and Bewusstsein, consciousness, expressed in the symbol W-Bw. I enjoin you to refer to letter 52 that, as Lefèvre-Pontalis noted last time, I have remarked on a number of times.[1] It is a letter in which Freud begins to explain to Fliess in confidence his conception of how the unconscious must work. His whole theory of memory has to do with the sequence of Niederschriften, of inscriptions. The fundamental demand to which the whole system responds is that of ordering, in a coherent conception of the psychic apparatus, the different fields of that which he finds effectively functioning in the memory traces.

In letter 52 Wahrnehmung, that is to say the impression of the external world as raw, original, primitive, is outside the field which corresponds to a notable experience, namely, one that is effectively inscribed in something that, it is quite striking to note, Freud expresses right at the beginning of his thought as a Niederschrift, something that presents itself not simply in terms of Prägung or of impression, but in the sense of something which makes a sign and which is of the order of writing. And I wasn't the one who made him choose that term.

The first Niederschrift occurs at a certain age that his first estimate has him situate before four years old, but that's not important. Later, up to the age of eight, another, more organized Niederschrift, one that is organized in terms of memories, seems to me to constitute more precisely an unconscious. It's not important if Freud is right or wrong; we have seen since how we can trace the unconscious and its organization of thought much further back. What is important is that next we have the level of the Vorbewusstsein and then that of the Bewusstsein insofar as it is not the sign of a time but of a terminus. In other words, that discussion which takes us forward from a meaning of the world to speech that can be formulated, the chain that extends from the most archaic unconscious to the articulate form of speech in a subject, all that takes place between Wahrnehmung and Bewusstsein, between glove and hand, so to speak. The progress that interests Freud is then situated somewhere that, from the point of view of the topology of the subject, is not easily identified with a neuronic apparatus. Yet what goes on between Wahrnehmung and Bewusstsein must after all have to do with the unconscious, since that's how Freud represents it to us – this time not simply in the form of a function, but of an Aufbau, of a structure, as he puts it himself in making the opposition.

[1] The Complete Letters of Sigmund Freud to Wilhelm Fliess, pp. 158–162.

In other words, it is to the extent that the signifying structure interposes itself between perception and consciousness that the unconscious intervenes, that the pleasure principle intervenes. Yet it is no longer in the form of a Gleichbesetzung or the function of the maintenance of a certain investment, but insofar as it concerns the Bahnungen. The structure of accumulated experience resides there and remains inscribed there.

At the level of the Ich, of the functioning unconscious, something regulates itself that tends to exclude the outside world. On the other hand, what is expressed at the level of Übung is discharge. And one finds the same intersection as in the whole economy of the apparatus. The structure regulates discharge; the function restrains it. Freud also calls that Vorrat, provisions; this is the word he uses for the larder of his own unconscious, Vorratskammer. Vorratsträger is the Ich as the basis of quantity and of energy that constitutes the core of the psychic apparatus.

On that basis there enters into play what we will see function as the first apprehension of reality by the subject. And it is at this point that that reality intervenes, which has the most intimate relationship to the subject, the Nebenmensch. The formula is striking to the extent that it expresses powerfully the idea of beside yet alike, separation and identity.

I ought really to read you the whole passage but I will limit myself to the climactic sentence: "Thus the complex of the Nebenmensch is separated into two parts, one of which affirms itself through an unchanging apparatus, which remains together as a thing, als Ding."

That's what the awful French translation you have at your disposal misses when it says "something remains as a coherent whole." It has nothing to do with an allusion to a coherent whole that would occur in the passage from the verb to the noun, quite the contrary. The Ding is the element that is initially isolated by the subject in his experience of the Nebenmensch as being by its very nature alien, Fremde. The complex of the object is in two parts; there is a division, a difference in the approach to judgment. Everything in the object that is quality can be formulated as an attribute; it belongs to the investment of the ψ system and constitutes the earliest Vorstellungen around which the destiny of all that is controlled according to the laws of Lust and Unlust, of pleasure and unpleasure, will be played out in what might be called the primary emergences of the subject. Das Ding is something entirely different.

We have here an original division of the experience of reality. We find it as well in Verneinung. Look it up in the text. You will find the same function with the same significance of that which, from within the subject, finds itself in the beginning led toward a first outside – an outside which, Freud tells us, has nothing to do with that reality in which the subject will subsequently have to locate the Qualitätszeichen, signs that tell him that he is on the right track in his search for satisfaction.

That is something which, even prior to the test of this search, sets up its end, goal and aim. That's what Freud indicates when he says that "the first and most immediate goal of the test of reality is not to find in a real perception an object which corresponds to the one which the subject represents to himself at that moment, but to find it again, to confirm that it is still present in reality."

The whole progress of the subject is then oriented around the Ding as Fremde, strange and even hostile on occasion, or in any case the first outside. It is clearly a probing form of progress that seeks points of reference, but with relation to what? – with the world of desires. It demonstrates that something is there after all, and that to a certain extent it may be useful. Yet useful for what? – for nothing other than to serve as points of reference in relation to the world of wishes and expectations; it is turned toward that which helps on certain occasions to reach das Ding. That object will be there when in the end all conditions have been fulfilled – it is, of course, clear that what is supposed to be found cannot be found again. It is in its nature that the object as such is lost. It will never be found again. Something is there while one waits for something better, or worse, but which one wants.

The world of our experience, the Freudian world, assumes that it is this object, das Ding, as the absolute Other of the subject, that one is supposed to find again. It is to be found at the most as something missed. One doesn't find it, but only its pleasurable associations. It is in this state of wishing for it and waiting for it that, in the name of the pleasure principle, the optimum tension will be sought; below that there is neither perception nor effort.

In the end, in the absence of something which hallucinates it in the form of a system of references, a world of perception cannot be organized in a valid way, cannot be constituted in a human way. The world of perception is represented by Freud as dependent on that fundamental hallucination without which there would be no attention available.

3

Here we come to the notion of the spezifische Aktion of which Freud speaks on a number of occasions, and that I would like to shed some light on here. There is, in fact, an ambiguity in the Befriedigungserlebnis. What is sought is the object in relation to which the pleasure principle functions. This functioning is in the material, the web, the medium to which all practical experience makes a reference. How then does Freud conceive of this experience, this specific action?

In this connection one has to read his correspondence with Fliess to appreciate the significance of it, and in particular that letter referred to above, which still has a lot to tell us. He says that an attack of hysteria is not a discharge. It is a warning to those who always feel the need to place the emphasis on the role of quantity in the functioning of affect. There is no field more favorable than that of hysteria to suggest to what extent in the concatenation of psychic events a fact is a question of relative contingency. It is by no means a discharge, sondern eine Aktion – an action, moreover, which is Mittel von Reproduktion von Lust.

We will see how what Freud calls an action is made clear. The essential characteristic of any action is to be a Mittel, a means of reproduction. In its root at least it is this: "Das ist er [der hysterische Anfall] wenigstens in der Wurzel." And elsewhere "sonst motiviert er sich von dem Vorbewusstsein allerlei Gründen" – an action may be motivated on all kinds of grounds which are located at the level of the preconscious.

Immediately afterwards Freud explains what its essence consists of. And he illustrates at the same time what an action as Mittel zur Reproduktion means. In the case of hysteria, of a crisis of tears, everything is calculated, regulated, and, as it were, focused on den Anderen, on the Other, the prehistoric, unforgettable Other, that later no one will ever reach.

The thoughts we find expressed here allow us to make a first approach to the problem of neurosis and to understand its correlative or regulatory term. If one goal of the specific action which aims for the experience of satisfaction is to reproduce the initial state, to find das Ding, the object, again, we will be able to understand a great many forms of neurotic behavior.

The behavior of the hysteric, for example, has as its aim to recreate a state centered on the object, insofar as this object, das Ding, is, as Freud wrote somewhere, the support of an aversion. It is because the primary object is an object which failed to give satisfaction that the specific Erlebnis of the hysteric is organized.

On the other hand – this is Freud's distinction and we don't need to give it up – in obsessional neurosis, the object with relation to which the fundamental experience, the experience of pleasure, is organized, is an object which literally gives too much pleasure. Freud perceived this clearly; it was his first apperception of obsessional neurosis.

What in its various advances and many byways the behavior of the obsessional reveals and signifies is that he regulates his behavior so as to avoid what the subject often sees quite clearly as the goal and end of his desire. The motivation of this avoidance is often extraordinarily radical, since the pleasure principle is presented to us as possessing a mode of operation which is precisely to avoid excess, too much pleasure.

So as to move fast – as fast as Freud in his first apperceptions of ethical reality, insofar as it functions in the subject whom he is dealing with – I will outline the positing of the subject in the third of the major categories that Freud distinguishes at the beginning – hysteria, obsessional neurosis, and paranoia. As far as paranoia is concerned, Freud gives us a term that I invite you to reflect on as it first emerged, namely, Versagen des Glaubens. The paranoid doesn't believe in that first stranger in relation to whom the subject is obliged to take his bearings.

The use of the term belief seems to me to be emphasized in a less psychological sense than first seems to be the case. The radical attitude of the paranoid, as designated by Freud, concerns the deepest level of the relationship of man to reality, namely, that which is articulated as faith. Here you can see easily how the connection with a different perspective is created that comes to meet it – I already referred to it when I said that the moving force of paranoia is essentially the rejection of a certain support in the symbolic order, of that specific support around which the division between the two sides of the relationship to das Ding operates – as we will see in subsequent discussions.

Das Ding is that which I will call the beyond-of-the-signified. It is as a function of this beyond-of-the-signified and of an emotional relationship to it that the subject keeps its distance and is constituted in a kind of relationship characterized by primary affect, prior to any repression. The whole initial articulation of the Entwurf takes place around it. Let us not forget that repression still posed a problem for Freud. And everything that he will subsequently say about repression, in its extraordinary sophistication, can only be understood as responding to the need to understand the specificity of repression compared to all the other forms of defense.

It is then in relation to the original Ding that the first orientation, the first choice, the first seat of subjective orientation takes place, and that I will sometimes call Neuronenwahl, the choice of neurosis. That first grinding will henceforth regulate the function of the pleasure principle.

It remains for us to see that it is in the same place that something which is the opposite, the reverse and the same combined, is also organized, and which in the end substitutes itself for that dumb reality which is das Ding – that is to say, the reality that commands and regulates. That is something which emerges in the philosophy of someone who, better than anyone else, glimpsed the function of das Ding, although he only approached it by the path of the philosophy of science, namely, Kant. In the end, it is conceivable that it is as a pure signifying system, as a universal maxim, as that which is the most lacking in a relationship to the individual, that the features of das Ding must be presented. It is here that, along with Kant, we must see the focal point, aim and convergence, according to which an action that we will qualify as moral will present itself. And which, moreover, we will see present itself paradoxically as the rule of a certain Gut or good.

Today I will simply emphasize this: the Thing only presents itself to the extent that it becomes word, hits the bull's eye,[2] as they say. In Freud's text the way in which the stranger, the hostile figure, appears in the first experience of reality for the human subject is the cry. I suggest we do not need this cry. Here I would like to make a reference to something that is more inscribed in the French than in the German language – each language has its advantages. The German das Wort, word, is both le mot and la parole in French. The word le mot has a particular weight and meaning. "Mot" refers essentially to "no response." "Mot," La Fontaine says somewhere, is what remains silent; it is precisely that in response to which no word is spoken. The things in question are things insofar as they are dumb – some people might object that these things are placed by Freud at a higher level than the world of signifiers that I have described as the true moving force of the functioning in man of that process designated as primary. And dumb things are not exactly the same as things which have no relationship to words.

It is enough to evoke a face which is familiar to everyone of you, that of the terrible dumb brother of the four Marx brothers, Harpo. Is there anything that poses a question which is more present, more pressing, more absorbing, more disruptive, more nauseating, more calculated to thrust everything that takes place before us into the abyss or void than that face of Harpo Marx, that face with its smile which leaves us unclear as to whether it signifies the most extreme perversity or complete simplicity? This dumb man alone is sufficient to sustain the atmosphere of doubt and of radical annihilation which is the stuff of the Marx brothers' extraordinary farce and the uninterrupted play of "jokes"[3] that makes their activity so valuable.

[2] The French here contains a pun: "faire mouche" means to hit the bull's-eye and by analogy with that Lacan creates the phrase "faire mot," to become word.

[3] In English in the original.

Just one more thing. I have spoken today of the Other as a Ding. I would like to conclude with something that is much more accessible to our experience. And that is the isolated use that French reserves for certain forms of the pronoun of interpellation. What does the emission, the articulation, the sudden emergence from out of our voice of that "You!" (Toi!) mean? A "You" that may appear on our lips at a moment of utter helplessness, distress or surprise in the presence of something that I will not right off call death, but that is certainly for us an especially privileged other – one around which our principle concerns gravitate, and which for all that still manages to embarrass us.

I do not think that this "You" is simple – this you of devotion that other manifestations of the need to cherish occasionally comes up against. I believe that one finds in that word the temptation to tame the Other, that prehistoric, that unforgettable Other, which suddenly threatens to surprise us and to cast us down from the height of its appearance. "You" contains a form of defense, and I would say that at the moment when it is spoken, it is entirely in this "You," and nowhere else, that one finds what I have evoked today concerning das Ding.

So as not to end with something that might seem to you to be so optimistic, I will focus on the weight of the identity of the thing and the word that we can find in another isolated use of the word.

To the "You" which, according to me, tames, but which tames nothing, a "You" of vain incantation and fruitless connection, there corresponds what may happen to us when some order comes from beyond the apparatus where there lurks that which, along with ourselves, has to do with das Ding. I am thinking of what we answer when we are made responsible or accountable for something. "Me!" (Moi!).[4] What is this "Me!", this "Me!" all by itself, if it is not a "Me!" of apology, a "Me!" of refusal, a "Me!" that's simply not for me?

Thus from its beginning the "I" as thrust forth in an antagonistic movement, the "I" as defense, the "I" as primarily and above all an "I" that refuses and denounces rather than announces, the "I" in the isolated experience of its sudden emergence – which is also perhaps to be considered as its original decline – this "I" is articulated here.

I will speak about this "I" again next time in order to explore further the way in which moral action presents itself as an experience of satisfaction.

December 9, 1959

[4] It should be noted that the emphatic first pronoun "moi" is also used in French to mean both "self" and "ego."

V

Das Ding (II)

THE COMBINATOIRE OF THE VORSTELLUNGEN
THE LIMIT OF PAIN BETWEEN PERCEPTION AND CONSCIOUSNESS THE INTERSAID OF VERNEINUNG
MOTHER AS DAS DING

Freud comments somewhere that if psychology succeeded in making some people anxious, by insisting excessively on the reign of the instincts, it nevertheless also promoted the importance of the moral agency.

This is an obvious truth, one that is confirmed every day in our practice.

Furthermore, we still do not rate highly enough in the world outside the exorbitant character of the power of the sense of guilt, which is exercised without the subject's knowledge. Thus it is that which presents itself in the massive guise of the sense of guilt that I believe is important to focus on more narrowly this year. Moreover, it is important to articulate it so as to bring out the originality, the revolution in thought, that was the effect of the Freudian experience in the field of ethics.

1

Last time I tried to show you the meaning in Freudian psychology of the Entwurf in connection with which Freud organized his first intuition concerning what takes place in the experience of the neurotic. I tried, in particular, to show you the pivotal function that we must accord something which is to be found in a detour taken by the text. And it is one that it is important not to miss, especially since Freud picks up on it again in a variety of forms right to the end. I mean das Ding.

Right at the beginning of the organization of the world in the psyche, both logically and chronologically, das Ding is something that presents and isolates itself as the strange feature around which the whole movement of the Vorstellung turns – a Vorstellung that Freud shows us is governed by a regulatory principle, the so-called pleasure principle, which is tied to the functioning of the neuronic apparatus. And it is around das Ding that the whole adaptive development revolves, a development that is so specific to man insofar as the symbolic process reveals itself to be inextricably woven into it.

We find das Ding again in the Verneinung article of 1925, an article that is full of ideas and also of questions. It occurs in a formula which we must assume to be essential since it is placed at the center of the article and is, so to speak, the crucial enigma. Das Ding has, in effect, to be identified with the Wieder zu finden, the impulse to find again that for Freud establishes the orientation of the human subject to the object. Yet you should note that this object is not even stated. And here we might give its due to a certain textual criticism, whose attachment to the signifier sometimes seems to take a talmudic turn. It is remarkable that the object in question is nowhere articulated by Freud.

Moreover, since it is a matter of finding it again, we might just as well characterize this object as a lost object. But although it is essentially a question of finding it again, the object indeed has never been lost. In this orientation to the object, the regulation of the thread, the Vorstellungen relate to each other in accordance with the laws of a memory organization, a memory complex, a Bahnung (that is to say, a facilitator, but also, I would say more decidedly, a concatenation) whose neuronic apparatus perhaps allows us to glimpse those operations in a material form, and whose functioning is governed by the law of the pleasure principle.

The pleasure principle governs the search for the object and imposes the detours which maintain the distance in relation to its end. Even in French the etymology of the word – which replaced the archaic "quérir ("to search")" – refers to circa, detour. The transference of the quantity from Vorstellung to Vorstellung always maintains the search at a certain distance from that which it gravitates around. The object to be found confers on the search its invisible law; but it is not that, on the other hand, which controls its movements. The element that fixes these movements, that models the return – and this return itself is maintained at a distance – is the pleasure principle. It is the pleasure principle which, when all is said and done, subjects the search to encounter nothing but the satisfaction of the Not des Lebens.

Thus the search encounters in its path a series of satisfactions that are tied to the relation to the object and are polarized by it. And at every point they model, guide and support its movements according to the particular law of the pleasure principle. This law fixes the level of a certain quantity of excitation which cannot be exceeded without going beyond the limit of the Lust/Unlust polarity – pleasure and unpleasure are the only two forms through which that same and single mode of regulation we call the pleasure principle expresses itself.

The admission of quantity is regulated by the width of the channels that do the conducting, by the individual diameters that a given organism can support – the thing is expressed metaphorically by Freud, but it is almost as if we were to take it literally. What happens once the limit is exceeded? The psychic impulse is not as such capable of advancing any further toward what is supposed to be its goal. Instead it is scattered and diffused within the psychic organism; the quantity is transformed into complexity. In a kind of expansion of the lighted zone of the neuronic organism, here and there in the distance, it lights up according to the laws of associative facilitation, or constellations of Vorstellungen which regulate the association of ideas, unconscious Gedanken, according to the pleasure principle.

The limit has a name. It is something more than the Lust/Unlust polarity Freud speaks of.

I would have you note that it is avoidance, flight, movement, which in the beginning, even before the system starts to function, normally intervenes in order to regulate the invasion of quantity in accordance with the pleasure principle. And it is to the motor system that the function of regulating the bearable or homeostatic level of tension for the organism is handed over in the end. But the homeostatis of the nervous system, which is the site of autonomous regulatory mechanism, is distinct from the general homeostasis (with all the potential for conflict that that implies), the homeostasis which activates the balance of moods. The balancing of moods occurs, but as an order of stimulation arising from within. That is how Freud expresses it. Certain stimulations come from within the nervous system, and he compares them to external stimulations.

I would like us to stop for a moment at this limit of pain.

Those commentators who collected the letters to Fliess consider that Freud slipped up by using the term motorisch, motor, instead of secretorisch, cell, nucleus, organ. I once said that it did not seem to be clear that it was such a slip. Freud tells us, in effect, that in the majority of cases, the reaction of pain derives from the fact that the motor reaction, the flight reaction, is impossible. And the reason for this is that the stimulation, the excitation, comes from within. Consequently, it seems to me that this so-called slip is only present in order to point to the fundamental homology between the relationship of pain and the motor reaction. Besides – this idea occurred to me a long time ago, and I hope you will not find it absurd – in the organization of the spinal marrow, the neurons and axons of pain coexist at the same level and at the same spot as certain neurons and axons of the tonic motor system.

Thus, even pain must not be simply attributed to the register of sensory reactions. I would say, and this is something that the surgery of pain reveals, that it is not a question of something simple, which can be considered a simple quality of sensory reaction. The complex character of pain, the character that, so to speak, makes it an intermediary between afferent and efferent, is suggested by the surprising results of certain operations, which in the case of some internal illnesses, including some cancers, allow the notation of pain to be preserved, when the suppression or removal of a certain subjective quality has been effected, which accounts for the fact that it is unbearable.

All this belongs to the sphere of modern physiological research, and it does not yet allow us to explain the problem fully. I will, therefore, limit myself to suggesting that we should perhaps conceive of pain as a field which, in the realm of existence, opens precisely onto that limit where a living being has no possibility of escape.

Isn't something of this suggested to us by the insight of the poets in that myth of Daphne transformed into a tree under the pressure of a pain from which she cannot flee? Isn't it true that the living being who has no possibility of escape suggests in its very form the presence of what one might call petrified pain? Doesn't what we do in the realm of stone suggest this? To the extent that we don't let it roll,[1] but erect it, and make of it something fixed, isn't there in architecture itself a kind of actualization of pain?

What happened during the period of the Baroque, under the influence of an historical movement that we will come back to later, would support this idea. Something was attempted then to make architecture itself aim at pleasure, to give it a form of liberation, which, in effect, made it blaze up so as to constitute a paradox in the history of masonry and of building. And that goal of pleasure gave us forms which, in a metaphorical language that in itself takes us a long way, we call "tortured."

I hope you will pardon my digression, since it does, in fact, point in the direction of the themes we will take up again later, in connection with the man of pleasure and the eighteenth century, and the very style it introduced into the investigation of eroticism.

Let us return to our Vorstellungen, and try to understand them now, to surprise them in their operations, so as to understand what is involved in Freudian psychology.

The character of imaginary composition, of the imaginary element of the object, makes of it what one might call the substance of appearance, the material of a living lure – an apparition open to the deception of an Erscheinung, I would say, if I took the liberty of speaking German; that is to say, that by means of which the appearance is sustained, but which is also at the same time an unremarkable apparition – something that creates that Vor, that third element, something that is produced starting from the Thing. Vorstellung is something that is essentially fragmented. It is that around which Western philosophy since Aristotle and φαντασία has always revolved.

Vorstellung is understood by Freud in a radical sense, in the form in which it appears in a philosophy that is essentially marked by the theory of knowledge. And that is the remarkable thing about it. He assigned to it in an extreme form the character philosophers themselves have been unable to reduce it to, namely, that of an empty body, a ghost, a pale incubus of the relation to the world, an enfeebled jouissance, which through the age-old interrogations of the philosophers makes it the essential feature. And by isolating it in this function, Freud removes it from its tradition.

[1] The pun here involves a reference to the French proverb "Pierre qui roule n'amasse pas mousse." – "A rolling stone gathers no moss."

And the sphere, order, and gravitation of the Vorstellungen, where does he locate them? I told you last time that if one reads Freud carefully, one has to locate them between perception and consciousness, between the glove and the hand.

It is between perception and consciousness that is inserted that which functions at the level of the pleasure principle. Which is what precisely? – The thought processes insofar as they regulate by means of the pleasure principle the investment of the Vorstellungen, and the structure in which the unconscious is organized, the structure in which the underlying unconscious mechanisms are flocculated. And it is this which makes the small curds of representation, that is to say, something which has the same structure as the signifier – a point on which I insist. That is not just Vorstellung, but as Freud writes later in the same article on the unconscious, Vorstellungsrepräsentanz; and he thus turns Vorstellung into an associative and combinatory element. In that way the world of Vorstellung is already organized according to the possibilities of the signifier as such. Already at the level of the unconscious there exists an organization that, as Freud says, is not necessarily that of contradiction or of grammar, but the laws of condensation and displacement, those that I call the laws of metaphor and metonymy.

Why should it be a surprise, therefore, if Freud tells us that these thought processes that take place between perception and consciousness would not mean anything to consciousness, if they were not transmitted there by the mediation of a discourse, of that which can be clarified in the Vorbewusstsein, in preconsciousness? But what does that mean? Freud leaves us with little doubt; it is a question of words. And we must, of course, situate the Wortvorstellungen that are involved in relation to our argument here.

Freud tells us this is not the same thing as the Vorstellungen whose thought processes of superposition, metaphor and metonymy we follow through the unconscious mechanism. It is something entirely different. The Wortvorstellungen inaugurate a discourse that is articulated on the thought processes. In other words, we know nothing about our thought processes, unless we engage in psychology – allow me to say that to make my point more forcefully. We only know them because we are speaking of something which goes on inside us, because we are speaking of them in terms that are unavoidable – terms whose indignity, emptiness and vanity we are also aware of. It is from that moment when we speak of our will and our understanding as distinct faculties that we have a preconscious, and that we are able, in effect, to articulate in a discourse something of that chattering by means of which we articulate ourselves inside ourselves, we justify ourselves, or we rationalize for ourselves, with reference to this or that, the progress of our desire.

It is definitely a discourse that is involved. And Freud emphasizes that, after all, we know nothing else except this discourse. That which emerges in the Bewusstsein is Wahrnehmung, the perception of this discourse, and nothing else. That is exactly what he thinks.

That is why he tends to reject utterly superficial representations or, to use Silberer's term, the functional phenomena. There are no doubt in a given phase of a dream things that represent the functioning of the psyche to us imagistically – a notable example represents the layers of psychic activity in the form of the game of Chutes and Ladders. What does Freud say? Involved here is the production of dreams by a mind given to metaphysics or, in other words, to psychology, which tends to expand on what the discourse necessarily imposes on us when we should be trying to distinguish a certain rhythm in our inner experience. But this representation, Freud tells us, overlooks that structure, that most profound gravitation, which is established at the level of the Vorstellungen. And he affirms that these Vorstellungen gravitate, operate exchanges and are modulated according to laws that you will recognize, if you have followed my teaching, as the fundamental laws of the signifying chain.

Have I managed to make myself understood? It seems to me difficult to be any clearer as far as this essential point is concerned.

2

We have now reached the point where we must distinguish the effective articulation of a discourse, of the gravitation of the Vorstellungen, in the form of Vorstellungsrepräsentanzen of these unconscious articulations. We must examine what in such circumstances we mean by Sachvorstellungen. The latter are to be set in polar opposition to word play, to Wortvorstellungen, but at this level they go together. As far as das Ding is concerned, that is something else. Das Ding is a primordial function which is located at the level of the initial establishment of the gravitation of the unconscious Vorstellungen.

I did not have time last week to make you appreciate how in ordinary German usage there is a linguistic difference between Ding and Sache.

It is clear that in every case they cannot be used interchangeably. And that even if there are cases where one can use either one, to choose one or the other in German gives a particular emphasis to the discourse. I ask those who know German to refer to the examples in the dictionary. One does not use Sache for religious matters, but one nevertheless says that faith is not jeder- man Ding – it is not for everybody. Master Eckhart uses Ding to refer to the soul, and heaven knows that for Master Eckhart the soul was a Grossding, the biggest of things. He certainly would not use the term Sache. If I wanted to make you sense the differences by giving you a general measure of the way in which the use of the signifier breaks down differently in German relative to French, I would cite this sentence that I was on the point of citing last time, but that I held back because I am not after all a Germanist, and I wanted to make use of the interval to test it on the ears of some people whose mother tongue is German. One could say that "Die Sache ist das Wort des Dinges." Or, in French, "L'affaire est le mot de la chose ("The affair is the word of the thing.")."

It is precisely as we shift into discourse that das Ding, the Thing, is resolved into a series of effects – in the sense that one can say meine Sache. That suggests all my kit and caboodle, and is something very different from das Ding – that thing to which we must now return.

You will not be surprised if I tell you that at the level of the Vorstellungen, the Thing is not nothing, but literally is not. It is characterized by its absence, its strangeness.

Everything about it that is articulated as good or bad divides the subject in connection with it, and it does so irrepressibly, irremediably, and no doubt with relation to the same Thing. There is not a good and a bad object; there is good and bad, and then there is the Thing. The good and the bad already belong to the order of the Vorstellung; they exist there as clues to that which orients the position of the subject, according to the pleasure principle, in connection with that which will never be more than representation, search for a privileged state, for a desired state, for the expectation of what? Of something that is always a certain distance from the Thing, even if it is regulated by the Thing, which is there in a beyond.

We see it at the level of what the other day we noted were the stages of the φ system. Here there are Wahrnehmungszeichen, here there is Vorbewusstsein, here there are the Wortvorstellungen, insofar as they reflect in a discourse what goes on at the level of the thought processes. And the latter are themselves governed by the laws of the Unbewusst, that is to say, by the pleasure principle. The Wortvorstellungen, as a reflection of discourse, stand in opposition to that which is ordered in the Vorstellungsrepräsentanzen according to an economy of words. And in the Entwurf Freud calls these Vorstellungsrepräsentanzen conceptual memories, which is no more than a first approximation of the same notion.

At the level of the φ system, that is to say, at the level of what takes place before the entry into the ψ system, and the crossover into the space of the Bahnung and the organization of the Vorstellungen, the typical reaction of the organism as regulated by the neuronic system is avoidance. Things are ver- meidet, avoided. The level of the Vorstellungsrepräsentanzen is the special site of Verdrängung. The level of Wortvorstellungen is the site of Verneinung.

I will stop there for a moment to explain the meaning of a point which is still a problem for some of you in connection with Verneinung. As Freud notes, it is the privileged means of connotation at the level of discourse for whatever is verdrängt or repressed in the unconscious. Verneinen is the paradoxical way in which what is hidden, verborgen, in the unconscious is located in spoken, enunciated discourse, in the discourse of Bewusstwerden; verneinen is the manner in which what is simultaneously actualized and denied comes to be avowed.

One should continue this study of Verneinung that I have just begun with a study of the negative particle. Following Pichon's example, I have already pointed out here the subtly differentiated use in French of this pleonastic "ne," which, as I showed, makes it seem paradoxical when, for example, the subject enunciates his own fear.

We do not say "Je crains qu'il vienne" ("I am afraid he may come"), as logic would seem to demand, but "Je crains qu'il ne vienne" ("I am afraid he may [not] come").[2] This "ne" has a floating place between the two levels of the graph that I showed you how to use, so as to distinguish between the level of enunciation and the level of the enunciated. By enunciating "I am afraid that . . .," I make it appear both in its reality, and in its reality as a wish –" . . . he may come." And it is here that in French the little "ne" is interposed, which points to the discordance between the levels of enunciation and of the enunciated.

The negative particle "ne" only emerges at the moment when I really speak, and not at the moment when I am spoken, if I am on the level of the unconscious. And I think it is a good idea to interpret Freud in a similar way when he says that there is no negation at the level of the unconscious. Given that immediately afterwards, he shows us that there is indeed negation. That is to say, in the unconscious there are all kinds of ways of representing negation metaphorically. There are all kinds of ways of representing it in a dream, except, of course, for the little negative particle "ne," because the particle only belongs to discourse.

The concrete examples show us the distinction that exists between the function of discourse and the function of speech.

Thus the Verneinung, far from being the pure and simple paradox of that which presents itself in the form of a "no," isn't just any old "no." There is a whole world of no-saying (non-dit), of interdiction (interdit), since it is in that very form that the Verdrängt, which is the unconscious, essentially presents itself. But the Verneinung is the most solid beachhead of that which I would call the "intersaid" (entre dit) in the same way that we say "interview." One might just as easily explore a little common usage in the sphere of the language of love, in all that is said when, for example, one says, "I do not say that . . ." or quite simply in the way people express themselves in Corneille: "No, I do not hate you."

[2] As Lacan's example suggests, the pleonastic "ne" in French grammar is a kind of submerged negation used after verbs of fearing and certain conjunctions. My bracketed "not" is designed to suggest the effect, since it has no equivalent in English.

You can see that in this game of Chutes and Ladders, from a certain point of view Verneinung represents the inverse of Verdrängung, and that there is a difference of organization between them with relation to the function of avowal. Let me point out to those for whom this still constitutes a problem that there is a correspondence between that which is fully articulated at the level of the unconscious, Verurteilung, and that which takes place at the level pointed to by Freud in letter 52, in the first signifying signification of Verneinung, that of Verwerfung.

One of you who shall remain nameless, Laplanche, in a dissertation on Hölderlin that we will, I hope, have the opportunity to discuss here some time, asked himself and asked me, what Verwerfung might be. He wanted to know if it was the paternal No / Name (Nom-de-père), as is the case in paranoia, or the No / Name of the Father (Nom-du-père).[3] If that's what it is, there are few pathological examples that put us in the presence of its absence, of its effective refusal. If it is the No / Name of the Father, are we not entering into a series of difficulties concerning the fact that something is always signified for the subject who is attached to experience, whether present or absent, something which for one reason or another and to a variety of degrees has come to occupy that place for him?

Of course, the notion of signifying substance cannot fail to create a problem for an alert mind. But don't forget that we are dealing with the system of the Wahrnehmnungszeichen, signs of perception, or, in other words, the first system of signifers, the original synchrony of the signifying system. Everything begins when several signifers can present themselves to the subject at the same time, in a Gleichzeitigkeit. It is at this level that Fort is the correlative of Da. Fort can only be expressed as an alternative derived from a basic synchrony. It is on the basis of this synchrony that something comes to be organized, something that the mere play of Fort and Da could not produce by itself.

I have already asked the question here as to what the critical conceivable minimum is for a signifying scale, if the register of the signifier is to begin to organize itself. There cannot be a two without a three, and that, I think, must certainly include a four, the quadripartite, the Geviert, to which Hei-degger refers somewhere. As we will see, the whole psychology of the psychotic develops insofar as a term may be refused, a term that maintains the basic system of words at a certain distance or relational dimension. Something is missing and his real effort at substitution and "significization" is directed in desperation at that. Let us hope that we will have the opportunity to return to the problem, along with the remarkable analysis that Laplanche has given of a poetic experience which displays and which unveils it, and makes it apparent in a way that is especially revealing, namely, the case of Hölderlin.

[3] In the context of this discussion of forms of denial, it seems appropriate to remind the English-speaking reader of the pun contained in the spoken French of the Nom-du-Père.

The function of this place is to contain words, in the sense in which contain means to keep – as a result of which an original distance and articulation are possible, through which synchrony is introduced, and it is on the foundation of synchrony that the essential dialect is then erected, that in which the Other may discover itself as the Other of the Other.

The Other of the Other only exists as a place. It finds its place even if we cannot find it anywhere in the real, even if all we can find to occupy this place in the real is simply valid insofar as it occupies this place, but cannot give it any other guarantee than that it is in its place.

It is in this way that another typology is established, the typology which institutes the relation to the real. And now we can define this relation to the real, and realize what the reality principle means.

3

The whole function of that which Freud articulates in the term superego, Uberich, is tied to the reality principle. And this would be no more than a banal play of words, if it were merely an alternative way of designating what has been called the moral conscience or something similar.

Freud gives us a completely new theory by showing us the root or psychological operation of something that in the human constitution weighs so heavily on all those forms of which there is no reason why we should misunderstand any, including the simplest, namely, that of the commandments and, I would even say, the ten commandments.

I will not avoid discussing these ten commandments that we might assume we know all about. It is clear that we see them functioning, if not in ourselves, at least in things in a singularly lively way. It will, therefore, perhaps be appropriate to look again at what Freud articulates here.

What that is, I will put in the following terms, terms that all the commentaries seem designed merely to make us forget. As far as the formation of morality is concerned, Freud contributes what some call the discovery and others the affirmation, and I believe is the affirmation of the discovery, that the fundamental or primordial law, the one where culture begins in opposition to nature, is the law of the prohibition of incest – nature and culture being precisely distinguished in Freud in a modern sense, that is to say, in the way in which Lévi-Strauss might articulate them today.

The whole development of psychoanalysis confirms it in an increasingly weighty manner, while at the same time it emphasizes it less and less. I mean that the whole development at the level of the mother/child interpsychology – and that is badly expressed in the so-called categories of frustration, satisfaction, and dependence – is nothing more than an immense development of the essential character of the maternal thing, of the mother, insofar as she occupies the place of that thing, of das Ding.

Everyone knows that its correlative is the desire for incest, which is Freud's discovery. There is no point in affirming that it is to be found somewhere in Plato, or that Diderot spoke of it in Rameau's Nephew or The Supplement to Bougainville's Voyage. That is of no interest to me. What is important is that there was a man who at a given historical moment stood up to affirm: "That's the fundamental desire."

And we must grasp this thought firmly in our hand. Freud designates the prohibition of incest as the underlying principle of the primordial law, the law of which all other cultural developments are no more than the consequences and ramifications. And at the same time he identifies incest as the fundamental desire.

Claude Lévi-Strauss in his magisterial work no doubt confirms the primordial character of the Law as such, namely, the introduction of the signifer and its combinatoire into human nature through the intermediary of the marriage laws, which are regulated by a system of exchanges that he defines as elementary structures – this is the case to the extent that guidance is given concerning the choice of a proper partner or, in other words, order is introduced into marriage, which produces a new dimension alongside that of heredity. But even when Lévi-Strauss explains all that, and spends a lot of time discussing incest in order to show what makes its prohibition necessary, he does not go beyond suggesting why the father does not marry a daughter – because the daughters must be exchanged. But why doesn't a son sleep with his mother? There is something mysterious there.

He, of course, dismisses justifications based on the supposedly dangerous biological effects of inbreeding. He proves that, far from producing results involving the resurgence of a recessive gene that risks introducing degenerative effects, a form of endogamy is commonly used in all fields of breeding of domestic animals, so as to improve a strain, whether animal or vegetable. The law only operates in the realm of culture. And the result of the law is always to exclude incest in its fundamental form, son / mother incest, which is the kind Freud emphasizes.

If everything else around it may find a justification, this central point nevertheless remains. If one reads Lévi-Strauss's text closely, one can see that it is the most enigmatic and the most stubborn point separating nature from culture.

And I want to make you stop there. What we find in the incest law is located as such at the level of the unconscious in relation to das Ding, the Thing. The desire for the mother cannot be satisfied because it is the end, the terminal point, the abolition of the whole world of demand, which is the one that at its deepest level structures man's unconscious. It is to the extent that the function of the pleasure principle is to make man always search for what he has to find again, but which he never will attain, that one reaches the essence, namely, that sphere or relationship which is known as the law of the prohibition of incest.

This metaphysical analysis is not worthy of our interest, however, if it cannot be confirmed at the level of the effective discourse which manages to put itself at the disposition of man's knowledge, that preconscious or unconscious discourse or, in other words, the effective law, or, in other words again, the famous ten commandments I was speaking about just now.

But are there ten commandments? My goodness, perhaps there are. I tried to add them up by going back to the source. I took down my copy of Silvestre de Sacy's Bible. It is the closest thing we have in French to those versions of the Bible that have exercised such a decisive influence on the thought and history of other peoples – in one case, inaugurating Slav culture with Saint Cyril and, in another, that of the authorized version of the English; one can say that, if one does not know it by heart, one finds oneself an outsider among them. We do not have the equivalent of that. But I nevertheless advise you to take a look at the seventeenth-century version, in spite of its inaccuracies and mistakes, since it was the version people read, and on the basis of which generations of clergymen have written and fought over the interpretation of a given prohibition, both past and present, that is inscribed in its pages.

I thus took down the text of that Decalogue that God dictated before Moses on the third day of the third month after the flight from Egypt, in the dark cloud on Mount Sinai, accompanied by flashes of lightning and the command to the people not to come near. I must say I would like one day to have someone more qualified than I to analyze for us the diverse forms that the interpretation of these ten commandments have undergone – from the Hebrew texts to the one in which it appears as the quiet droning of the rhythmic lines of the catechism.

However negative the ten commandments may seem, I will not linger long over their character as prohibitions – we are always being told that morality doesn't only have a negative side, it also has a positive side – but I will note, as I have before in this place, that they are perhaps only the commandments of speech. By that I mean they clarify that without which no speech is possible – notice that I did not say discourse.

I just gave you an indication there, since I could hardly go any further, and I pick up the trail again here. This is what I want to point out. In the ten commandments, which constitute almost everything that, against all odds, is accepted as commandments by the whole of the civilized community – civilized or not, or almost civilized, but since we only know the other, uncivilized part by means of a number of cryptograms, let us limit ourselves to the so-called civilized portions – in the ten commandments, it is nowhere specified that one must not sleep with one's mother. I do not think that the command "to honor" her should be considered as the least suggestive of this, either negatively or positively – in spite of what in the Provençal tales of Marius and Olive is known as "performing honorable service."[4]

Couldn't we next time try to interpret the ten commandments as something very close to that which effectively goes on in repression in the unconscious? The ten commandments may be interpreted as intended to prevent the subject from engaging in any form of incest on one condition, and on one condition only, namely, that we recognize that the prohibition of incest is nothing other than the condition sine qua non of speech.

This brings us back to questioning the meaning of the ten commandments insofar as they are tied in the deepest of ways to that which regulates the distance between the subject and das Ding – insofar as that distance is precisely the condition of speech, insofar as the ten commandments are the condition of the existence of speech as such.

I am simply on the point of broaching this topic, but I beg you right away not to stop at the idea that the ten commandments are, so to speak, the condition of all social life. For from another point of view, how can one not in truth see, when one merely recites them, that they are in a way the chapter and verse of our transactions at every moment of our lives? They display the range of what are properly speaking our human actions. In other words, we spend our time breaking the ten commandments, and that is why society is possible.

I do not for all that have to push the paradox to its extreme, like Bernard de Mandeville in The Fable of the Bees, when he demonstrates that private vices constitute public wealth. It is not a question of that, but of seeing what kind of preconscious immanence the ten commandments correspond to. I will take up the question there next time – not, however, without making a detour through that fundamental reference I evoked when I spoke to you for the first time of what might be called the real.

[4] The reference here is to the Provençal material of Marcel Pagnol's trilogy of plays on Marseilles life, Marius, Fanny, and César.

The real, I have told you, is that which is always in the same place. You will see this in the history of science and thought. This detour is indispensable if we are to reach the great revolutionary crisis of morality, namely, the systematic questioning of principles there where they need to be questioned, that is, at the level of the imperative. That is the culminating point for both Kant and Sade with relation to the Thing; it is there that morality becomes, on the one hand, a pure and simple application of the universal maxim and, on the other, a pure and simple object.

This point is essential if one is to understand the step taken by Freud. By way of conclusion today I would just like to bring to your attention something that a poet, who happens to be a friend of mine, once wrote: "The problem of evil is only worth raising as long as one has not fixed on the idea of transcendence by some good that is able to dictate to man what his duties are. Till that moment the exalted representation of evil will continue to have the greatest revolutionary value."

Well now, the step taken by Freud at the level of the pleasure principle is to show us that there is no Sovereign Good – that the Sovereign Good, which is das Ding, which is the mother, is also the object of incest, is a forbidden good, and that there is no other good. Such is the foundation of the moral law as turned on its head by Freud.

Now we have to consider where the positive moral law comes from that has remained quite intact, and that we are literally capable of "banging our heads against the wall for," to borrow an expression made famous by a film, rather than see it overturned.[5]

What does this mean? It means, and this is where I am leading you, that what you were looking for in the place of the object that cannot be found again is the object that one always finds again in reality. In the place of the object impossible to find again at the level of the pleasure principle, something has happened that is nothing more than the following: something which is always found again, but which presents itself in a form that is completely sealed, blind and enigmatic, the world of modern physics.

You will see that it is in relation to this that the crisis of morality was played out at the end of the eighteenth century at the time of the French revolution. And it is to this that Freud's doctrine constitutes an answer. It sheds a light on the subject that, I hope to be able to show you, has not yet yielded up all its implications.

December 16, 1959

[5] The reference is to Georges Franju's La Tête contre les Murs.

VI

On the moral law

THE CRITIQUE OF PRACTICAL REASON PHILOSOPHY IN THE BOUDOIR
THE TEN COMMANDMENTS
THE EPISTLE TO THE ROMANS

What if we brought a simple soul into this lecture hall, set him down in the front row, and asked him what Lacan means.

The simple soul will get up, go to the board and will give the following explanation: "Since the beginning of the academic year Lacan has been talking to us about das Ding in the following terms. He situates it at the heart of a subjective world which is the one whose economy he has been describing to us from a Freudian perspective for years. This subjective world is defined by the fact that the signifier in man is already installed at the level of the unconscious, and that it combines its points of reference with the means of orientation that his functioning as a natural organism of a living being also gives him."

Simply by writing it on the board and putting das Ding at the center, with the subjective world of the unconscious organized in a series of signifying relations around it, you can see the difficulty of topographical representation. The reason is that das Ding is at the center only in the sense that it is excluded. That is to say, in reality das Ding has to be posited as exterior, as the prehistoric Other that it is impossible to forget – the Other whose primacy of position Freud affirms in the form of something entfremdet, something strange to me, although it is at the heart of me, something that on the level of the unconscious only a representation can represent.

1

I said "something that only a representation can represent." Do not look upon that as a simple pleonasm, for "represent" and "representation" here are two different things, as the term Vorstellungsrepräsentanz indicates. It is a matter of that which in the unconscious represents, in the form of a sign, representation as a function of apprehending – of the way in which every representation is represented insofar as it evokes the good that das Ding brings with it.

But to speak of "the good" is already a metaphor, an attribute. Everything that qualifies representations in the order of the good is caught up in refraction, in the atomized system that the structure of the unconscious facilitations imposes, in the complex mechanism of a signifying system of elements. It is only in that way that the subject relates to that which presents itself on the horizon as his good. His good is already pointed out to him as the significant result of a signifying composition that is called up at the unconscious level or, in other words, at a level where he has no mastery over the system of directions and investments that regulate his behavior in depth.

I will use a term here that only those who have present in their minds the Kantian formulas of The Critique of Practical Reason will be able to appreciate. I invite those who do not have them present in their minds or who have not yet encountered what is, from more than one point of view, an extraordinary book to make good their memories or their general knowledge.

It is impossible for us to make any progress in this seminar relative to the questions posed by the ethics of psychoanalysis if you do not have this book as a reference point.

So as to motivate you to look at it, let me emphasize that it is certainly extraordinary from the point of view of its humor. To remain poised at the limit of the most extreme conceptual necessity produces an effect of plenitude and content as well as of vertigo, as a result of which you will not fail to sense at some point in the text the abyss of the comic suddenly open up before you. Thus I do not see why it is a door that you would refuse to open. We will in any case see in a minute how we can open it here.

It is then, to be explicit, the Kantian term Wohl that I propose in order to designate the good in question. It has to do with the comfort of the subject insofar as, whenever he refers to das Ding as his horizon, it is the pleasure principle that functions for him. And it does so in order to impose the law in which a resolution of the tension occurs that is linked to something that, using Freud's phrase, we will call the successful lures – or, better yet, the signs that reality may or may not honor. The sign here is very close to a representative currency, and it suggests an expression that I incorporated into one of my first lectures, that on physical causality, in a phrase that begins one of its paragraphs, i.e., "more inaccessible to our eyes that are made for the signs of the money changer."

Let me carry the image further. "The signs of the money changer" are already present at the base of the structure which is regulated according to the law of Lust and Unlust, according to the rule of the indestructible Wunsch that pursues repetition, the repetition of signs. It is in that way that the subject regulates his initial distance to das Ding, the source of all Wohl at the level of the pleasure principle, and which at its heart already gives rise to what we may call das Gut des Objekts, the good object – following the Kantian example, as the practitioners of psychoanalysis have not failed to do.

On the horizon, beyond the pleasure principle, there rises up the Gut, das Ding, thus introducing at the level of the unconscious something that ought to oblige us to ask once again the Kantian question of the causa noumenon. Das Ding presents itself at the level of unconscious experience as that which already makes the law. Although it is necessary to give this verbal phrase, "makes the law," the emphasis it receives in one of the most brutal games of elementary society and that is evoked in a recent book by Roger Vailland. It is a capricious and arbitrary law, the law of the oracle, the law of signs in which the subject receives no guarantee from anywhere, the law in relation to which he has no Sicherung, to use another Kantian term. That is also at bottom the bad object that Kleinian theory is concerned with.

Although it must be said that at this level das Ding is not distinguished as bad. The subject makes no approach at all to the bad object, since he is already maintaining his distance in relation to the good object. He cannot stand the extreme good that das Ding may bring him, which is all the more reason why he cannot locate himself in relation to the bad. However much he groans, explodes, curses, he still does not understand; nothing is articulated here even in the form of a metaphor. He produces symptoms, so to speak, and these symptoms are at the origin of the symptoms of defense.

And how should we conceive of defense at this level? There is organic defense. Here the ego defends itself by hurting itself as the crab gives up its claw, revealing thereby the connection I developed between the motor system and pain. Yet in what way does man defend himself that is different from an animal practising self-mutilation? The difference is introduced here by means of the signifying structuralization in the human unconscious. But the defense or the mutilation that is proper to man does not occur only at the level of substitution, displacement or metaphor – everything that structures its gravitation with relation to the good object. Human defense takes place by means of something that has a name, and which is, to be precise, lying about evil.

At the level of the unconscious, the subject lies. And this lying is his way of telling the truth of the matter. The ὀρθὸς λόγος of the unconscious at this level – as Freud indicates clearly in the Entwurf in relation to hysteria – is expressed as πρώτου ψεῦδος, the first lie.

Given the amount of time I have been discussing the Entwurf with you, do I need to remind you of the example that he gives of a female patient called Emma, whom he doesn't mention elsewhere and who is not the Emma of the Studies on Hysteria? It is the case of a woman who has a phobia about going into stores by herself because she is afraid people will make fun of her on account of her clothes.

Everything is related to an early memory. At the age of twelve she went into a store and the shop assistants apparently laughed at her clothes. One of them attracted her and even stirred her in some strange way in her emerging puberty. Behind that we find a causal memory, that of an act of aggression she suffered in a shop at the hands of a Greis. The French translation, modeled on the English, which was itself particularly careless, says "shopkeeper" – but an old fogey is involved, an elderly man, who pinched her somewhere under her dress in a very direct manner. This memory thus echoes the idea of a sexual attraction experienced in the other.

All that remains in the symptom is attached to clothes, to the mockery of her clothes. But the path of truth is suggested in a masked form, in the deceiving Vorstellung of her clothes. In an opaque way, there is an allusion to something that did not happen on the occasion of the first memory, but on the second. Something that wasn't apprehended in the beginning is apprehended retroactively, by means of the deceitful transformation – proton pseudos. Thus in that way we have confirmation of the fact that the relationship of the subject to das Ding is marked as bad – but the subject can only formulate this fact through the symptom.

That is what the experience of the unconscious has forced us to add to our premises when we take up again the question of ethics as it has been posed over the centuries, and as it has been bequeathed us in Kantian ethics, insofar as the latter remains, in our thought if not in our experience, the point to which these questions have been brought.

The way in which ethical principles are formulated when they impose themselves on consciousness or when about to emerge from preconsciousness, as commandments, has the closest relationship to the second principle introduced by Freud, namely, the reality principle.

The reality principle is the dialectical correlative of the pleasure principle. One is not simply, as one at first imagines, the application of the consequence of the other; each one is really the correlative of the other. Without this neither one would make any sense. Once again we are led to deepen the reality principle in a way I suggested in connection with the experience of paranoia.

As I have already told you, the reality principle isn't simply the same as it appears in the Entwurf, the testing that sometimes takes place at the level of the ω system or the Wahrnehmungsbewusstsein system. It doesn't function only on the level of that system in which the subject, probing in reality that which communicates the sign of a present reality, is able to adjust correctly the deceptive emergence of the Vorstellung as it is provoked by repetition at the level of the pleasure principle. It is something more. Reality faces man – and that is what interests him in it – both as having already been structured and as being that which presents itself in his experience as something that always returns to the same place.

I pointed it out when I was discussing the case of President Schreber. The function of the stars in the delirious system of that exemplary subject shows us, just like a compass, the polar star of the relation of man to the real. The history of science makes something similar seem plausible. Isn't it strange, paradoxical even, that it was the observations of shepherds and Mediterranean sailors of the return to the same place of an object which might seem to interest human experience least, namely, a star, that revealed to the farmer when he should sow his seeds? Think of the important role that the Pleiades played for Mediterranean navigators. Isn't it remarkable that it was the observation of the return of the stars to the very same places that, repeated over the centuries, led to the structuralization of reality by physics, which is what we mean by science? The fruitful laws involved came down to earth from the sky, to Galileo from the physics of the peripatetic philosophers. However, from that earth, where the laws of the heavens had been rediscovered, Galilean physics returned to the sky by demonstrating that the stars are by no means what we had believed them to be, that they are not incorruptible, that they are subject to the same laws as the terrestrial globe.

Furthermore, if a decisive step in the history of science was already taken by Nicolas of Cuse, who was one of the first to formulate the idea that the stars were not incorruptible, we know something else, we know that they might not be in the same place.

Thus that first demand that made us explore the structuralization of the real down through history in order to produce a supremely efficient and supremely deceptive science, that first demand is the demand of das Ding – it seeks whatever is repeated, whatever returns, and guarantees that it will always return, to the same place – and it has driven us to the extreme position in which we find ourselves, a position where we can cast doubt on all places, and where nothing in that reality which we have learned to disrupt so admirably responds to that call for the security of a return.

Yet it is to this search for something that always returns to the same place that what is known as ethics has attached itself over the centuries. Ethics is not simply concerned with the fact that there are obligations, that there is a bond that binds, orders, and makes the social law. There is also something that we have frequently referred to here by the term "the elementary structures of kinship" – the elementary structures of property and of the exchange of goods as well. And it is as a result of these structures that man transforms himself into a sign, unit, or object of a regulated exchange in a way that Claude Lévi-Strauss has shown to be fixed in its relative unconsciousness. That which over generations has presided over this new supernatural order of the structures is exactly that which has brought about the submission of man to the law of the unconscious. But ethics begins beyond that point.

It begins at the moment when the subject poses the question of that good he had unconsciously sought in the social structures. And it is at that moment, too, that he is led to discover the deep relationship as a result of which that which presents itself as a law is closely tied to the very structure of desire. If he doesn't discover right away the final desire that Freudian inquiry has discovered as the desire of incest, he discovers that which articulates his conduct so that the object of his desire is always maintained at a certain distance. But this distance is not complete; it is a distance that is called proximity, which is not identical to the subject, which is literally close to it, in the way that one can say that the Nebenmensch that Freud speaks of as the foundation of the thing is his neighbor.

If at the summit of the ethical imperative something ends up being articulated in a way that is as strange or even scandalous for some people as "Thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself," this is because it is the law of the relation of the subject to himself that he make himself his own neighbor, as far as his relationship to his desire is concerned.

My thesis is that the moral law is articulated with relation to the real as such, to the real insofar as it can be the guarantee of the Thing. That is why I invite you to take an interest in what I have called the high point of the crisis in ethics, and that I have designated from the beginning as linked to the moment when The Critique of Practical Reason appeared.

2

Kantian ethics appears at the moment when the disorienting effect of Newtonian physics is felt, a physics that has reached a point of independence relative to das Ding, to the human Ding.

It was Newtonian physics that forced Kant to revise radically the function of reason in its pure form. And it is also in connection with the questions raised by science that a form of morality has come to engage us; it is a morality whose precise structure could not have been perceived until then – one that detaches itself purposefully from all reference to any object of affection, from all reference to what Kant called the pathologisches Objekt, a pathological object, which simply means the object of any passion whatsoever.

No Wohl, whether it be our own or that of our neighbor, must enter into the finality of moral action. The only definition of moral action possible is that which was expressed in Kant's well-known formula: "Act in such a way that the maxim of your action may be accepted as a universal maxim." Thus action is moral only when it is dictated by the motive that is articulated in the maxim alone. To translate allgemeine as "universal" is not quite right, since it is closer to "common." Kant contrasts "general" with "universal," which he takes up in its Latin form. All of which proves that something here is left in an undetermined state. Handle so, dass die Maxime deines Willens jederzeit zugleich als Prinzip einer allgemeinen Gesetzgebung gelten könne. "Act so that the maxim of your will may always be taken as the principle of laws that are valid for all."

That formula, which is, as you know, the central formula of Kant's ethics, is pursued by him to the limit of its consequences. His radicalism even leads to the paradox that in the last analysis the gute Wille, good will, is posited as distinct from any beneficial action. In truth, I believe that the achievement of a form of subjectivity that deserves the name of contemporary, that belongs to a man of our time, who is lucky enough to be born now, cannot ignore this text. I simply emphasize it as we continue on our merry way, for one can, in fact, get by with very little – the person to our right and the person to our left are nowadays, if not neighbors, then at the very least people who, from the point of view of volume, are close enough to prevent us from falling down. But one must have submitted oneself to the test of reading this text in order to measure the extreme, almost insane character of the corner that we have been backed into by something that is after all present in history, namely, the existence, indeed the insistence, of science.

If, of course, no one has ever been able to put such a moral axiom into practice – even Kant himself did not believe it possible – it is nevertheless useful to see how far things have gone. In truth, we have built another bridge in our relation to reality. For some time transcendental aesthetics itself – I am referring to that which is designated as such in The Critique of Pure Reason – is open to challenge, at the very least on the level of that play of writing where theoretical physics is currently registering a hit. Henceforth, given the point we have reached in the light of our science, a renewal or updating of the Kantian imperative might be expressed in the following way, with the help of the language of electronics and automation: "Never act except in such a way that your action may be programmed." All of which takes us a step further in the direction of an even greater, if not the greatest, detachment from what is known as a Sovereign Good.

Let us be clear about this: when we reflect on the maxim that guides our action, Kant is inviting us to consider it for an instant as the law of a nature in which we are called upon to live. That is where one finds the apparatus that would have us reject in horror some maxim or other that our instincts would gladly lead us to. In this connection he gives us examples that are worth taking note of in a concrete sense, for however obvious they may seem, they perhaps suggest, at least to the analyst, a line of reflection. But note that he affirms the laws of nature, not of society. It is only too clear that not only do societies live very well by reference to laws that are far from promoting their universal application, but even more remarkably, as I suggested last time, these societies prosper as a result of the transgression of these maxims.

It is a matter then of a mental reference to a nature that is organized according to the laws of an object constructed at the moment when we raise the question of our rule of conduct.

So as to produce the kind of shock or eye-opening effect that seems to me necessary if we are to make progress, I simply want to draw your attention to this: if The Critique of Practical Reason appeared in 1788, seven years after the first edition of The Critique of Pure Reason, there is another work which came out six years after The Critique of Practical Reason, a little after Thermidor in 1795, and which is called Philosophy in the Boudoir.

As, I suppose, you all know, Philosophy in the Boudoir is the work of a certain Marquis de Sade, who is famous for more than one reason. His notoriety was accompanied from the beginning by great misfortunes, and one might add by the abuse of power concerning him – he did after all remain a prisoner for twenty-five years, which is a long time for someone who, my goodness, as far as we know, never committed a serious crime, and who in certain of our modern ideologies has been promoted to a point where one can also say that there is at the very least some confusion, if not excess.

Although in the eyes of some the work of the Marquis de Sade seems to promise a variety of entertainments, it is not strictly speaking much fun. Moreover, the parts that seem to give the most pleasure can also be regarded as the most boring. But one cannot claim that his work lacks coherence. And, in a word, it is precisely the Kantian criteria he advances to justify his positions that constitute what can be called a kind of anti-morality.

The paradox of this is argued with the greatest coherence in the work that is entitled Philosophy in the Boudoir. A short passage is included in it that, given the number of attentive ears here, is the only one that I expressly recommend you read – "Frenchmen, one more effort to become republicans."

As a result of this appeal, which supposedly came from a number of cells that were active at that time in revolutionary Paris, the Marquis de Sade proposes that, given the ruin of those authorities on which (according to the work's premises) the creation of a true republic depends, we should adopt the opposite of what was considered up to that point as the essential minimum of a viable and coherent morality.

And, in truth, he does quite a good job in defending that proposal. It is no accident if we first find in Philosophy in the Boudoir the praise of calumny. Calumny, he writes, can in no sense be injurious; if it imputes to our neighbor worse things than one can justifiably impute to him, it nevertheless has the merit that it puts us on guard against his activities. And the author proceeds in like manner to justify point by point the reversal of the fundamental imperatives of the moral law, extolling incest, adultery, theft, and everything else you can think of. If you adopt the opposite of all the laws of the Decalogue, you will end up with the coherent exposition of something which in the last instance may be articulated as follows: "Let us take as the universal maxim of our conduct the right to enjoy any other person whatsoever as the instrument of our pleasure."

Sade demonstrates with great consistency that, once universalized, this law, although it gives libertines complete power over all women indifferently, whether they like it or not, conversely also liberates those same women from all the duties that civilized society imposes on them in their conjugal, matrimonial and other relations. This conception opens wide the flood gates that in imagination he proposes as the horizon of our desire; everyone is invited to pursue to the limit the demands of his lust, and to realize them.

If the same opening is given to all, one will be able to see what a natural society is like. Our repugnance may be legitimately related to that which Kant himself claims to eliminate from the criteria of the moral law, namely, to the realm of sentiment.

If one eliminates from morality every element of sentiment, if one removes or invalidates all guidance to be found in sentiments, then in the final analysis the Sadian world is conceivable – even if it is its inversion, its caricature – as one of the possible forms of the world governed by a radical ethics, by the Kantian ethics as elaborated in 1788.

Believe me, there is no lack of Kantian echoes in the attempts to articulate moral systems that one finds in a vast literature that might be called libertine, the literature of the man of pleasure, which is an equally caricatural form of the problem that for a long time preoccupied the ancién regime, and from Fénelon on, the education of girls. You can see that pushed to its comically paradoxical limit in The Raised Curtain by Mirabeau.

Well now, we are coming to that on account of which, in its search for justification, for a base and support, in the sense of reference to the reality principle, ethics encounters its own stumbling block, its failure – I mean there where an aporia opens up in that mental articulation we call ethics. In the same way that Kantian ethics has no other consequence than that gymnastic exercise whose formative function for anyone who thinks I have called to your attention, so Sadian ethics has had no social consequences at all. Understand that I don't know if the French have really tried to become republicans, but it is certain that just like all the other nations of the world, including those who had their revolutions after them – bolder, more ambitious, and more radical revolutions, too – they have left what I will call the religious bases of the ten commandments completely intact, even pushing them to a point where their puritan character is increasingly marked. We've reached a situation where the leader of a great socialist state on a visit to other contemporary cultures is scandalized to see dancers on the Pacific coast of the noble country of America raising their legs a little too high.

We are thus faced here with a question, that is to say, the question of the relationship to das Ding.

This relationship seems to me to be sufficiently emphasized in the third chapter of The Critique of Practical Reason concerning the motives of practical pure reason. In effect, Kant acknowledges after all the existence of one sentient correlative of the moral law in its purity, and strangely enough, I ask you to note, it is nothing other than pain itself. I will read you the passage concerned, the second paragraph of the third part: "Consequently, we can see a priori that the moral law as the determining principle of will, by reason of the fact that it sets itself against our inclinations, must produce a feeling that one could call pain. And this is the first and perhaps only case, where we are allowed to determine, by means of a priori concepts, the relationship between a knowledge, which comes from practical pure reason, and a feeling of pleasure or pain."

In brief, Kant is of the same opinion as Sade. For in order to reach das Ding absolutely, to open the flood gates of desire, what does Sade show us on the horizon? In essence, pain. The other's pain as well as the pain of the subject himself, for on occasions they are simply one and the same thing. To the degree that it involves forcing an access to the Thing, the outer extremity of pleasure is unbearable to us. It is this that explains the absurd or, to use a popular expression, maniacal side of Sade that strikes us in his fictional constructions. We are aware at every moment of the discomfort in living constructions, the kind of discomfort that makes it so difficult for our neurotic patients to confess certain of their fantasms.

In fact, to a certain degree, at a certain level, fantasms cannot bear the revelation of speech.

3

We are then brought back again to the moral law insofar as it is incarnated in a certain number of commandments. I mean the ten commandments, which in the beginning, at a period that is not so remote in the past, were collected by a people that sets itself apart as a chosen people.

As I said, it is appropriate to reconsider these commandments. I noted last time that there is a study to be done for which I would gladly call upon one of you as the representative of a tradition of moral theology. A great many questions deserve our attention. I spoke of the number of commandments. There is also the matter of their form and the way in which they are transmitted to us in the future tense. I would be glad to call upon the help of someone who knows enough Hebrew to answer my questions. In the Hebrew version is it a future tense or a form of the volitive that is used in Deuteronomy and Numbers, where we see the first formulations of the Decalogue?

The issue I want to raise today concerns their privileged structure in relation to the structure of the law. I want today to consider two of them.

I must leave to one side the huge questions posed by the promulgation of these commandments by something that announces itself in the following form: "I am what I am." It is, in effect, necessary not to draw the text in the direction of Greek metaphysics by translating as "he who is," or "he who am." The English translation, "I am that I am," is, according to Hebrew scholars, the closest to what is meant by the formulation of the verse. Perhaps I am mistaken, but since I do not know Hebrew and while I wait on further information on the subject, I rely on the best authorities, and they are of one mind on the question.

That "I am what I am" is announced first of all to a small people in the form of that which saved it from the misfortunes of Egypt, and it begins by affirming, "You will adore no God but me, before my countenance." I leave open the question of what "before my countenance" means. Does it mean that beyond the countenance of God, i.e., outside Canaan, the adoration of other gods is not inconceivable for a believing Jew? A passage from the second Book of Samuel, spoken by David, seems to confirm this.

It is nevertheless the case that the second commandment, the one that formally excludes not only every cult, but also every image, every representation of what is in heaven, on earth, or in the void, seems to me to show that what is involved is in a very special relationship to human feeling as a whole. In a nutshell, the elimination of the function of the imaginary presents itself to my mind, and, I think, to yours, as the principle of the relation to the symbolic, in the meaning we give that term here; that is to say, to speech. Its principal condition is there.

I leave aside the question of rest on the sabbath day. But I believe that that extraordinary commandment, according to which, in a land of masters, we observe one day out of seven without work – such that according to humorous proverbs, the common man is left no happy medium between the labor of love and the most stultifying boredom – that suspension, that emptiness, clearly introduces into human life the sign of a gap, a beyond relative to every law of utility. It seems to me, therefore, that it has the most intimate relationship to something that we are on the track of here.

I leave aside the prohibition on murder, for we will have to come back to that in connection with the respective significance of the act and its retribution. I want to take up the prohibition on lying insofar as it is related to what presented itself to us as that essential relationship of man to the Thing, insofar as it is commanded by the pleasure principle, namely, the lie that we have to deal with every day in our unconscious.

"Thou shalt not lie" is the commandment in which the intimate link between desire, in its structuring function, with the law is felt most tangibly. In truth, this commandment exists to make us feel the true function of the law. And I can do no better than to place it beside the sophism in which is manifested most strikingly the type of ingenuity that is furthest from the Jewish or talmudic tradition, namely, the paradox of Epimenides, he who affirmed that all men are liars. What am I saying, in proposing the articulation of the unconscious that I gave you; what am I saying, responds the sophism? – except that I, too, lie, and, consequently, I can affirm nothing valid concerning not simply the function of truth, but even the significance of lying.

"Thou shalt not lie" as a negative precept has as its function to withdraw the subject of enunciation from that which is enunciated. Remember the graph. It is there that I can say "Thou shalt not lie" – there where I lie, where I repress, where I, the liar, speak. In "Thou shalt not lie" as law is included the possibility of the lie as the most fundamental desire.

I am going to give you a proof that is to my mind nevertheless valid. It concerns Proudhon's famous phrase: "Property is theft." Another proof is that of the cries of anguish lawyers emit whenever it is a question, in some more or less grotesque and mythical form, of using a lie detector. Must we conclude from this that the respect of the human person involves the right to lie? Surely, it is a question and not an answer to reply "yes, certainly." One might say, it's not so simple.

What is the source of that rebellion against the fact that something exists which may reduce the question of the subject's speech to a universally objectified application? The point is that speech doesn't itself know what it is saying when it lies, and that, on the other hand, in lying it also speaks some truth. Moreover, it is in this antinomic function between the law and desire, as conditioned by speech, that resides the primordial authority which makes this commandment among all ten one of the cornerstones of that which we call the human condition, to the extent that that condition merits our respect.

Since time is getting on, I will skip quickly forward to the issue that is the object of our discussion today relative to the relationship between desire and the law. It is the famous commandment that affirms the following – it makes one smile, but when one thinks about it, one doesn't smile for long: "Thou shalt not covet thy neighbor's house, thou shalt not covet thy neighbor's wife, neither his man servant, nor his maid servant, neither his ox, nor his ass, nor anything that belongs to thy neighbor."

Putting the wife between the house and the donkey has given rise to more than one idea that one can recognize there the exigences of a primitive society—a society of Bedouins, "wogs," and "niggers." Well, I don't agree.

The law affirmed there, the part concerning one's neighbor's wife at least, is still alive in the hearts of men who violate it every day, and it doubtless has a relationship to that which is the object of our discussion today, namely, das Ding.

It is not after all a question of just any good here. It is not a question of that which creates the law of exchange and covers with a kind of amusing legality, a kind of social Sicherung, the movements, the impetus, of human instincts. It is a question of something whose value resides in the fact that none of these objects exists without having the closest possible relationship to that in which the human being can rest as if it were die Trude, das Ding – not insofar as it is his good, but insofar as it is the good in which he may find rest. Let me add das Ding insofar as it is the very correlative of the law of speech in its most primitive point of origin, and in the sense that this Ding was there from the beginning, that it was the first thing that separated itself from everything the subject began to name and articulate, that the covetousness that is in question is not addressed to anything that I might desire but to a thing that is my neighbor's Thing.

It is to the extent that the commandment in question preserves the distance from the Thing as founded by speech itself that it assumes its value.

But where does this take us?

Is the Law the Thing? Certainly not. Yet I can only know of the Thing by means of the Law. In effect, I would not have had the idea to covet it if the Law hadn't said: "Thou shalt not covet it." But the Thing finds a way by producing in me all kinds of covetousness thanks to the commandment, for without the Law the Thing is dead. But even without the Law, I was once alive. But when the commandment appeared, the Thing flared up, returned once again, I met my death. And for me, the commandment that was supposed to lead to life turned out to lead to death, for the Thing found a way and thanks to the commandment seduced me; through it I came to desire death.

I believe that for a little while now some of you at least have begun to suspect that it is no longer I who have been speaking. In fact, with one small change, namely, "Thing" for "sin," this is the speech of Saint Paul on the subject of the relations between the law and sin in the Epistle to the Romans, Chapter 7, paragraph 7.

Whatever some may think in certain milieux, you would be wrong to think that the religious authors aren't a good read. I have always been rewarded whenever I have immersed myself in their works. And Saint Paul's Epistle is a work that I recommend to you for your vacation reading; you will find it very good company.

The relationship between the Thing and the Law could not be better defined than in these terms. And we will come back to it now. The dialectical relationship between desire and the Law causes our desire to flare up only in relation to the Law, through which it becomes the desire for death. It is only because of the Law that sin, ἁμαρτία – which in Greek means lack and non-participation in the Thing – takes on an excessive, hyperbolic character. Freud's discovery – the ethics of psychoanalysis – does it leave us clinging to that dialectic? We will have to explore that which, over the centuries, human beings have succeeded in elaborating that transgresses the Law, puts them in a relationship to desire that transgresses interdiction, and introduces an erotics that is above morality.

I don't think that you should be surprised by such a question. It is after all precisely something that all religions engage in, all mysticisms, all that Kant disdainfully calls the Religionsschwärmereien, religious enthusiasms – it's not an easy term to translate. What is all this except a way of rediscovering the relationship to das Ding somewhere beyond the law? There are no doubt other ways. No doubt, in talking about erotics, we will have to talk about the kind of rules of love that have been elaborated over the centuries. Freud said somewhere that he could have described his doctrine as an erotics, but, he went on, "I didn't do it, because that would have involved giving ground relative to words, and he who gives ground relative to words also gives ground relative to things. I thus spoke of the theory of sexuality."

It's true: Freud placed in the forefront of ethical inquiry the simple relationship between man and woman. Strangely enough, things haven't been able to move beyond that point. The question of das Ding is still attached to whatever is open, lacking, or gaping at the center of our desire. I would say – you will forgive the play on words – that we need to know what we can do to transform this dam-age into our "dame" in the archaic French sense, our lady.

Don't laugh at this sleight of hand; it was in the language before I used it. If you look up the etymology of the word "danger," you will see that exactly the same ambiguity exists from the beginning in French: "danger" was originally "domniarium," domination. The word "dame" gradually came to contaminate that word. And, in effect, when we are in another's power, we are in great danger.

Therefore, next year we will try to advance still further into these incontestably perilous waters.

December 23, 1959

THE PROBLEM OF SUBLIMATION

VII

Drives and lures

THE DOMAIN OF THE PASTORAL THE PARADOX OF THE MORAL CONSCIENCE WORLD AND BODY LUTHER THE PROBLEM OF THE OBJECT RELATION

During the retreat of the vacation, I felt the need to make a little excursion into a certain domain within the treasure house of English and French literature. "Quaerens," not "quem devorem," but rather "quod doceam vobis" – seeking what to teach you and how, on the subject that we are navigating towards under the title of the ethics of psychoanalysis. You can certainly sense that it must be leading us toward a problematic point, not only of Freud's doctrine, but also of what one might call our responsibility as analysts.

It is a point that you haven't yet seen rise up on the horizon. And, my goodness, there is no reason why you should, since up till now this year I have avoided using the term. It is something that is so problematic for the theorists of analysis, as you will see from the testimony of the quotations I will cite; yet it is so essential. It is what Freud called Sublimierung, sublimation.

1

Sublimation is, in effect, the other side of the research that Freud pioneered into the roots of ethical feeling, insofar as it imposes itself in the form of prohibitions, of the moral conscience. It is the side that is referred to in the world in a manner that is so improper and so comical to a sensitive ear – I mean in the world outside the field of psychoanalysis – as the philosophy of values.

We who find ourselves, along with Freud, in a position to give a radically new critique of the sources and the incidence of ethical thought, are we in the same fortunate situation concerning its positive side, that of moral and spiritual elevation, that of the scale of values? The problem seems much more uncertain and more delicate there, but one cannot for all that say we may neglect it for the sake of the more immediate concerns of straightforward therapeutic action.

In Three Essays on the Theory of Sexuality, Freud uses two correlative terms concerning the effects of the individual libidinal adventure: Fixierarbeit is the fixation that is for us the register of explanation of that which is, in fact, inexplicable, and Haftbarkeit, which is perhaps best translated by "perseverance" but has a curious resonance in German, since it means also "responsibility," "commitment." And that is what is involved here; it concerns our collective history as analysts.

We are caught up in an adventure that has taken a certain direction, a certain contingency, certain stages. Freud didn't finish at a stroke the trail he blazed for us. And it may be that, on account of Freud's detours, we are attached to a certain moment in the development of his thought, without fully realizing its contingent character, like that of every effect of our human history.

In accordance with a method you are familiar with – for if it isn't mine, it is at least known to me – let us try to take a few steps backwards, two, for example, before taking three steps forward. That way we may hope to gain one.

A step backward then: let us remember that psychoanalysis might seem at first to be of an ethical order. It might seem to be the search for a natural ethics – and, my goodness, a certain siren song might well promote a misunderstanding of that kind. And indeed, through a whole side of its action and its doctrine, psychoanalysis effectively presents itself as such, as tending to simplify some difficulty that is external in origin, that is of the order of a misrecognition or indeed of a misunderstanding, as tending to restore a normative balance with the world – something that the maturation of the instincts would naturally lead to. One sometimes sees such a gospel preached in the form of the genital relation that I have more than once referred to here with a great deal of reservation and even with a pronounced skepticism.

A great many things immediately present themselves in opposition. It is in any case in just such a simple way that analysis leads us in the direction of what, for reasons that I do not believe are merely picturesque, one might call the domain of the pastoral.

The domain of the pastoral is never absent from civilization; it never fails to offer itself as a solution to the latter's discontents. If I use that name, it is because over the centuries that is how it has happened to present itself openly. Nowadays, it is often masked; it appears for example in the more severe and more pedantic form of the infallibility of proletarian consciousness – something that has preoccupied us for so long, although in recent years it has receded a little. It appears also in the form of the somewhat mythical notion I referred to just now concerning the hopes, however vague, that were raised by the Freudian revolution. But it's the same old idea of the pastoral. And, as you will see, it concerns a very serious debate.

Perhaps we need to rediscover it, to rediscover its meaning. There is perhaps a good reason why we should reexamine the archaic form of the pastoral, reexamine a certain return to nature or the hope invested in a nature that you shouldn't imagine our ancestors thought of in simpler terms than we do. We will see whether the inventions that the ingenium of our ancestors attempted in this direction teach us something that needs to be elucidated for us, too.

Obviously, as soon as one takes a look at Freud's thought as a whole, one sees immediately that there is something that from the beginning resists being absorbed into this domain. And it is that through which I began to attack the problem of the ethics of psychoanalysis with you this year. Freud allows us, in effect, to measure the paradoxical character or practical aporia of something that is not at all of the order of difficulties that an improved nature or a natural amelioration can present. It is rather something that introduces itself immediately as possessed of a very special quality of malice, of bad influence – that is the meaning of the French word méchant. Freud isolates it increasingly in the course of his work up to Civilization and Its Discontents, where he gives it its fullest articulation, or in his studies of mechanisms such as the phenomenon of melancholia.

What is this paradox? It is that the moral conscience, as he says, shows itself to be the more demanding the more refined it becomes, crueller and crueller even as we offend it less and less, more and more fastidious as we force it, by abstaining from acts, to go and seek us out at the most intimate levels of our impulses or desires. In short, the insatiable character of this moral conscience, its paradoxical cruelty, transforms it within the individual into a parasite that is fed by the satisfactions accorded it. Ethics punishes the individual relatively much less for his faults than for his misfortunes.

This is the paradox of the moral conscience in what I hesitate to call its spontaneous form. Rather than speak of the investigation of the moral conscience functioning in a natural state – we would never find our way through that – let us choose the other dimension covered by the meaning of the term "natural"; and let's call it the critique, by means of psychoanalysis, of wild, uncultivated ethics, such as we find it functioning all alone, especially in those whom we deal with as we explore the level of affect or pathos, and of pathology.

It is here that analysis sheds some light, and it does so, in the end, on that which in the depths of man might be called self-hate. It is something that is suggested by the classical comedy whose title is He Who Punishes Himself.[1]

It is a little comedy which belongs to the New Comedy taken over from [1] A play by Terence usually translated in Englsh as The Self-Tormentor.

Greece by Latin literature. I don't especially recommend that you read it, for after that fine title you would only be disappointed by the text. You would only find, like everything else, a concrete satire of character traits, precise notations of forms of the ridiculous. But don't forget that the function of comedy is only apparently without profundity. Through the very fact of the play of the signifier, through the simple force of signifying articulation, we find ourselves going beyond something that is simply depiction or contingent description, to the revelation of what lies below. Comedy makes us rediscover what Freud showed was present in the practice of nonsense.

We see the depths emerge, we see something that detaches itself beyond the exercise of the unconscious, there where Freudian research invites us to recognize the point where the Trieb is unmasked – the Trieb and not the Instinkt. For the Instinkt is not far from the field of das Ding in relation to which I invite you to recenter this year the way in which the problems around us are posed.

The Triebe were discovered and explored by Freud within an experience founded on the confidence he had in the play of signifiers, in the play of substitutions; the result is that we can in no way confuse the domain of the Triebe with a reclassification of human beings' associations with their natural milieu, however new that reclassification may seem. The Trieb must be translated insofar as possible with some ambiguity, and I like sometimes to say dérive in French, "drift." It is in any case "drive" that is used in English to translate the German word. That drift, where the whole action of the pleasure principle is motivated, directs us toward the mythic point that has been articulated in terms of an object relation. We have to be precise about the meaning of this and to criticize the confusions introduced by ambiguities of signification that are much more serious than the signifying kind.

We are now getting close to the most profound things Freud had to say about the nature of the Triebe, and especially insofar as they may give satisfaction to the subject in more than one way, notably, in leaving open a door, a way or a career, of sublimation. Within psychoanalytic thought, this domain has remained until now almost undisturbed; only the boldest spirits have dared to approach it, and even then not without expressing the dissatisfaction or unassuaged thirst Freud's formulations left them with. I will be referring here to a few texts found at more than one point in his work, from the Three Essays on the Theory of Sexuality to Moses and Monotheism, and including Five Lectures on Psychoanalysis, the Introductory Lectures on Psychoanalysis, and Civilization and Its Discontents.

Freud invites us to reflect on sublimation or, more exactly, he proposes – in a way that enables him to define the field – all kinds of difficulties that merit our attention today.

2

Since the problem of sublimation is situated for us in the field of the Triebe, I would like first to look for a moment at a passage taken from the Introductory Lectures, that is to say a work that has been translated as Introductory Lectures on Psychoanalysis. It is on page 358, Volume XI, of the Gesammelte Werke[2]:

> Therefore, we have to take into consideration the fact that the drives [Triebe], the pulsating sexual excitements, are extraordinarily plastic. They may appear in each others' places. One of them may accumulate the intensity of the others. When the satisfaction of one is denied by reality, the satisfaction of another may offer total compensation. They behave in relation to each other like a network, like communicating channels that are filled with water.

We can see there the metaphor that is no doubt at the origin of that surrealist work which is called Communicating Vases.

Freud goes on, and I paraphrase, "They behave, therefore, in that way; and this is true in spite of the fact that they may have fallen under the domination or the supremacy of the Genitalprimat. Thus the latter must not be thought to be so easy to gather into a single Vorstellung, representation."

Freud warns us in this passage – and there are plenty of others – that even when the whole Netz der Triebe has fallen beneath the Genitalprimat, it is not so easy to conceive of the latter structurally as a unitary Vorststellung, a resolution of contradictions.

We know only too well that that in no way eliminates the communicating or fleeting, plastic character, as Freud himself puts it, of the economy of the Triebregungen. In short, as I have been teaching you for years, that structure commits the human libido to the subject, commits it to slipping into the play of words, to being subjugated by the structure of the world of signs, which is the single universal and dominant Primat. And the sign, as Peirce put it, is that which is in the place of something else for someone.

The articulation as such of the possibilities of Verschiebbarkeit, or the displacement of the natural attitude, is elaborated at length and ends up in this passage with the elucidation of the Partiallust in the genital libido itself. In short, an approach to the problem of Sublimierung must begin with a recognition of the plasticity of the instincts, even if one acknowledges subsequently, for reasons to be explained, that complete sublimation is not possible for the individual. With the individual – and as long as it is a question of the individual with all that that implies concerning internal dispositions and external actions – we find ourselves faced with limits. There is something that cannot be sublimated; libidinal demand exists, the demand for a certain dose, of a certain level of direct satisfaction, without which harm results, serious disturbances occur.

[2] S.E., XV, p. 345.

But our point of departure is the relationship of the libido to that Netz, that Flüssigkeit, that Verschiebbarkeit of the signs as such. It is to this in any case that we are always brought back whenever we read Freud with an attentive eye.

Let me posit another essential point of articulation, necessary if we are to move forward once more.

It is obvious that the libido, with its paradoxical, archaic, so-called pregenital characteristics, with its eternal polymorphism, with its world of images that are linked to the different sets of drives associated with the different stages from the oral to the anal and the genital – all of which no doubt constitutes the originality of Freud's contribution – that whole microcosm has absolutely nothing to do with the macrocosm; only in fantasy does it engender world. That's Freud's doctrine, contrary to the direction in which one of his disciples, namely Jung, wanted to take it – this schism within Freud's entourage occurring around 1910.

This is important particularly at a moment when it is obvious that, even if one once located them there, there is no point now in seeking the phallus or the anal ring in the starry sky; they have been definitely expelled. For a long time even in scientific thinking, men seemed to inhabit cosmological projections. For a long time a world soul existed, and thought could comfort itself with the idea that there was a deep connection between our images and the world that surrounds us. This is a point whose importance does not seem to have been noticed, namely, that the Freudian project has caused the whole world to reenter us, has definitely put it back in its place, that is to say, in our body, and nowhere else. Let me remind you in this connection to what extent, in the period which immediately preceded the liberation of modern man, both scientific and theological thought were preoccupied by something that Freud did not hesitate to mention and to call by its name, but about which we never speak anymore, namely, the figure who was for a long time known as the prince of this world, Diabolus himself. The symbolic here is united with the diabolic, with all those forms that theological preaching has so powerfully articulated.

Read a little Luther; not just the Table Talk, but the Sermons as well, if you want to see to what extent the power of images may be affirmed, images that are very familiar to us because they have been invested with the quality of scientific authentification on a daily basis through our psychoanalytic experience. It is to those images that the thought of a prophet refers whose influence was such a powerful one, and who renewed the very basis of Christian teaching when he sought to express our dereliction, our fall in a world where we let ourselves go. His choice of words is in the end far more analytic than all that modern phenomenology has been able to articulate in the relatively gentle terms of the abandonment of the mother's breast; what kind of negligence is that which causes her milk to dry up? Luther says literally, "You are that waste matter which falls into the world from the devil's anus."

That is the essentially digestive and excremental schema forged by a thought that draws the ultimate consequences from the form of exile in which man finds himself relative to any good in the world whatsoever.

That's where Luther leads us. Don't imagine that these things didn't have an effect on the thought and the way of life of people of the time. One finds articulated here precisely the essential turning point of a crisis from which emerged our whole modern immersion in the world. It is to this that Freud came to give his approval, his official stamp, when he made that image of the world, those fallacious archetypes, return once and for all there where they belong, that is in our body.

Henceforth we are to deal with the world where it is. Do these erogenous zones, these fundamental points of fixation, open onto rosy possibilities and pastoral optimism? Does one find here a path that leads to freedom? Or to the strictest servitude? These erogenous zones that, until one has achieved a fuller elucidation of Freud's thought, one can consider to be generic, and that are limited to a number of special points, to points that are openings, to a limited number of mouths at the body's surface, are the points where Eros will have to find his source.

In order to realize what is essential and original in Freud's thought here, it is sufficient to refer to those openings that the exercise of poetic lyricism gives. According to a given poet, to Walt Whitman for example, imagine what as a man one might desire of one's own body. One might dream of a total, complete, epidermic contact between one's body and a world that was itself open and quivering; dream of a contact and, in the distance, of a way of life that the poet points out to us; hope for a revelation of harmony following the disappearance of the perpetual, insinuating presence of the oppressive feeling of some original curse.

Well now, Freud, on the contrary, emphasizes a point of insertion, a limit point, an irreducible point, at the level of what we might call the source of the Triebe. And it is precisely that that our experience then encounters in the irreducible character – once again the ambiguity is clear – of these residues of archaic forms of the libido.

These forms, we are told on the one hand, are not susceptible to Befriedigung. The most archaic aspirations of the child are both a point of departure and a nucleus that is never completely resolved under some primacy of genitality or a pure and simple Vorstellung of man in human form by androgynous fusion, however total one may imagine it. There always remain dreams of these primary, archaic forms of the libido. That is a first point that experience insists on and Freudian discourse articulates.

On the other hand, Freud reveals the opening, which at first sight seems limitless, of the substitutions that may occur at the other end, at the level of the goal.

I have avoided the word Objekt, which never fails to appear at the point of one's pen as soon as one begins to differentiate what is involved in sublimation. One cannot characterize the sublimated form of the instinct without reference to the object, whatever one does. In a minute I will read you some passages which will show you the scope of the difficulty.

It is a question of the object. But what does the object mean at that level? When Freud at the beginning of his more emphatic formulations of his doctrine begins his first topic by articulating that which concerns sublimation, notably in the Three Essays on the Theory of Sexuality, sublimation is characterized by a change of objects, or in the libido, a change that doesn't occur through the intermediary of a return of the repressed nor symptomatically, indirectly, but directly, in a way that satisfies directly. The sexual libido finds satisfaction in objects; how does it distinguish them? Quite simply and massively, and in truth not without opening a field of infinite complexity, as objects that are socially valorized, objects of which the group approves, insofar as they are objects of public utility. That is how the possibility of sublimation is defined.

Thus we find ourselves here in a position to hold firmly in our hands the two ends of a chain.

On the one hand, there is the possibility of satisfaction, even if it is substitutive, and through the intermediary of what the text calls a Surrogate. On the other hand, it is a question of objects that are going to acquire collective social value. We find ourselves here faced with a trap into which thought, with its penchant for facility, would love to leap, merely by constructing a simple opposition and a simple reconciliation between the individual and the collectivity.

It doesn't seem to be a problem that the collectivity might find satisfaction there where the individual happens to need to change his batteries or his rifle from one shoulder to the other; where, moreover, it would be a matter of an individual satisfaction that is taken for granted, all by itself. Yet we were told at the beginning how problematic the satisfaction of the libido is. Everything that has to do with the Triebe raises the question of plasticity and of limits. Thus the formulation suggested above is far from being one that Freud could adhere to.

Far from adhering to it, he establishes a relation in the Three Essays between sublimation in its most obvious social effects and what he calls Reaktionsbildung. That means that right away, at a moment when things cannot yet be articulated powerfully, for want of that component of his topic he will produce later, he introduces the notion of reaction formation. In other words, he illustrates a given character trait, a trait acquired through social regulation, as something which, far from occurring as a direct consequence or as in line with a specific instinctual satisfaction, necessitates the construction of a system of defenses that is, for example, antagonistic to the anal drive. He, therefore, introduces the idea of an opposition, an antinomy, as fundamental in the construction of the sublimation of an instinct. He thus introduces the problem of a contradiction in his own formulation.

Thus, that which is presented as a construction in opposition to an instinctual tendency can in no way be reduced to a direct satisfaction in which the drive itself would be saturated in a way that would have no other characteristic than that it succeeds in receiving the seal of collective approval.

In truth, the problem Freud raises relative to sublimation only comes fully to light at the time of his second topic. We will have to approach that from Zur Einführung des Narzissmus ("On Narcissism: An Introduction"), a work that is not only the introduction to narcissism, but also the introduction to the second topic.

3

In this text that our friend Jean Laplanche has translated for the Society and that you should look up in the Gesammelte Werke, Volume X, pages 161–162[3], you will find the following comment: "What we have to seek is that which now presents itself to us concerning the relations of this formulation of the ideal to sublimation. Sublimation is a process that concerns object libido."

I would just point out that the opposition Ichlibido / Objektlibido only begins to be articulated as such on an analytical level with the Einführung. This text complements the articulation first given by Freud of the fundamentally conflictual position of man relative to his satisfaction as such. That is why it is essential to introduce das Ding at the beginning.

That is Das Ding insofar as, if he is to follow the path of his pleasure, man must go around it. One must take one's time to recognize, to find out for oneself, to take one's time to see that Freud is telling us the same thing as Saint Paul, namely, that what governs us on the path of our pleasure is no Sovereign Good, and that moreover, beyond a certain limit, we are in a thoroughly enigmatic position relative to that which lies within das Ding, because there is no ethical rule which acts as a mediator between our pleasure and its real rule.

[3] S.E., XIV, p. 94.

And behind Saint Paul, you find the teaching of Christ when he is questioned just before the final Easter [la dernière Pâques]. There are two versions, that of the Gospel according to Saint Mathew and that of the Gospels of Mark and Luke. In Saint Mathew's Gospel, where it is clearest, he is asked, "What good must we do to achieve life eternal?" In the Greek version, he answers, "Why do you speak to me of good? Who knows what is good? Only He, He who is beyond, our Father, knows what is good. And He told you, Do this, Do that, Don't go any further." One just has to follow his commandments. Then after that there is the statement, "Thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself." That's the commandment that appropriately enough, given its obvious relevance, is the terminal point of Civilization and Its Discontents; it is the ideal end to which his investigation by necessity leads him – Freud never held back from anything that offered itself to his examination.

I cannot urge you too strongly to appreciate, if you are able, what in Christ's answer has for so long been closed to aural apprehension, apart from that of knowing ears – "They have ears but they hear not," the Gospel tells us. Try to read the words of the man who, it is claimed, never laughed; read them for what they are. From time to time, you will be struck by a form of humor that surpasses all others.

The parable of the unfaithful steward, for example. No matter how seldom one has been to church, one is nevertheless used to having that parable trotted out. And it occurs to no one to be surprised by the fact that the Son of Man, the purest of the pure, tells us that the best way to achieve salvation for one's soul is to embezzle the funds one is in charge of, since that, too, may lead the children of light to grant you, if not a reward, then at least a certain gratitude. From the point of view of a homogeneous, uniform, and stable morality, there is some contradiction there, but perhaps one could confirm it with other insights of a similar kind – such as, for example, the terrific "joke,"[4] "Render unto Caesar that which is Caesar's" – and after that get on with it! It is a form of paradox that may lead to all kinds of evasions or ruptures, to all the gaps opened up by nonsense – those insidious dialogues, for example, in which the interlocutor always manages to slip out of the traps that are set for him.

To come back to our subject for the moment, the good as such – something that has been the eternal object of the philosophical quest in the sphere of ethics, the philosopher's stone of all the moralists – the good is radically denied by Freud. It is rejected at the beginning of his thought in the very notion of the pleasure principle as the rule of the deepest instinct, of the realm of the drives. This is confirmed in a thousand different ways, and is for example consistent with Freud's central question, which concerns, as you know, the Father.

[4] In English in the original.

To understand Freud's position relative to the Father, you have to go and look up the form it is given in Luther's thought, when he had his nostrils tickled by Erasmus. Reluctantly, after a great many years, Erasmus had finally published his De Libero Arbitrio, so as to remind the excitable mad man from Wittenberg that the authoritative Christian tradition, from the words of Christ to Saint Paul, Saint Augustine and the Church Fathers, led one to believe that works, good works, were not nothing, and that to be sure the tradition of the philosophers on the subject of the Sovereign Good was not to be just thrown out.

Luther, who up to that point had remained reserved in his relations with the figure of Erasmus – although he did privately indulge in a little irony on the subject – then published his De Servo Arbitrio in order to emphasize both the fundamentally bad character of the relations between men and the fact that at the heart of man's destiny is the Ding, the causa, which I described the other day as analogous to that which is designated by Kant as at the horizon of his Practical Reason – except that it is a pendant to it. To coin a phrase whose approximate Greekness I will ask you to forgive, it is the causa pathomenon, the cause of the most fundamental human passion.

Luther writes of the following – God's eternal hatred of men, not simply of their failures and the works of their free will, but a hatred that existed even before the world was created. You see that there are reasons why I advise you to read religious authors from time to time; I mean good ones, of course, not those who are all sweetness and light, although even they are sometimes rewarding. Saint François de Sales on marriage is, I assure you, better than Van de Velde on ideal marriage. But in my opinion Luther is much more interesting. That hatred which existed even before the world was created is the correlative of the relationship that exists between a certain influence of the law as such and a certain conception of das Ding as the fundamental problem and, in a word, as the problem of evil. I assume that it hasn't escaped your attention that it is exactly what Freud deals with when the question he asks concerning the Father leads him to point out that the latter is the tyrant of the primitive horde, the one against whom the original crime was committed, and who for that very reason introduced the order, essence, and foundation of the domain of law.

Not to recognize the filiation or cultural paternity that exists between Freud and a new direction of thought – one that is apparent at the break which occurred toward the beginning of the sixteenth century, but whose repercussions are felt up to the end of the seventeenth century – constitutes a fundamental misunderstanding of the kind of problems Freud's intellectual project addresses.

I have just finished a digression of some twenty-five minutes. And it was designed to tell you that, just after 1914 with the Einführung, Freud introduces us to something that dodges the issue again by articulating things that are, of course, essential, but of which one must know the context, namely, the problem of the object relation.

This problem of the object relation has to be read "Freudianly." You can, in fact, see it emerge in a narcissistic relation, an imaginary relation. At this level the object introduces itself only insofar as it is perpetually interchangeable with the love that the subject has for its own image. Ichlibido and Objektlibido are introduced by Freud in relation to the difference between Ich-ideal and Ideal-ich, between the mirage of the ego and the formation of an ideal. This ideal makes room for itself alone; within the subject it gives form to something which is preferred and to which it will henceforth submit. The problem of identification is linked to this psychological splitting, which places the subject in a state of dependence relative to an idealized, forced image of itself – something that Freud will emphasize subsequently.

It is through this mirage relation that the notion of an object is introduced. But this object is not the same as that which is aimed at on the horizon of the instinct. Between the object as it is structured by the narcissistic relation and das Ding, there is a difference, and it is precisely on the slope of that difference that the problem of sublimation is situated for us.

In a short note in the Three Essays, Freud gives us a kind of brief summary in the style of an essay on the difference that strikes us between the love life of antiquity, of pre-Christians, and our own. It resides, he says, in the fact that in antiquity the emphasis was on the instinct itself, whereas we place it on the object. The Ancients feted the instinct, and, through the intermediary of the instinct, were also ready to honor an object of lesser, common value, whereas we reduce the value of the manifestation of the instinct, and we demand the support of the object on account of the prevailing characteristics of the object.

Moreover, Freud wrote a great many other pages where he discussed disparaging commentaries on love life – commentaries made in the name of what? In the name of an incontestable ideal. You can read the following in Civilization and Its Discontents: "Among the works of that sensitive English author, Galsworthy, whose worth is universally acknowledged nowadays, I once really enjoyed one story. It was called The Apple Tree, and it shows how there is no room anymore in contemporary civilized life for the simple, natural love of two human beings of the pastoral tradition."[5]

The whole passage flows forth spontaneously in a way that I call excessive. How does Freud know that we emphasize the object, whereas the Ancients put the accent on the instinct? You will respond that there is no example of ideal exaltation in any Greek tragedy, unlike our own classical tragedies. Yet Freud hardly explains the question.

[5] S.E., XXI, p. 105, Note 2.

Next time we will have to compare our ideal of love with that of the Ancients by referring to some works of history and to a given historical moment that will also have to be defined. It is no more or less than a structuralization, a historical modification of Eros. It is, of course, of great importance that courtly love, the exaltation of woman, a certain Christian style of love that Freud himself discusses, mark a historical change. And I will be leading you into that territory.

It is nevertheless true, as I will show you, that in certain authors of antiquity – and interestingly enough in Latin rather than Greek literature – one finds some and perhaps all the elements that characterize the cult of an idealized object, something which was determinative for what can only be called the sublimated elaboration of a certain relationship. Thus what Freud expresses over-hastily and probably inversely, concerns a kind of degradation which, when one examines it closely, is directed less at love life than at a certain lost cord, a crisis, in relation to the object.

To set out to find the instinct again is the result of a certain loss, a cultural loss, of the object. That such a problem exists at the center of that mental crisis from which Freudianism emerged is a question that we will have to ask ourselves. The nostalgia expressed in the idea that the Ancients were closer than we are to the instinct perhaps means no more, like every dream of a Golden Age or El Dorado, than that we are engaged in posing questions at the level of the instinct because we do not yet know what to do as far as the object is concerned.

At the level of sublimation the object is inseparable from imaginary and especially cultural elaborations. It is not just that the collectivity recognizes in them useful objects; it finds rather a space of relaxation where it may in a way delude itself on the subject of das Ding, colonize the field of das Ding with imaginary schemes. That is how collective, socially accepted sublimations operate.

Society takes some comfort from the mirages that moralists, artists, artisans, designers of dresses and hats, and the creators of imaginary forms in general supply it with. But it is not simply in the approval that society gladly accords it that we must seek the power of sublimation. It is rather in an imaginary function, and, in particular, that for which we will use the symbolization of the fantasm ($$ \diamond a$), which is the form on which depends the subject's desire.

In forms that are historically and socially specific, the a elements, the imaginary elements of the fantasm come to overlay the subject, to delude it, at the very point of das Ding. The question of sublimation will be brought to bear here. That is why I shall talk to you next time of courtly love in the Middle Ages, and, in particular, of Minnesang.

In an anniversary way, since last year I talked to you about Hamlet, I shall speak about the Elizabethan theater, which is the turning point in European eroticism, and civilized as well. It is at that moment, in effect, that the celebration of the idealized object occurs that Freud talks about in his note.

Freud left us with the problem of a gap once again at the level of das Ding, which is that of religious men and mystics, at a time when we could no longer rely on the Father's guarantee.

January 13, 1960

VIII

The object and the thing

THE PSYCHOLOGY OF AFFECTS THE KLEINIAN MYTH OF THE MOTHER
KANTIAN FABLES
SUBLIMATION AND PERVERSION
THE FABLE OF JACQUES PRÉVERT, COLLECTOR

We are progressing this year around an axis that I take to be essential, namely, that Ding, which is not without causing problems, indeed, not without causing some doubts to emerge as to its Freudian legitimacy, at least among those who reflect and who retain their critical intelligence, as they should, in the presence of what I formulate here before you.

I take full responsibility for das Ding, whose exact importance you can imagine to the extent that it has proved to be necessary if we are to make any progress. You will be able to appreciate its merits in the use made of it. But I will also be talking about it specifically again.

1

Some might say or think that I have only taken up a small detail of Freud's text in the Entwurf.

But experience tells us precisely that in texts like those of Freud nothing is outdated, in the sense that it is simply borrowed from somewhere, the product of scholarly parroting; nothing goes unmarked by that powerful articulatory necessity that distinguishes his discourse. That's what makes it so significant when one notices places where his discourse remains open, gaping, but nevertheless implying a necessity that I think I have made you sense on a number of occasions.

And that's not all. This Ding, whose place and significance I have tried to make you feel, is absolutely essential as far as Freud's thought is concerned; and as we go forward, you will see why.

What is involved is that excluded interior which, in the terminology of the Entwurf, is thus excluded in the interior. In the interior of what then? Of something that is precisely articulated at that moment as the Real-Ich, which means then the final real of the psychic organization, a real conceived of as hypothetical, to the extent that it necessarily presupposes the Lust-Ich. It is in the latter that one finds the first sketches of the psychic organization, that is to say, of the organism whose development shows us that it is dominated by the function of Vorstellungsrepräsentanzen. And these are not only representations but the representatives of representation – something that corresponds very precisely to the path taken by so-called psychological knowledge before Freud, insofar as it first took its form from atomism. That ideational elementarity is in brief the truth of the atomism involved.

Through a kind of essential need, the whole effort of psychology has been to try to free itself from that. But it can only free itself or rebel against atomism by failing to recognize that flocculation which submits its material – and the material here is psychic – to the texture on which thought is founded, in other words, the texture of discourse as signifying chain. It is the very web on which logic rises up, with both the surplus and the essential it brings with it, which is the negation, the "splitting," the Spaltung, the division, the rending, that the inmixing of the subject introduces there. Psychology is subjected to the atomic condition of having to use Vorstellungsrepräsentanzen because it is in them that psychic material if flocculated. Doubtless psychology attempts to free itself from this necessity, but its efforts to achieve it have thus far been crude.

I don't need to do more than remind you of the confused nature of the recourse to affectivity; it reaches a point where, even when the reference is made within analysis, it always leads us toward an impasse, toward something that we feel is not the direction in which our research can really make progress.

Of course, it is not a matter of denying the importance of affects. But it is important not to confuse them with the substance of that which we are seeking in the Real-Ich, beyond signifying articulation of the kind we artists of analytical speech are capable of handling.

As far as the psychology of affects is concerned, Freud always manages to give in passing significant and suggestive hints. He always insists on their conventional and artificial character, on their character not as signifiers but as signals, to which in the last analysis they may be reduced. This character also explains their displaceable significance, and, from the economic point of view, presents a certain number of necessities, such as irreducibility. But affects do not throw light on the economic or even dynamic essence which is sought at the horizon or limit from an analytical perspective. That is something more opaque, more obscure, namely, analytical metaphysics's notions concerning energy.

It is true that this metapsychology has come nowadays to be organized in strangely qualitative categories. One only has to remember the function recently advanced of the term desexualized libido. That reference to a qualitative notion is increasingly difficult to maintain on the basis of any experience, and even less on the basis of an experience that could be called affective.

We will perhaps look into the psychology of affects together someday. In order to impress upon you the inadequacy of what has so far been done on the subject, especially in psychoanalysis, I should simply like to propose to you a few incidental subjects to reflect on – an affect such as anger, for example. I am giving you there a few practical little exercises in passing. The use of precise categories that I invite you to refer to might perhaps explain why there has been so much interest in anger in the history of psychology and of ethics, and why we have been so little interested in it in psychoanalysis.

Does, for example, what Descartes says about anger satisfy you fully? The working hypothesis that I am suggesting, and we will have to see whether it does the trick or not, is that anger is no doubt a passion which is manifested by means of an organic or physiological correlative, by a given more or less hypertonic or even elated feeling, but that it requires perhaps something like the reaction of a subject to a disappointment, to the failure of an expected correlation between a symbolic order and the response of the real. In other words, anger is essentially linked to something expressed in a formulation of Charles Péguy's, who was speaking in a humorous context – it's when the little pegs refuse to go into the little holes.

Think about that and see if you find it useful. It has all kinds of possible applications, up to and including offering a clue as to the possible outline of a symbolic organization of the world among the rare animal species where one can, in fact, observe something that resembles anger. It is, after all, surprising that anger is remarkably absent throughout the animal realm as a whole.

The direction taken by Freudian thought has involved locating affect under the heading of a signal. A sufficient indication of this is that, by the end, Freud came to evaluate anxiety itself as a signal. What we are looking for, however, is beyond the organization of the Lust-Ich insofar as it is entirely linked in a phenomenal way to the greater or lesser investment of the system of the Vorstellungsrepräsentanzen, or, in other words, of the signifying elements in the psyche. This is something that is calculated to allow us to define the field of das Ding at least operationally, as we attempt to advance on the terrain of ethics. And since Freud's thought progressed from a therapeutic starting point, we can try to define the field of the subject insofar as it is not simply the field of the intersubjective subject, the subject subjected to the mediation of the signifier, but what is behind this subject.

With this field that I call the field of das Ding, we are projected into something that is far beyond the domain of affectivity, something moving, obscure and without reference points owing to the lack of a sufficient organization of its register, something much more primitive that I have already tried to describe to you in our previous discussion this year. It isn't just the register of the Wille in Schopenhauer's sense of the word, insofar as, in opposition to representation, it is the essence of life whose support it is. It is a register where there is both good and bad will, that volens nolens, which is the true meaning of the ambivalence one fails to grasp, when one approaches it on the level of love and hate.

It is on the level of good and bad will, indeed of the preference for the bad at the level of negative therapeutic reaction, that Freud at the end of his thinking discovers once again the field of das Ding, and points out to us the space beyond the pleasure principle. It is an ethical paradox that the field of das Ding is rediscovered at the end, and that Freud suggests there that which in life might prefer death. And it is along this path that he comes closer than anyone else to the problem of evil or, more precisely, to the project of evil as such.

This is pointed to in everything that we have seen at the beginning of this year's seminar. Is it to be found in a corner of Freud's work where one might overlook it, might consider it as merely contingent or even outmoded? I believe that everything in Freud's thought proves that that is by no means the case. And in the end Freud refers to this field as that around which the field of the pleasure principle gravitates, in the sense that the field of the pleasure principle is beyond the pleasure principle. Neither pleasure nor the organizing, unifying, erotic instincts of life suffice in any way to make of the living organism, of the necessities and needs of life, the center of psychic development.

Clearly, the term "operational" has its value on this occasion as it does in all thought processes. This Ding is not fully elucidated, even if we make use of it. The label "operational" may leave you with a certain comic dissatisfaction, since what we are trying to point to there is precisely that which each and every one of us has to deal with in the least operational of ways.

I don't want to indulge in overdramatization. All ages have thought they had reached the most extreme point of vision in a confrontation with something terminal, some extra-worldly force that threatened the world. But our world and society now bring news of the shadow of a certain incredible, absolute weapon that is waved in our faces in a way that is indeed worthy of the muses. Don't imagine that the end will occur tomorrow; even in Leibnitz's time, people believed in less specific terms that the end of the world was at hand. Nevertheless, that weapon suspended over our heads which is one hundred thousand times more destructive than that which was already hundreds of thousands of times more destructive than those which came before – just imagine that rushing toward us on a rocket from outer space. It's not something I invented, since we are bombarded everyday with the news of a weapon that threatens the planet itself as a habitat for mankind.

Put yourself in that spot, which has perhaps been made more present for us by the progress of knowledge than it was before in men's imagination – although that faculty never ceased to toy with the idea; confront that moment when a man or a group of men can act in such a way that the question of existence is posed for the whole of the human species, and you will then see inside yourself that das Ding is next to the subject.

You will see that you will beg the subject of knowledge who has given birth to the thing in question – the other thing, the absolute weapon – to take stock, and you will also wish either that the true Thing be at that moment within him (in other words that he not let the other go or, in common parlance, "let it all blow up") or that we know why.

Well now, after that short digression that was suggested to me by the word "operational," and from a less dramatic point of view – one no longer dares say eschathological, given the very precise materialization of things – I will take up our discussion again where we are in effect concerned with the essence of das Ding. Or, more exactly, in what way are we concerned with it in the domain of ethics?

2

It is not just a matter of drawing close to das Ding, but also to its effects, to its presence at the core of human activity, namely, in that precarious existence in the midst of the forest of desires and compromises that these very desires achieve with a certain reality, which is certainly not as confused as one might imagine.

The demands of reality, in effect, present themselves readily in the form of social demands. Freud cannot not consider them seriously, but one has to indicate immediately the special approach he adopts; it permits him to transcend the simple opposition between individual and society, in which the individual is straightway posited as the eventual site of disorder.

Note right off that it is quite unthinkable nowadays to speak abstractly of society. It is unthinkable historically, and it is unthinkable philosophically, too, for the reason that a certain Hegel revealed to us the modern function of the state, and the link between a whole phenomenology of mind and the necessity which renders a legal system perfectly coherent. A whole philosophy of law, derived from the state, encloses human existence, up to and including the monogamous couple that is its point of departure.

I am concerned with the ethics of psychoanalysis, and I can't at the same time discuss Hegelian ethics. But I do want to point out that they are not the same. At the end of a certain phenomenology, the opposition between the individual and the city, between the individual and the state, is obvious. In Plato, too, the disorders of the soul are also referred to the same dimension – it's a matter of the reproduction of the disorders of the city at the level of the psyche. All of that is related to a problematic that is not at all Freudian. The sick individual whom Freud is concerned with reveals another dimension than that of the disorders of the state and of hierarchical disturbances. Freud addresses the sick individual as such, the neurotic, the psychotic; he addresses directly the powers of life insofar as they open onto the powers of death; he addresses directly the powers that derive from the knowledge of good and evil.

Here we are then in the company of das Ding, trying to get along with it.

What I am saying should in no way surprise, for I am only trying to point out to you what is going on in the psychoanalytical community. The analysts are so preoccupied with the field of das Ding, which responds so well to the internal necessity of their experience, that the development of analytic theory is dominated by the existence of the so-called Kleinian school. And it is striking to note that whatever reservations or even scorn another branch of the analytic community may express for that school, it is the latter that polarizes and orients the whole development of analytic thought, including the contribution of our group.

Let me suggest then that you reconsider the whole of Kleinian theory with the following key, namely, Kleinian theory depends on its having situated the mythic body of the mother at the central place of das Ding.

To begin with, it is in relation to that mythic body that the aggressive, transgressive, and most primordial of instincts is manifested, the primal aggressions and inverted aggressions. Also in that register which currently interests us, namely, the notion of sublimation in the Freudian economy, the Kleinian school is full of interesting ideas – not only Melanie Klein herself but also Ella Sharpe, insofar as on this point she follows Klein completely. Recently, an American author, who isn't at all Kleinian, has written on sublimation as the principle of creation in the fine arts. In an article that I shall come back to later, entitled "A Theory Concerning Creation in the Free Arts," after a more or less exhaustive critical examination of Freudian formulations on sublimation and of Kleinian attempts to explain its full meaning, the author, M. Lee, ends up attributing to it a restitutive function. In other words, she finds there more or less of an attempt at symbolic repair of the imaginary lesions that have occurred to the fundamental image of the maternal body.

I will bring the texts involved, if you don't know them. But I can tell you right away that the reduction of the notion of sublimation to a restitutive effort of the subject relative to the injured body of the mother is certainly not the best solution to the problem of sublimation, nor to the topological, metapsychological problem itself. There is nevertheless there an attempt to approach the relations of the subject to something primordial, its attachment to the fundamental, most archaic of objects, for which my field of das Ding, defined operationally, establishes the framework. It allows us to conceive of the conditions that opened onto the blossoming of what one might call the Kleinian myth, allows us also to situate it, and, as far as sublimation is concerned, to reestablish a broader function than that which one necessarily arrives at if one accepts Kleinian categories.

The clinicians who do on the whole accept them end up – I will tell you so now and explain why later – with a rather limited and puerile notion of what might be called an atherapy. All of that which is included under the heading fine arts, namely, a number of gymnastic, dance and other exercises, is supposed to give the subject satisfactions, a measure of solution to his problems, a state of equilibrium. That is noted in a number of observations that are still rewarding. I am thinking especially of Ella Sharpe's articles, which I am far from depreciating – "Certain Aspects of Sublimation and Delirium" or "Similar and Divergent Unconscious Determinants, which Subtend the Sublimations of Pure Art and Pure Science."

To read these papers is to realize how such an orientation reduces the problem of sublimation and yields somewhat puerile results. The approach involves valorizing activities that seem to be located in the register of a more or less transitory explosion of supposedly artistic gifts, gifts which appear in the cases described to be highly doubtful. Completely left out is something that must always be emphasized in artistic production and something that Freud paradoxically insisted on, to the surprise of many writers, namely, social recognition. These objects play an essential role in a question that Freud doesn't perhaps take as far as one would like, but which is clearly linked to the championship of a certain progress – and God knows that such a notion is far from being unilinear in Freud – to the celebration of something that achieves social recognition. I won't go any further for the moment. It is enough to note that Freud articulates it in a way that may seem completely foreign to the metapsychological register.

Note that no correct evaluation of sublimation in art is possible if we overlook the fact that all artistic production, including especially that of the fine arts, is historically situated. You don't paint in Picasso's time as you painted in Velazquez's; you don't write a novel in 1930 as you did in Stendhal's time. This is an absolutely essential fact that does not for the time being need to be located under the rubric of the collectivity or the individual – let's place it under the rubric of culture. What does society find there that is so satisfying? That's the question we need to answer.

The problem of sublimation is there, of sublimation insofar as it creates a certain number of forms, among which art is not alone – and we will concentrate on one art in particular, literary art, which is so close to the domain of ethics. It is after all as a function of the problem of ethics that we have to judge sublimation; it creates socially recognized values.

In order to refocus our discussion onto the level of ethics, one could hardly do better than to refer to that which, however paradoxical it may seem, has proved to be pivotal, namely, the Kantian perspective on the field.

Alongside das Ding, however much we may hope that its weight will be felt on the good side, we find in opposition the Kantian formula of duty. That is another way of making one's weight felt. Kant invokes the universally applicable rule of conduct or, in other words, the weight of reason. Of course, one still has to prove how reason may make its weight felt.

There is always an advantage to reading authors in the original. The other day I brought to your attention the passage on the theme of Schmerz, of pain, as a correlative of the ethical act. I observed then that even some of you to whom these texts were once familiar didn't pick up on the reference. Well now, if you open up The Critique of Pure Reason, you will see that in order to impress upon us the influence of the weight of reason, Kant invents for his didactic purposes an example which is magnificent in its freshness. A double fable is involved that is designed to make us feel the weight of the ethical principle pure and simple, the potential dominance of duty as such against all, against all that is conceived as vitally desirable.

The key to the proof lies in a comparison between two situations. Suppose, says Kant, that in order to control the excesses of a sensualist, one produces the following situation. There is in a bedroom the woman he currently lusts after. He is granted the freedom to enter that room to satisfy his desire or his need, but next to the door through which he will leave there stands the gallows on which he will be hanged. But that's nothing, and is certainly not the basis of Kant's moral; you will see in a moment where the key to the proof is. As far as Kant is concerned, it goes without saying that the gallows will be a sufficient deterrent; there's no question of an individual going to screw a woman when he knows he's to be hanged on the way out. Next comes a situation that is similar as far as the tragic outcome is concerned, but here it is a question of a tyrant who offers someone the choice between the gallows and his favor, on the condition that he bear false witness against his friend. Kant quite rightly emphasizes here that one can conceive of someone weighing his own life against that of bearing false witness, especially if in this case the false witness is without fatal consequences for the person bearing it.

The striking point is that the power of proof is here left to reality – to the real behavior of the individual, I mean. It is in the real that Kant asks us to examine the impact of the weight of reality, which he identifies here with the weight of duty.

To follow him onto this ground is to discover that he misses something. It is after all not impossible that under certain conditions the subject of the first scenario will not so much offer himself up to be executed – at no point is the fable taken to this point – but will at least consider doing so.

Our philosopher from Königsberg was a nice person, and I don't intend to imply that he was someone of limited stature or feeble passions, but he doesn't seem to have considered that under certain conditions of what Freud would call Uberschätzung or overevaluation of the object – and that I will henceforth call object sublimation – under conditions in which the object of a loving passion takes on a certain significance (and, as you will see, it is in this direction that I intend to introduce the dialectic through which I propose to teach you how to identify what sublimation really is), under certain conditions of sublimation of the feminine object or, in other words, the exaltation we call love – a form of exaltation that is historically specific, and to which Freud gives us the clue, in the short note I spoke to you about the other day, in which he says that in the modern period the emphasis of the libido is on the object rather than on the instinct (which is in itself something that poses an important question, one that, with your permission, I will be introducing you to, one that requires you to spend a few sessions on something in German history whose form I referred to the other day in connection with Hamlet, namely, the Minne, or, in other words, a certain theory and practice of courtly love – and why wouldn't we spend some time on that given the time we give to ethnographic research? – especially if I assure you that it concerns certain traces within us of the object relation that are unthinkable without these historical antecedents), under certain conditions of sublimation, then, it is conceivable for such a step to be taken. After all, a whole corpus of tales stands for something from a fantasmic, if not from a strictly historical point of view; moreover, there are a great many stories in the newspapers that are relevant. All of which leads to the conclusion that it is not impossible for a man to sleep with a woman knowing full well that he is to be bumped off on his way out, by the gallows or anything else (all this, of course, is located under the rubric of passionate excesses, a rubric that raises a lot of other questions); it is not impossible that this man coolly accepts such an eventuality on his leaving – for the pleasure of cutting up the lady concerned in small pieces, for example.

The latter is the other case that one can envisage, and the annals of criminology furnish a great many cases of the type. It is something that obviously changes the facts of the situation, and at the very least the demonstrative value of Kant's example.

I have outlined then two cases that Kant doesn't envisage, two forms of transgression beyond the limits normally assigned to the pleasure principle in opposition to the reality principle given as a criterion, namely, excessive object sublimation and what is commonly known as perversion. Sublimation and perversion are both a certain relationship of desire that attracts our attention to the possibility of formulating, in the form of a question, a different criterion of another, or even of the same, morality, in opposition to the reality principle. For there is another register of morality that takes its direction from that which is to be found on the level of das Ding; it is the register that makes the subject hesitate when he is on the point of bearing false witness against das Ding, that is to say, the place of desire, whether it be perverse or sublimated.

3

We are only stumbling along here, following the paths of analytical good sense, which isn't, in fact, a very different good sense of the common or garden kind. What one finds at the level of das Ding once it is revealed is the place of the Triebe, the drives. And I mean by that the drives that, as Freud showed, have nothing at all to do with something that may be satisfied by moderation – that moderation which soberly regulates a human being's relations with his fellow man at the different hierarchical levels of society in a harmonious order, from the couple to the State with a capital S.

We must return now to the meaning of sublimation as Freud attempts to define it for us.

He attaches sublimation to the Triebe as such, and that's what makes its theorization difficult for psychoanalysts.

Please forgive me if I don't today read given passages of Freud that might perhaps bore you and that I will take up at the right moment, when you will understand the value of going in one direction or another, of confirming if we are really aligned with Freudian theory. But I don't believe I can hold the interest of most of you here without explaining what my aim is or where I'm taking you.

Sublimation, Freud tells us, involves a certain form of satisfaction of the Triebe, a word that is improperly translated as "instincts," but that one should translate strictly as "drives" (pulsions) – or as "drifts" (dérives), so as to mark the fact that the Trieb is deflected from what he calls its Ziel, its aim.

Sublimation is represented as distinct from that economy of substitution in which the repressed drive is usually satisfied. A symptom is the return by means of signifying substitution of that which is at the end of the drive in the form of an aim. It is here that the function of the signifier takes on its full meaning, for it is impossible without reference to that function to distinguish the return of the repressed from sublimation as a potential mode of satisfaction of the drive. It is a paradoxical fact that the drive is able to find its aim elsewhere than in that which is its aim – without its being a question of the signifying substitution that constitutes the overdetermined structure, the ambiguity, and the double causality, of the symptom as compromise formation.

The latter notion has never failed to cause problems for theoreticians and analysts alike. What can this change of aim mean? It is a matter of aim and not strictly speaking of object, although, as I emphasized last time, the latter soon enters into consideration. Don't let us forget that Freud points out early on that it is important not to confuse the notion of aim with that of object.

And there is a special passage that I will read you at the appropriate moment, but I will give you the reference right away. If I remember correctly, in Einführung des Narzissmus Freud emphasizes the difference that exists between sublimation and idealization as far as the object is concerned. The fact is that idealization involves an identification of the subject with the object, whereas sublimation is something quite different.

To those who know German I suggest you read a little article by Richard Sterba that appeared in Internationale Zeitschrift in 1930, "Zur Problematik der Sublimierungslehre" ["On the Problematic of the Doctrine of Sublimation"]; it summarizes the difficulties that analysts found in the notion at the time – that is after an essential article by Bernfeld on the subject and also one by Glover in the International Journal of Psychoanalysis of 1931, "Sublimation, Substitution and Social Anxiety."

This article in English will cause you much more difficulty. It's very long and difficult to follow because it literally parades the standard of sublimation across all the notions known to analysis at that time in order to see how one might apply it to this or that level of the theory. The result of this survey is surprising. It gives rise to a review of the whole of psychoanalytic theory from one end to the other, but it clearly shows, at least, the extraordinary difficulty that exists in using the notion of sublimation in practice without giving rise to contradictions, and this text is riddled with them.

I would like to try now to show you in what way we are going to posit sublimation, if only so as to be able to allow you to appreciate its functioning and value.

The satisfaction of the Trieb is, then, paradoxical, since it seems to occur elsewhere than where its aim is. Are we going to be satisfied with saying, like Sterba for example, that, in effect, the aim has changed, that it was sexual before and that now it is no longer? That is, by the way, how Freud describes it. Whence one has to conclude that the sexual libido has become desexualized. And that's why your daughter is dumb.

Are we going to be satisfied with the Kleinian register, which seems to me to contain a certain though partial truth, and speak of the imaginary solution of a need for substitution, for repair work with relation to the mother's body?

These formulae will provoke anyone who is not content with verbal solutions – that is, solutions without real meaning – into questioning more closely what sublimation is all about.

You should sense immediately which direction I intend to take. The sublimation that provides the Trieb with a satisfaction different from its aim – an aim that is still defined as its natural aim – is precisely that which reveals the true nature of the Trieb insofar as it is not simply instinct, but has a relationship to das Ding as such, to the Thing insofar as it is distinct from the object.

We have to guide us the Freudian theory of the narcissistic foundations of the object, of its insertion in the imaginary register. The object that specifies directions or poles of attraction to man in his openness, in his world, and that interests him because it is more or less his image, his reflection – precisely that object is not the Thing to the extent that the latter is at the heart of the libidinal economy. Thus, the most general formula that I can give you of sublimation is the following: it raises an object – and I don't mind the suggestion of a play on words in the term I use – to the dignity of the Thing.

That is significant, for example, in relation to something that I alluded to at the limit of our discussion, something I will get to next time, the sublimation of the feminine object. The whole theory of the Minne or of courtly love has, in effect, been decisive. Although it has completely disappeared nowadays from the sociological sphere, courtly love has nevertheless left traces in an unconscious that has no need to be called "collective," in a traditional unconscious that is sustained by a whole literature, a whole imagery, that we continue to inhabit as far as our relations with women are concerned.

This mode was created deliberately. It was by no means a creation of the popular soul, of that famous great soul of the blessed Middle Ages, as Gustave Cohen used to say. The rules of polite conduct were articulated deliberately in a small literary circle and, as a result, the celebration of the object was made possible – the absurdity of which I will show you in detail; a German writer who is a specialist of this medieval German literature has used the expression "absurd Minne." This moral code instituted an object at the heart of a given society, an object that is nevertheless completely natural. Don't imagine they made love in those days any less than we do.

The object is elevated to the dignity of the Thing as we define it in our Freudian topology, insofar as it is not slipped into but surrounded by the network of Ziele. It is to the degree that this new object is raised to the function of the Thing at a certain historical moment that one is able to explain a phenomenon which, from a sociological point of view, has always struck those who considered it as frankly paradoxical. We will certainly not be able to exhaust the totality of signs, rites, themes and exchange of themes, especially of literary themes, that have constituted the substance and effective influence of this human relation, which has been defined in different terms according to the times and places of its occurrence – courtly love, Minne, and all the other forms. Just remember that the circle of male and female précieux at the beginning of the seventeenth century is the last manifestation of the phenomenon in our own cycle.

That is nevertheless not the last word on the subject, for it is not enough to say, "They did that" or "That's how it is," for the matter to be solved, for the object to come and play the required role. I am not concerned only with giving you the key to that historical event; what I seek in the end, thanks to that distant affair, is both to get a better grasp of something that has happened to us, relative to the Thing, as the result of a collective education that remains to be defined and is called art, and to understand how we behave on the level of sublimation.

The definition I gave you doesn't close the debate, first, because I must confirm and illustrate it for you, and, second, because I have to show you that, if the object is to become available in that way, something must have occurred at the level of the relation of the object to desire; it is quite impossible to explain it correctly without reference to what I had to say last year on the subject of desire and its behavior.

4

I will end today with a little fable in which I would like you just to see an example, albeit a paradoxical and demeaning one, that is yet significant for what goes on in sublimation. Since we have remained today on the level of the object and the Thing, I wanted to show you what it means to invent an object for a special purpose that society may esteem, valorize, and approve.

I draw on my memories for this fable, that you can, if you like, place in the psychological category of collecting. Someone who recently published a work on collectors and those sales thanks to which collectors are presumed to get rich, has long asked me to give him some ideas on the meaning of collecting. I didn't do it because I would have had to tell him to come to my seminar for five or six years.

There's a lot to say on the psychology of collecting. I am something of a collector myself. And if some of you like to think that it is in imitation of Freud, so be it. I believe my reasons are very different from his. I have seen the remains of Freud's collections on Anna Freud's shelves. They seemed to me to have to do with the fascination that the coexistence of [. . .][1] and of Egyptian civilization exercised over him at the level of the signifier rather than for the enlightened taste of what is called an object.

What is called an object in the domain of collecting should be strictly distinguished from the meaning of object in psychoanalysis. In analysis the object is a point of imaginary fixation which gives satisfaction to a drive in any register whatsoever. The object in collecting is something entirely different, as I will show in the following example, which reduces collecting to its most rudimentary form. For one usually imagines that a collection is composed of a diversity of elements, but it is not necessarily true at all.

During that great period of penitence that our country went through under Pétain, in the time of "Work, Family, Homeland" and of belt-tightening, I once went to visit my friend Jacques Prévert in Saint-Paul-de-Vence. And I saw there a collection of match boxes. Why the image has suddenly resurfaced in my memory, I cannot tell.

[1] This ellipsis is there in the French edition.

It was the kind of collection that it was easy to afford at that time; it was perhaps the only kind of collection possible. Only the match boxes appeared as follows: they were all the same and were laid out in an extremely agreeable way that involved each one being so close to the one next to it that the little drawer was slightly displaced. As a result, they were all threaded together so as to form a continuous ribbon that ran along the mantlepiece, climbed the wall, extended to the molding, and climbed down again next to a door. I don't say that it went on to infinity, but it was extremely satisfying from an ornamental point of view.

Yet I don't think that that was the be all and end all of what was surprising in this "collectionism," nor the source of the satisfaction that the collector himself found there. I believe that the shock of novelty of the effect realized by this collection of empty match boxes – and this is the essential point – was to reveal something that we do not perhaps pay enough attention to, namely, that a box of matches is not simply an object, but that, in the form of an Erscheinung, as it appeared in its truly imposing multiplicity, it may be a Thing.

In other words, this arrangement demonstrated that a match box isn't simply something that has a certain utility, that it isn't even a type in the Platonic sense, an abstract match box, that the match box all by itself is a thing with all its coherence of being. The wholly gratuitous, proliferating, superfluous, and quasi absurd character of this collection pointed to its thingness as match box. Thus the collector found his motive in this form of apprehension that concerns less the match box than the Thing that subsists in a match box.

Whatever you do, however, you don't find that in a random way in any object whatsoever. For if you think about it, the match box appears to be a mutant form of something that has so much importance for us that it can occasionally take on a moral meaning; it is what we call a drawer. In this case, the drawer was liberated and no longer fixed in the rounded fullness of a chest, thus presenting itself with a copulatory force that the picture drawn by Prévert's composition was designed to make us perceive.

So now, that little fable of the revelation of the Thing beyond the object shows you one of the most innocent forms of sublimation. Perhaps you can even see something emerge in it that, goodness knows, society is able to find satisfaction in.

If it is a satisfaction, it is in this case one that doesn't ask anything of anyone.

January 20, 1960

IX

On creation ex nihilo

THE WONDERS OF PSYCHOANALYSIS THAT WHICH IN THE REAL SUFFERS FROM THE SIGNIFIER THE FABLE OF THE POT AND THE VASE
INTRODUCTION TO CATHARISM
THE DRIVE, AN ONTOLOGICAL NOTION

I will take up my discussion of the function I attribute to the Thing in the definition of sublimation with an amusing anecdote.

After leaving you the other day, I was conscious-stricken as I often am when I feel that I haven't exhausted the bibliography on a subject I am treating, and I looked up that very afternoon two articles by Melanie Klein that are referred to by Glover. They have been collected in Contributions to Psychoanalysis

The first of the articles, "Infant Analysis," of 1923, contains some very important things on sublimation and on the secondary phenomenon of inhibition – that is to say, on how, in Klein's conception, functions in the child that are sufficiently libidinalized through sublimation are subsequently subjected to an effect of inhibition.

I am not going to spend time on this, for it is to the very conception of sublimation that I want to draw your attention; all the misunderstandings that follow derive from the lack of insight into this problem.

It was the second, 1929 article, entitled "Infantile Anxiety Situations Reflected in a Work of Art and in the Creative Impulse," that I regretted not having looked at. It is short, but as sometimes happens, it gave me the satisfaction of fitting my purposes like a glove.

1

The first part is a discussion of the musical composition of Ravel based on a scenario by Colette, L'Enfant et les Sortilèges. I read it with pleasure, which was by no means guaranteed, since it speaks of the work in German and English translations.

Melanie Klein is amazed that the work of art follows so closely a child's fantasms concerning the mother's body, those concerning primitive aggression and the counteraggression it feels. In short, it is a quite long and agreeable statement of those features in the imagination of the creator of the work, and especially of the composer, that are in remarkable accordance with the primordial and central field of the psychic structure as indicated by the Kleinian fantasms derived from child analysis. And it is striking to perceive their convergence with the structural forms revealed in the work of art – not that all of this is fully satisfying for us, of course.

The second part of the article is more remarkable; it is this part that is amusing. Here it is a question of a reference to the article of an analyst called Karin Mikailis, who under the title "Empty Space" narrates a case history which has a certain piquancy. According to the four pages that summarize it, a striking limit case is involved. But it isn't described in such a way that one can offer a certain diagnosis or know if it should be described as melancholic depression or not.

The case concerns a patient whose life is briefly sketched out and who is called Ruth Kjar. She was never a painter, but at the center of the lived experience of her crises of depression this woman always complained of what she called an empty space inside her, a space she could never fill.

I won't bother you with the episodes of her life. In any case, helped by her psychoanalyst, she gets married, and once she is married things go well at first. Yet after a short period of time, we find a recurrence of the attacks of melancholia. And here we come to the wonder of the case. We find ourselves, in effect, in the domain of those wonders of psychoanalysis that works of this kind bring out, although not without a certain naive satisfaction.

For a reason that isn't made clear, the walls of the young couple's house are covered with the paintings of the brother-in-law, who is a painter, including one room in particular. Then at a given moment, the brother-in-law, who is talented, although we have no means of verifying this, sells one of his paintings, which he takes down from wall and carries away. It leaves an empty space on the wall.

It turns out that this empty space plays a polarizing and precipitating role in the attacks of melancholic depression that start up again at this point in the life of the patient. She recovers from them in the following way. One fine day she decides to "daub a little"[1] on the wall, so as to fill up that damned empty space that has come to have for her such a crystallizing power, and whose function we would like to know more about in her case, with a better clinical description. So as to fill up that empty space in imitation of her brother-in-law, she tries to paint a painting that is as similar to the others as possible. She goes to an artists' supply shop to look for colors that are the same as those of her brother-in-law's palette, and she begins to work with an enthusiasm that to me seems characteristic of the beginning of a phase tending toward depression. And out of this there emerges a work of art.

[1] In English in the original.

The amusing part of the story is that when the thing is shown to the brother-in-law and the patient's heart is beating with anxiety as she waits for the connoisseur's verdict, he almost flies into a rage. "You will never make me believe that it is you who painted that," he tells her. "It's the work of an artist, not just an experienced artist, but a mature one. The devil take your story. Who could it possibly be?" They are unable to convince him, and he continues to swear that if his sister-in-law painted that, then he can conduct a Beethoven symphony at the Royal Chapel, even though he doesn't know a note of music.

This tale is narrated with a lack of critical distance at the hearsay involved, which cannot fail to inspire some reservations. Such a miracle of technique is after all worth subjecting to some fundamental questions. But it is not very important from our point of view. Melanie Klein finds confirmation of a structure that seems to her illustrated admirably there. And you cannot fail to see how that structure coincides with the central plan I use to present a topological diagram of the way in which the question of what we call the Thing is raised.

As I said before, the Kleinian doctrine places the mother's body there, and she locates the phases of all sublimation there, including such miraculous sublimations as that of this spontaneous accession – one might call it an illumination – of a novice to the most expert forms of pictorial technique. Mrs. Klein finds her theory confirmed – and that no doubt explains her lack of astonishment – by the series of subjects painted by her patient with the purpose of filling up the empty space. First, there is a nude negress, then a very old woman with all the signs of the weight of years, of disillusion, of the inconsolable resignation of extremely advanced age, and the series ends with the rebirth, the reemergence into the light of day, of the image of her own mother at the height of her beauty. As a result of which, we have according to Melanie Klein, Q.E.D., all we need to understand the motivation of the whole phenomenon.

The amusing thing here is surely what we are told concerning the topology in which the phenomena of sublimation are situated. But you must sense that we are left a little in the dark concerning its very possibilities.

I am trying to give you the information about sublimation required if we are to account for its relation to what we are calling the Thing – in its central position as far as the constitution of the reality of the subject is concerned. How can we define it more precisely in our topology?

The little example from last time borrowed from the psychology of collecting – an example that you would be wrong to hope exhausts the subject, although it does allow us to go quite a long way in the right direction – illustrates, in brief, the transformation of an object into a thing, the sudden elevation of the match box to a dignity that it did not possess before. But it is a thing that is not, of course, the Thing.

If the Thing were not fundamentally veiled, we wouldn't be in the kind of relationship to it that obliges us, as the whole of psychic life is obliged, to encircle it or bypass it in order to conceive it. Wherever it affirms itself, it does so in domesticated spheres. That is why the spheres are defined thus; it always presents itself as a veiled entity.

Let's say today that if the Thing occupies the place in the psychic constitution that Freud defined on the basis of the thematics of the pleasure principle, this is because the Thing is that which in the real, the primordial real, I will say, suffers from the signifier – and you should understand that it is a real that we do not yet have to limit, the real in its totality, both the real of the subject and the real he has to deal with as exterior to him.

In effect, the first relation that is constituted in the subject in the psychic order, which is itself subject to homeostasis or the law of the pleasure principle, involves flocculation, the crystallization into signifying units. A signifying organization dominates the psychic apparatus as it is revealed to us in the examination of a patient. Whereupon we can say in a negative way that there is nothing between the organization in the signifying network, in the network of Vorstellungsrepräsentanzen, and the constitution in the real of the space or central place in which the field of the Thing as such presents itself to us.

It is precisely in this field that we should situate something that Freud presents, on the other hand, as necessarily corresponding to the find itself, as necessarily being the wiedergefundene or refound object. Such is for Freud the fundamental definition of the object in its guiding function, the paradox of which I have already demonstrated, for it is not affirmed that this object was really lost. The object is by nature a refound object. That it was lost is a consequence of that – but after the fact. It is thus refound without our knowing, except through the refinding, that it was ever lost.

We come once again upon a fundamental structure, which allows us to articulate the fact that the Thing in question is, by virtue of its structure, open to being represented by what I called earlier, in connection with boredom and with prayer, the Other thing.

And that is the second characteristic of the Thing as veiled; it is by nature, in the refinding of the object, represented by something else.

You cannot fail to see that in the celebrated expression of Picasso, "I do not seek, I find," that it is the finding (trouver), the trobar of the Provençal troubadours and the trouvères, and of all the schools of rhetoric, that takes precedence over the seeking.

Obviously, what is found is sought, but sought in the paths of the signifier. Now this search is in a way an antipsychic search that by its place and function is beyond the pleasure principle. For according to the laws of the pleasure principle, the signifier projects into this beyond equalization, homeostasis, and the tendency to the uniform investment of the system of the self as such; it provokes its failure. The function of the pleasure principle is, in effect, to lead the subject from signifier to signifier, by generating as many signifiers as are required to maintain at as low a level as possible the tension that regulates the whole functioning of the psychic apparatus.

We are thus led to the relation between man and this signifier – something that will allow us to take another step forward.

If the pleasure regulates human speculation with the law of the lure right through the immense discourse that isn't simply made up of what it articulates but also of all its action – insofar as it is dominated by that search which leads it to find things in signs – how then can the relation of man to the signifier, to the extent that he can manipulate it, put him in relationship with an object that represents the Thing? We thus come to the question of what man does when he makes a signifier.

2

As far as the signifier is concerned, the difficulty is to avoid leaping on the fact that man is the artisan of his support system.

For many years now I have habituated you to the notion, the primary and dominant notion, that the signifier as such is constituted of oppositional structures whose emergence profoundly modifies the human world. It is furthermore the case that those signifiers in their individuality are fashioned by man, and probably more by his hands than by his spirit.

And here we encounter linguistic usage that, at least in connection with sublimation in the sphere of art, never hesitates to speak of creation. We must now, therefore, consider the notion of creation with all it implies, a knowledge of the creature and of the creator, because it is central, not only for our theme of the motive of sublimation, but also that of ethics in its broadest sense.

I posit the following: an object, insofar as it is a created object, may fill the function that enables it not to avoid the Thing as signifier, but to represent it. According to a fable handed down through the chain of generations, and that nothing prevents us from using, we are going to refer to what is the most primitive of artistic activities, that of the potter.

Last time I spoke to you about a match box; I had my reasons and we will come back to it. It will also perhaps enable us to explore further our dialectic of the vase. But the vase is simpler. It was certainly born before the match box. It has always been there; it is perhaps the most primordial feature of human industry. It is certainly a tool, a utensil that allows us to affirm unambiguously a human presence wherever we find it. This vase which has always been there, and which has long been used to make us conceive the mysteries of creation by means of parables, analogies and metaphors, may still be of use to us.

To have confirmation of the appropriation of the vase for this purpose, look up what Heidegger affirms when he writes about das Ding. He's the last in a long line to have meditated on the subject of creation; and he develops his dialectic around a vase.

I will not be concerned here with the function of das Ding in Heidegger's approach to the contemporary revelation of what he calls Being and that is linked to the end of metaphysics. You can all of you easily go to the volume entitled Essays and Lectures and to the article on das Ding. You will see the function Heidegger assigns it of uniting celestial and terrestrial powers around it in an essential human process.

Today I simply want to stick to the elementary distinction as far as a vase is concerned between its use as a utensil and its signifying function. If it really is a signifier, and the first of such signifiers fashioned by human hand, it is in its signifying essence a signifier of nothing other than of signifying as such or, in other words, of no particular signified. Heidegger situates the vase at the center of the essence of earth and sky. It unites first of all, by virtue of the act of libation, by its dual orientation – upwards in order to receive and toward the earth from which it raises something. That's the function of a vase.

This nothing in particular that characterizes it in its signifying function is that which in its incarnated form characterizes the vase as such. It creates the void and thereby introduces the possibility of filling it. Emptiness and fullness are introduced into a world that by itself knows not of them. It is on the basis of this fabricated signifier, this vase, that emptiness and fullness as such enter the world, neither more nor less, and with the same sense.

This is the moment to point to the fallacious opposition between what is called concrete and what is called figurative. If the vase may be filled, it is because in the first place in its essence it is empty. And it is exactly in the same sense that speech and discourse may be full or empty.

That's a question that we took up at a certain conference at Royaumont, where I insisted on the fact that a mustard pot possesses as essence in our practical life the fact that it presents itself as an empty mustard pot. This comment, that must at the time have passed for a concetto or conceit, will find its explanation in the argument I am developing here. Go as far as your fantasy allows you in this direction. I don't, in fact, mind if you recognize in the name of Bornibus, which is one of the most familiar and opulent forms taken by a mustard pot, a divine name, since it is Bornibus who fills those pots.

We are limited to this – we are, so to speak, bound by Bornibus.[2]

The example of the mustard pot and the vase allows us to introduce that around which the central problem of the Thing has revolved, to the extent that it is the central problem of ethics, namely, if a reasonable power created the world, if God created the world, how is it that whatever we do or don't do, the world is in such bad shape?

The potter makes a pot starting with a clay that is more or less fine or refined; and it is at this point that our religious preachers stop us, so as to make us hear the moaning of the vase in the potter's hand. The preacher makes it talk in the most moving of ways, even to the point of moaning, and makes it ask its creator why he treats it so roughly or, on the contrary, so gently. But what is masked in this example of creationist mythology – and strangely enough by those who use the example of the vase, which is so familiar in the imagery of the act of creation (I told you that they are always writers who work at the borderline between religion and mythology, and there's a good reason for that) – is the fact that the vase is made from matter. Nothing is made from nothing.

The whole of ancient philosophy is articulated around that point. If Aristotelian philosophy is so difficult for us to think, that is because it must be thought in a style that never omits the fact that matter is eternal, and that nothing is made from nothing. In consideration of which, it remains mired in an image of the world that never permitted even an Aristotle – and it is difficult to imagine in the whole history of human thought a mind of such power – to emerge from the enclosure that the celestial surface presented to his eyes, and not to consider the world, including the world of interhuman relations, the world of language, as included in eternal nature, which is fundamentally limited.

Now if you consider the vase from the point of view I first proposed, as an object made to represent the existence of the emptiness at the center of the real that is called the Thing, this emptiness as represented in the representation presents itself as a nihil, as nothing. And that is why the potter, just like you to whom I am speaking, creates the vase with his hand around this emptiness, creates it, just like the mythical creator, ex nihilo, starting with a hole.

Everyone makes jokes about macaroni, because it is a hole with something around it, or about canons. The fact that we laugh doesn't change the situation, however: the fashioning of the signifier and the introduction of a gap or a hole in the real is identical.

I remember that one evening when I was dining at the home of a descendant of one of those royal bankers who welcomed Heinrich Heine to Paris just over a century ago, I astonished him by telling him – he remains astonished up to this day, and is still clearly not ready to get over it – that modern science, the kind that was born with Galileo, could only have developed out of biblical or judaic ideology, and not out of ancient philosophy or the Aristotelian tradition. The increasing power of symbolic mastery has not stopped enlarging its field of operation since Galileo, has not stopped consuming around it any reference that would limit its scope to intuited data; by allowing free rein to the play of signifiers, it has given rise to a science whose laws develop in the direction of an increasingly coherent whole, but without anything being less motivated than what exists at any given point.

[2] Bornibus is the trade name of a well-known French manufacturer of mustard. The pun at the end of this sentence depends on a play of words between Bornibus and "se borner," "to limit oneself."

In other words, the vault of the heavens no longer exists, and all the celestial bodies, which are the best reference point there, appear as if they could just as well not be there. Their reality, as existentialism puts it, is essentially characterized by facticity; they are fundamentally contingent.

It is also worth noting that in the end what is expressed for us in the energy / matter equivalence is that one final day we may find that the whole texture of appearance has been rent apart, starting from the gap we have introduced there; the whole thing might just disappear.

The introduction of this fabricated signifier that is the vase already contains the notion of creation ex nihilo. And the notion of the creation ex nihilo is coextensive with the exact situation of the Thing as such. It is effectively relative to this that through the ages, and especially those ages that are closest to us, those that have formed us, the articulation or the balance of the moral problem is situated.

A passage in the Bible that is marked by a tone of gay optimism tells us that when the Lord completed his famous six-day creation, at the end he contemplated the whole and saw that it was good. You could say the same thing of the potter when he has made his vase – it's good, it's right, it holds together. In other words, it's always fine from the side of the work.

Yet everybody knows what may emerge from a vase or what can be put in one. And it is obvious that the optimism is in no way justified by the way things function in the human world, nor by what is born of its works. Thus it is around the question of the benefit or the cost of a work that the crisis of consciousness has crystallized, which in the West at least was in the balance for centuries and which ended in the period I referred to the other day, when I quoted a classic passage from Luther – a man who long tormented Christian consciousness,[3] to the point of affirming that no merit should be attributed to any work.

[3] This is one of the occasions when the single French word "conscience" implies both "consciousness" and "conscience."

It is by no means a heretical position without validity; there are good grounds for such a position. So as to orient you in the flood of sects that consciously or unconsciously broke away over the question of evil, the simple tripartition which emerges from the example of the vase, as we articulated it, is excellent.

In his troubled search for the source of evil, man finds himself faced with the choice of these three because there are no others.

There is the work, and this is the position of renunciation which other bodies of traditional wisdom than our own have adopted. Every work is of and by itself harmful, and it engenders the consequences that it gives rise to, that is to say, at least as many negative as positive ones. This position is formally expressed in Taoism, for example, to the point where it is barely tolerated for one to use a vase as a spoon – the introduction of the spoon into the world is already the source of a whole flood of dialectical contradictions.

Then there is matter. We find ourselves here faced with those theories that you have, I assume, heard something about, the theories of the sect called the Cathars – a name whose origin is unknown to us.

This is something I need to develop a little.

3

I am not going to give you a lecture on Catharism, but I will mention where you can easily find a good bibliography on the subject in a book that you have no doubt heard of, namely, Love and the Western World by Denis de Rougemont. It's not the best book on the subject, nor the most profound, but it's fun to read.

I reread the whole thing in the revised edition, and on a second reading I disliked it less than I had expected. I even liked it. You will find expressed there in connection with the author's particular theory all kinds of facts which enable us to understand the profound crisis that Cathar ideology, or rather theology, represents in the development of Western man's thought, since it is Western man who is at issue here – although the author does show that the questions involved probably had their origin at the limit of what we usually call the West, a term that I have no particular fondness for, and that one would be wrong to see as the center of my thought.

In any case, at a certain point in the collective life of Europe, the question was asked as to what was wrong with the creation as such. It was asked by people about whom it is very difficult for us to know exactly what they thought, or what at a deeper level the religious and mystical movement we call the Cathar heresy, in effect, represented. One can even say that it is the only example in history in which a temporal power proved to be so efficient that it succeeded in eliminating almost all traces of the trial. Such was the tour de force realized by the holy Catholic church of Rome. We are reduced to seeking documents in out-of-the-way corners and few of them are very satisfying. The Inquisition's trial transcripts have vanished, and all we have are a few indirect testimonies here and there. A Dominican father tells us, for example, that the Cathars were good people, deeply Christian in their way of life and exceptionally pure in their morals.

I'm willing to believe that their morals were of an exceptional purity, since they had basically to desist from any act that might in any way favor the perpetuation of the world, considered as execrable and bad in its essence. The practice of perfection thus consisted essentially in seeking to achieve death in the most advanced state of detachment, which was a sign of reintegration into an Edenic world characterized by purity and light, the true world of the original good Creator, whose creation had been sullied by the intervention of the bad Creator or Demiurge. The latter had introduced that horrible element, generation, as well as corruption, which is to say transformation.

It is from the Aristotelian perspective of the transformation of matter into another matter, which engenders itself, that the perpetuity of matter became the site of evil.

The solution, as you see, is simple. It has a certain coherence, if it doesn't have all the rigor one would like.

One of the rare solid documents that we have on the enterprise, for we do not really know what was the basic doctrine of the Cathars, is a late work, which is, therefore, likely to provoke some doubt. It was discovered in 1939 and was published with the name the Book of Two Principles. It is easy to find under the title Cathar Writings, a fine book edited by René Nelli.

Evil is in matter. But evil can be elsewhere as well. The question remains open. And it is no doubt an indispensable key if one is to understand what happened historically to moral thought on the topic of evil. Evil may be not only in works, not only in execrable matter – from which the whole subsequent ascetic task will consist in turning away, without, however, entering the world we call mystic, and which might just as well be called mythic or indeed illusory – evil may be in the Thing.

It may be in the Thing insofar as it is not the signifier that guides the work or insofar as it is not the matter of the work either, but only insofar as, at the heart of the myth of the creation on which the whole issue depends, it maintains the presence of the human factor. And it should be noted parenthetically that whatever you do – even if you don't give a tinker's cuss for the Creator – it is nevertheless true that you think of the notion of evil and interrogate it in creationist terms. The Thing is, in effect, involved insofar as it is defined by the fact that it defines the human factor – although, as we know, the human factor escapes us.

In this connection the human factor will not be defined otherwise than in the way that I defined the Thing just now, namely, that which in the real suffers from the signifier.

Note the following: Freudian thought directs us to raise the problem of what it is exactly that one finds at the heart of the functioning of the pleasure principle, namely, a beyond of the pleasure principle, and very probably that which the other day I called a fundamentally good or bad will. It is, of course, true that all kinds of traps and temptations present themselves to your thinking, such as the question of whether what we call man – as if it were so easy to define man – is fundamentally good or bad. But it's not a question of that; it is rather a question of the whole. The fact is man fashions this signifier and introduces it into the world – in other words, we need to know what he does when he fashions it in the image of the Thing, whereas the Thing is characterized by the fact that it is impossible for us to imagine it. The problem of sublimation is located on this level.

That is why I have chosen the history of the Minne as a point of departure. I began there because it is of exemplary value, and because the word is unambiguous in German. The Minne is quite distinct from Liebe, whereas in French we only have the word "amour," love.

The problem posed for the author referred to is that of the link that may exist between the highly profound and secret heresy which began to dominate Europe from the end of the eleventh century on – although we don't know how far back things actually went – and the appearance, articulation, establishment, of a whole moral code, of a whole ethic, a whole way of life, that is called courtly love.

I am not forcing things in saying that once one has examined all the historical, social, political, and economic evidence, and applied all the available modes of interpretation of the superstructure, our contemporary historians are unanimous in giving up on the question. Nothing offers a completely satisfying explanation of the success of this extraordinary fashion at a period which was not, believe me, so mild or civilized – on the contrary. Society was just emerging from the first feudal period, which in practice can be summed up as being dominated across a large area of geographical space by the manners of bandits; and then one suddenly finds codes that regulate the relations between man and woman that have all the characteristics of a stupefying paradox.

Given the time, I am not even going to begin my discussion today. You should nevertheless be aware of what I shall be talking about next time. It will have to do with the ambiguous and enigmatic problem of the feminine object.

Don't imagine that it is something exclusive to me; I will not attempt to exercise my feeble powers of investigation on the subject. But the fact is that this object of praise, of service, of devotion, and of all kinds of sentimental, stereotyped behavior on the part of the defender of courtly love relative to the Lady, leads one commentator to say that they all seemed to have been praising the same person. And it is a fact that is calculated to leave us with a question mark. The Romance scholar in question is Mr. André Morin, a Professor in the Department of Literature at the Université de Lille, to whom we also owe a fine anthology of Minnesang published by Aubier.

The creation involved is a function of an object about which we naturally wonder: what was the exact role played by creatures of flesh and blood who were indeed involved in the matter? We have no trouble in naming the ladies and people who were at the center of the spread of this new style of behavior and of existence at the moment when it emerged. We know the first stars of this veritable social epidemic as well as we know Mr. Sartre or Miss de Beauvoir. Eleanor of Aquitaine is not a mythical figure, and nor is her daughter, the Countess of Champagne.

The important point will be to see how certain of the enigmas that historians raise in this connection may be resolved as a function of the doctrine that I am expounding here, the analytical doctrine. To what extent does it allow us to explain the phenomenon as a work of sublimation in its purest sense?

You will see in detail how it was possible to give an object, which in this case is called the Lady, the value of representing the Thing. So as to give you an idea of the path we will follow to the moment when I leave you in February, note that this will allow me to go on and show the subsequent developments of that construction relative to the feminine object, including the problematic character that it still possesses for us today. We will consider it in terms of the analytical structure.

Beyond the February break, my aim is to allow you to calculate at its true worth the originality of the Freudian contribution.

The idea of creation is cosubstantial with your thought. You cannot think, no one can think, except in creationist terms. What you take to be the most familiar model of your thought, namely, evolutionism, is with you, as with all your contemporaries, a form of defense, of clinging to religious ideals, which prevents you from seeing what is happening in the world around you. But it is not because you, like everyone else, whether you know it or not, are caught up in the notion of creation, that the Creator is in a clear position for you.

It is obvious that God is dead. That is something Freud expresses from one end of his myth to the other; since God derives from the fact that the Father is dead, that clearly means we have all noticed that God is dead. And that is why Freud reflects so intensely on the subject. But at the same time, because it was the originary dead Father that God releases, he, too, was dead from the beginning. The question of the Creator in Freud is, therefore, attached nowadays to that which continues to function on that level.

That is the goal of our inquiry this year; the form of the question concerning what the Thing is all about has to be addressed by us. It is something that Freud considers in his psychology of the drive, for the Trieb can in no way be limited to a psychological notion. It is an absolutely fundamental ontological notion, which is a response to a crisis of consciousness that we are not necessarily obliged to identify, since we are living it.

However we live it, in any case, the intention of what I am trying to expound before you is to attempt to make you aware of it.

January 27, 1960

X

Marginal comments

GNOMIC PROPOSITIONS ART, RELIGION, SCIENCE ON THE SUBJECT OF SPITZ
ANAMORPHOSIS AND ARCHITECTURE
THE PRIMACY OF THE ES

I am not this morning in the state of readiness I consider necessary for me to conduct my seminar in the usual manner. And this is especially the case, given the point we have reached, when I particularly want to be able to present you with some very precise formulas. You will thus allow me to put it off until next time.

The break caused by my absence of two weeks comes at a bad time, since I would have liked to go beyond what I announced last time that I would be dealing with – after having dealt with it, of course.

1

Courtly love is, in effect, an exemplary form, a paradigm, of sublimation. We only have essentially the documentary testimony of art, but we still feel today the ethical ramifications.

If on the subject of courtly love, apart from the lively archaeological interest in the matter, we still only have the documentary testimony of art in a form that is almost dead, it is obvious that its ethical ramifications are still felt in the relations between the sexes.

The long-lasting influence of the effects of a phenomenon that one might think is little more than an issue of aesthetics is thus of a kind to make us aware of the importance of sublimation – something that psychoanalysis has specifically foregrounded.

I would like to be at the top of my form in order to show you how the question has been posed historically, and how it is posed from the point of view of method, for I believe that there again we are in a position to throw some light on admitted difficulties that historians, Romance scholars, philologists, and various specialists who have approached the problem have encountered. They apparently recognize that they have in no way managed to reduce the phenomenon of courtly love in its historical emergence to an identifiable form of conditioning.

The recognition of the fact is common, and I would say almost uniform. One encounters a paradoxical phenomenon, one that is almost taken for granted; in every example of this kind scholars have often been led to examine influences – something that in many cases is only a way of displacing the problem. They tell us that the origin of the problem is to be found in the transmission of something that happened somewhere else. Yet we still need to know how that happened somewhere else. But in the event that is precisely what gets lost.

In this case, the recourse to influences is far from having illuminated the problem. We will try to approach the problem at its very center, and we will see that Freudian theory is of a kind to shed a certain light there. Thus in this way I take up the problem not only for its value as example but also for its value relative to method.

To start out from this very specific point doesn't mean that everything that concerns sublimation is to be considered from the perspective developed here, namely, from the point of view of the man / woman relation, of the couple. I do not claim to reduce sublimation to that, nor even to center it on that. I believe on the contrary that to start out from this example is essential in order to arrive at a general formula, whose beginnings we can find in Freud, if we know where to look for it – and I don't mean search for this or that detail.

If I proceed sometimes by emphasizing one of Freud's sentences, an isolated formula, or, I was about to say, some gnomic proposition, then I am very conscious of making that gnomic proposition work for me. When I give you a formula such as "The desire of man is the desire of the Other," it is a gnomic formula, although Freud didn't seek to present it as such. But he does so from time to time without doing it on purpose. Thus I once quoted a very short formula which brought together the respective mechanisms of hysteria, obsessional neurosis and paranoia with three forms of sublimation, art, religion and science. At another point he relates paranoia to scientific discourse. These clues will help us articulate in all its generality the formula in which we will in the end order the function of sublimation with reference to the Thing.

This Thing is accessible in very elementary examples, which are almost of the type of the classic philosophical demonstration, including a blackboard and a piece of chalk. I referred last time to the schematic example of the vase, so as to allow you to grasp where the Thing is situated in the relationship that places man in the mediating function between the real and the signifier. This Thing, all forms of which created by man belong to the sphere of sublimation, this Thing will always be represented by emptiness, precisely because it cannot be represented by anything else – or, more exactly, because it can only be represented by something else. But in every form of sublimation, emptiness is determinative.

I will point out right away three different ways according to which art, religion and the discourse of science turn out to be related to that; I will point this out by means of three formulas that I don't say I will retain at the end, when we have completed our journey together.

All art is characterized by a certain mode of organization around this emptiness. I don't believe that that is a vain formula, in spite of its generality, in guiding those who are interested in explaining the problems of art; and I believe I have the means of illustrating that to you in a variety of striking ways.

Religion in all its forms consists of avoiding this emptiness. We can illustrate that in forcing the note of Freudian analysis for the good reason that Freud emphasized the obsessional traits of religious behavior. Yet although the whole ceremonial phase of the body of religious practices, in effect, enters into this framework, we can hardly be fully satisfied with this formula. A phrase like "respecting this emptiness" perhaps goes further. In any case, the emptiness remains in the center, and that is precisely why sublimation is involved.

As for our third term, the discourse of science, to the extent that it finds its origin in our tradition in the discourse of wisdom or of philosophy, the term Freud uses in connection with paranoia and its relation to psychic reality, the term, Unglauben, finds its full meaning there.

I emphasized this fact in passing in a recent Seminar; Unglauben is not the negation of the phenomenology of Glauben, of belief. Freud never returned to the subject in a comprehensive and definitive way, yet it nevertheless runs throughout his work, and he gives extreme importance to this function in the Entwurf. The phenomenology of belief remained for him an obsession to the end; thus Moses and Monotheism is constructed in its entirety in order to explain the fundamental phenomena of belief.

More profound and more dynamically significant for us is the phenomenon of unbelief. It is not the suppression of belief, but it has to do with man's relationship to the world and to truth that is specific to man, a relationship he inhabits.

In this connection you would be wrong to trust in summary oppositions or to think that history has known sensational turning points, such as the supposed passage from the theocratic age to so-called humanist forms of liberation of the individual and of reality. The conception of the world is not decisive here. On this occasion, it has nothing to do with something resembling a Weltanschauung – and certainly not mine. I am only pointing the way here, I am only trying to help you orientate yourself in the bibliography of significant works on the subject, works by specialist who in their different fields are equipped with some talent for analysis. I advise you to look up the work of an historian, Lucien Fèbvre, who is the author of the widely accessible, The Problem of Unbelief in the Sixteenth Century. It is a work that enables you to see how the thoughtful use of historical methods allows us to pose more precisely the question of the forms of development of thinking on the subject of problems of faith.

If you have the time and you would like to read something amusing, you should read a little book by the same author that is supplementary but not secondary, not a little boat bobbing in the wake of a ship; it is called Concerning the Heptameron. The author of the Heptameron is Marguerite de Navarre, whom, I hope, you will not mix up with Queen Margot, the wife of Henry IV. She is not just a libertine author, but turns out to have written a treatise that is mystical in kind. But that is not something which excites the astonishment of the historian.

He tries to show us what the collections of tales that go under the title of the Heptameron might mean in the context of the time and of the psychology of their author. And he does it in such a way as to allow us to read that work with not so much a more informed eye as an eye that doesn't censure the text or, in particular, the reflections of each of the characters after each of the tales that are supposed to be true, and that certainly are for the most part. The thoughts of the respondents that belong to the register of moral and even formal religious reflection are usually censured because one assumes at the beginning that they are no more than the accompanying sauce. But that is something it is important not to get wrong – in any dish it is the sauce that is the essential ingredient. Lucien Febvre teaches us how to read the Heptameron. Yet if we knew how to read, we wouldn't need him.

As far as unbelief is concerned, it is from our point of view a place in discourse that is to be conceived precisely in relation to the Thing – the Thing is repudiated or foreclosed in the proper sense of Verwerfung.

In the same way that in art there is a Verdrängung, a repression of the Thing, and in religion there is probably a Verschiebung or displacement, it is strictly speaking Verwerfung that is involved in the discourse of science. The discourse of science repudiates the presence of the Thing insofar as from its point of view the ideal of absolute knowledge is glimpsed, that is, something that posits the Thing while it pays no attention to it. As everyone knows, this point of view has historically proved in the end to be a failure.

The discourse of science is determined by this Verwerfung, and, in the light of my formula that what is foreclosed in the symbolic reappears in the real, this is probably why it leads to a situation in which, at the end of physics, it is something as enigmatic as the Thing that is glimpsed.

I will postpone until next time a discussion of my paradigm of courtly love, an example of sublimation in art whose vital effects we still come across. We will take note of them after I come back from my trip; we will take a sampling of these traces, of the indisputable effects of the primary signifying construction that is determinative in the phenomenon of courtly love. And we will attempt to recognize in contemporary phenomena something that can only be explained through recourse to such an origin.

Since I am engaged in marginal commentary today, let me point out in passing that you would be wrong to think that this concept of the Thing to which I am giving a new development this year wasn't, in fact, immanent in our discussions of previous years.

Moreover, since there are those who question certain characteristics of my style, let me remind you for example of the expression "The Freudian Thing" that was the title of something I wrote, and it wouldn't be a bad idea for you to look it up. That text and that title surprised because if one starts to analyze my intentions from a philosophical point of view, one comes to relate them to a concern that was very popular at one time, namely, the resistance to reification. Of course, I never said anything about reification. But intentions can always be wrapped around a discourse. It is clear that if I chose such a title, I did so deliberately. If you reread the text, you will see that I am essentially speaking of the Thing. And I speak about it in a way that was evidently the cause of the undoubted discomfort the text provoked at the time. The fact is I sometimes make the Thing itself speak.

2

I would like now to make sure that today's meeting might be of some use to those who have travelled some distance to get here.

Given the point we have reached in my Seminar, it seems likely that some of you may have questions to ask me or answers to give, so as to suggest the meaning for them of some element or other in my argument.

I know that it is never easy to break the silence in a crowd, to ring one's little bell, so to speak. I will, therefore, give you the opportunity to ask me a written question. The only disadvantage there is that I am free to read it as I see fit.

At the same time we are going to do something unexpected that strikes me as a good idea. Some of you attended the scientific meeting of our Society yesterday. I don't know how it ended because I had to leave after having responded at some length to the lecturers, people for whom I have the greatest affection, and after I had expressed my deep interest in their work. They are here today and I would like to ask Smirnov for some clarification on the subject of Spitz's "No and Yes."[1]

[1] The words in quotation marks here and in the following paragraph are in English in the original.

Why did you not tackle the "Yes"? [Mr. Smirnov's answer.]

Let me explain to those who do not know the text that it is a book belonging to a series of investigations founded on the direct observation of newborn babies or more precisely of infants, that is to say, up to the point of the appearance of articulated language as such. Within this dimension, Spitz claims to find the "No" as a "pattern," as a semantic form in a certain number of gestures and expressions, and primarily in "rooting" – that is to say, in the oscillating gesture of the head that the infant makes in its approach to the breast. The word is very difficult to translate into French, but there is a correlative in the English text in the word "snout," which clearly indicates what is involved.

I am far from being critical of Spitz. I intend rather to defend him. I don't mean he is right, but the work is good and sharply articulated. And I would fault you with failing to have brought out the fact that the phenomenon is analogous to what occurs in traumatic neurosis – it is, he says, the last memory before the emergence of the catastrophic reaction.

I embarrassed you by asking you to comment on Spitz's other works, namely, his fiction on The Primal Cavity or at the very least his references to the screen of the dream.

Spitz doesn't on the whole elaborate on the fact that a form of reaction deriving from an earlier stage may be used in a critical situation. That seems to be a very useful idea, however, something that should always be emphasized. I think you made the point, unless it was Laplanche.

Spitz is reduced to having a mechanism as passive as that of traumatic neurosis intervene. He thus implies some preceding frustration of the infant. He considers the act of "rooting" to be a trace which remains inscribed after something like the refusal or withdrawal of the breast that immediately precedes it. It is surprising that he expresses it in an isolated form, on the basis of a given case, and not in general.

[Statements by Mr. Smirnov and Laplanche; a question from Mr. Audouard: "Why do you speak to us about the Thing instead of simply speaking about mediation?"]

To answer you briefly right away, I note that you have always been attentive to the note of what one might call Hegelian reinterpretations of analytical experience. We are concerned here with the Freudian experience as an ethics, which is to say, at its most essential level, since it directs us towards a therapeutic form of action that, whether we like it or not, is included in the register or in the terms of an ethics. And the more we deny this, the more it is the case. Experience demonstrates this: a form of analysis that boasts of its highly scientific distinctiveness gives rise to normative notions that I characterize by evoking the curse Saint Matthew utters on those who make the bundles heavier when they are to be carried by others. Strengthening the categories of affective normativity produces disturbing results.

It is clear that we put the accent on the irreducible element in the instinct, on that which appears at the limit of a mediation and that reification is unable to encompass. But in encircling that something whose limits we explore, we are encircling the empty image.

The deliberate intention to emphasize this notion has never been absent from what I have said thus far. If you look up the texts I referred you to on this subject, you will see that there is no ambiguity. That Hegelian radicalism that was rashly attributed to me somewhere by a contributor to Les Temps Modernes should in no way be imputed to me. The whole dialectic of desire that I developed here, and that I was beginning at the very moment the rash individual was writing that particular sentence, is sharply distinguished from such Hegelianism. It is even more marked this year. The inevitable character seems to me to be especially marked in the effect of sublimation.

Mr. X: The formula for sublimation that you have given us is to raise the object to the dignity of the Thing. This Thing doesn't exist to start with, because sublimation is going to bring us to it. The question I have is, therefore, isn't this Thing not really a thing, but on the contrary a Non-Thing, and isn't it through sublimation that one comes to see it as being the Thing (. . .)?

What you are saying strikes me as on the right track; it's obvious you follow my presentation of these questions without difficulty. Something is offered to us as analysts, if we follow the sum of our experience and if we know how to evaluate it. You state that the attempt at sublimation tends in the end to realize the Thing or to save it. It's true and it's not true. There's an illusion there.

3

Neither science nor religion is of a kind to save the Thing or to give it to us, because the magic circle that separates us from it is imposed by our relation to the signifier. As I have told you, the Thing is that which in the real suffers from this fundamental, initial relation, which commits man to the ways of the signifier by reason of the fact that he is subjected to what Freud calls the pleasure principle, and which, I hope it is clear in your minds, is nothing else than the dominance of the signifier – I, of course, mean the true pleasure principle as it functions in Freud.

In brief, it is the effect of the influence of the signifier on the psychic real that is involved, and it is for this reason that the activity of sublimation is not purely and simply senseless in all its forms – one responds with whatever is at hand.

I wanted to have here today, so as to be able to show it to you at the end of the Seminar, an object that to be understood, if not to be described, demands a long commentary on the history of art. That one managed to construct such an object and to find pleasure in it requires that we make a significant detour.

I will describe it to you. It is an object that embodies an anamorphosis. I assume that many of you know what that is. It is any kind of construction that is made in such a way that by means of an optical transposition a certain form that wasn't visible at first sight transforms itself into a readable image. The pleasure is found in seeing its emergence from an indecipherable form.

Such a thing is extremely widespread in the history of art. Just go to the Louvre; you will see Holbein's painting of The Ambassadors and at the feet of one of the two men, who is just as well built as you or I, you will see an enigmatic form stretched out on the ground. It looks roughly like fried eggs. If you place yourself at a certain angle from which the painting itself disappears in all its relief by reason of the converging lines of its perspective, you will see a death's head appear, the sign of the classic theme of vanitas. And this is found in a proper painting, a painting commissioned by the ambassadors in England, who must have been very pleased with his work; and what was at the bottom must have amused them a lot, too.

This phenomenon is datable. It was in the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries that things reached this point of heightened interest and even of fascination. In a chapel built by order of the Jesuits in Descartes's time, there existed a whole wall some eighteen meters long that represented a scene from the life of the saints or a nativity scene, and that was completely unreadable from any point in the room, but if one entered by a certain corridor, you can see for a brief moment the extraordinarily dispersed lines come together and perceive the body of the scene.

The anamorphosis I wanted to bring here is much less voluminous. It belongs to the collector I have already referred to. It is formed of a polished cylinder that has the function of a mirror, and around it you put a kind of bib or flat surface on which there are also indecipherable lines. When you stand at a certain angle, you see the image concerned emerge in the cylindrical mirror; in this case it is a beautiful anamorphosis of a painting of the crucifixion copied from Rubens.

This object could never have been produced, never have had a necessary meaning without a whole preceding development. There is behind it the whole history of architecture as well as that of painting, their combination and the history of this combination.

To put it briefly, primitive architecture can be defined as something organized around emptiness. That is also the authentic impression that the forms of a cathedral like Saint Mark's give us, and it is the true meaning of all architecture. Then subsequently, for economic reasons, one is satisfied with painting images of that architecture, one learns to paint architecture on the walls of architecture; and painting, too, is first of all something that is organized around emptiness. Since it is a matter of finding once more the sacred emptiness of architecture in the less marked medium of painting, the attempt is made to create something that resembles it more and more closely, that is to say, perspective is discovered.

The following stage is paradoxical and quite amusing; it shows how one strangles oneself with one's own knots.

From the moment when perspective was discovered in painting, a form of architecture appears that adopts the perspectivism of painting. Palladio's art, for example, makes this very obvious. Go and see Palladio's theater in Vicenze, a little masterpiece of its kind that is in any case instructive and exemplary. Neoclassical architecture submits itself to the laws of perspective, plays with them, and makes them its own. That is, it places them inside of something that was done in painting in order to find once again the emptiness of primitive architecture.

From that point on one is entangled in a knot which seems to flee increasingly from the meaning of this emptiness. And I believe that the Baroque return to the play of forms, to all manner of devices, including anamorphosis, is an effort to restore the true meaning of artistic inquiry; artists use the discovery of the property of lines to make something emerge that is precisely there where one has lost one's bearings or, strictly speaking, nowhere.

Rubens' painting that suddenly appears in the place of the unintelligible image reveals what is at issue here. At issue, in an analogical or anamorphic form, is the effort to point once again to the fact that what we seek in the illusion is something in which the illusion as such in some way transcends itself, destroys itself, by demonstrating that it is only there as a signifier.

And it is this which lends primacy to the domain of language above all, since with language we only ever have to do with the signifier in all cases. That is why in raising the problems of the relationship of art to sublimation, I will begin with courtly love. One finds there texts which show in an exemplary way its conventional side, in the sense that language always involves artifice relative to anything intuitive, material or lived.

This phenomenon is all the more striking since we see it develop at a period of uninhibited fucking. I mean that they didn't attempt to hide it, didn't mince their words.

The coexistence of two styles on the subject is the remarkable thing.

You introduce the idea of the Thing and the Non-Thing. It is, if you like, true that the Thing is also the Non-Thing. In reality, the Non- as such is certainly not individualized in a significant way. Exactly the same problem is posed by the Freudian notion of Todestrieb, whereas Freud tells us at the same time that there is no negation in the unconscious.

We don't make a philosophy out of it. I remind you of the notion that I modified the other day, so as not to give the impression that I don't accept my responsibilities: when I talk about the Thing, I am certainly talking about something. But I am, of course, talking operationally, with reference to the place that it occupies in a certain logical stage of our thought and of our conceptualization, with reference to its function in what concerns us.

Yesterday evening I referred to and denounced the substitution for Freud's whole classic topology of the term "ego" – something that is particularly regrettable in someone as deeply immersed in analytical thought as Spitz.

It is indeed difficult to recognize in that concept the essential function with which analytical experience began, that was its shock value as well as its echo and suite. Let us not forget that Freud, in effect, immediately countered it with the invention of the term das Es. That primacy of the Es is now completely forgotten.

To some extent, the Es is not sufficiently emphasized by the way it is presented in the texts of the second topic. It is to remind us of the primordial and primary character of this intuition in our experience at the level of ethics that this year I am calling a certain zone of reference "the Thing."

Mr. Laplanche: I would like to ask a further question on the relationship of the pleasure principle to the play of the signifier.

This relationship is founded on the fact that the pleasure principle basically involves the sphere of investment, Besetzung, and its Bahnungen, and it is facilitated by the Vorstellungen and even more by what Freud calls the Vorstellungsrepräsentanzen – a term that appears very early, before the article on the Unconscious. Each time a state of need arises, the pleasure principle tends to provoke a reinvestment in its content – in inverted commas, that is, since at this metapsychological level clinical practice is not involved – an hallucinated reinvestment of what had previously been a satisfying hallucination.

The diffuse energy of the pleasure principle tends toward this reinvestment of representation. The intervention of the reality principle can only therefore be a radical one; it is never a second stage. Naturally, there is no adaptation to reality that doesn't involve a phenomenon of tasting, of sampling, by means of which the subject manages to monitor, one might almost say with his tongue, that which enables him to be sure that he isn't dreaming.

This is what constitutes the originality of Freud's thought and no one, moreover, has been mistaken about that. It is both paradoxical and provocative. Before Freud no one has ever dared articulate the functioning of the psychic apparatus in that way. He describes it on the basis of his experience of the irreducible element he saw emerge at the core of hysterical substitutions; the first thing that poor, defenseless man can do when he is tortured by need is to begin to hallucinate his satisfaction, and after that he can only monitor the situation. Fortunately, he more or less makes at the same time the gestures required to attach himself to the zone in which this hallucination coincides with the real in an approximative form.

If the basic texts are to be respected, that's the miserable beginning from which the whole dialectic of experience is articulated in Freudian terms. That's what I told you when I discussed the relationship between the pleasure principle and the signifier.

Thus the Vorstellungen have right from the beginning the character of a signifying structure.

February 3, 1960

XI

Courtly love as anamorphosis

ON THE HISTORY AND ENDS OF ART
THE SUBLIMATION OF THE FATHER
ON THE SUBJECT OF BERNFELD
THE VACUOLE AND THE INHUMAN PARTNER NEGOTIATING THE DETOUR

Why is this example of anamorphosis on this table?[1] It is here to illustrate my ideas.

Last Time I sketched out the meaning or the goal of art in the usual sense we give that term – the fine arts, for example. I'm not the only psychoanalyst to have been interested in that. I've already mentioned Ella Sharpe's article on the subject of sublimation, an article that starts out with the cave walls of Altamira, which is the earliest decorated cave to have been discovered. Perhaps what we described as the central place, as the intimate exteriority or "extimacy," that is the Thing, will help us to shed light on the question or mystery that remains for those who are interested in prehistoric art, namely, its site as such.

1

It is surprising that an underground cavern was chosen. Such a site only creates obstacles to the viewing that one assumes is presupposed by the creation and observation of the striking images which decorate the walls. The production of images and their viewing could not have been easy given the forms of lighting available to primitive men. Yet in the beginning those paintings that we take to be the earliest productions of primitive art were thrown up on the walls of a cavern.

One could call them tests in both senses of the word, subjective and objective. Tests no doubt for the artist, for, as you know, these images are often painted over each other; it's as if in a consecrated spot it represented, for each subject capable of undertaking such an exercise, the opportunity to draw or project afresh what he needed to bear witness to, and to do so moreover over what had already been done before. That suggests the idea of something like the updating of a certain creative potential. Tests also in the objective sense, for these images cannot fail to seize us as being deeply linked both in a tight relationship to the world – and by that I mean to the very subsistence of populations that seem to have been composed chiefly of hunters – and to something that in its subsistence appears as possessing the character of a beyond of the sacred – something that we are precisely trying to identify in its most general form by the term, the Thing. I would say it is primitive subsistence viewed from the perspective of the Thing.

[1] For a description of an anamorphosis in the form of an object, see page 135.

There is a line which runs from that point to the other end, infinitely closer to us, in the exercise of anamorphosis, probably around the beginning of the seventeenth century. And I pointed out the interest that exercises of this kind had for the constructive thought of artists. I tried to make you understand briefly how the genesis of this tradition might be sketched.

In the same way that the exercise on the wall consists in fixing the invisible inhabitant of the cavern, we see the link forged between the temple, as a construction around emptiness that designates the place of the Thing, to the figuration of emptiness on the walls of this emptiness itself – to the extent that painting progressively learns to master this emptiness, to take such a tight hold of it that painting becomes dedicated to fixing it in the form of the illusion of space.

I am moving fast and I just throw out these crumbs so that you can put them to the test of whatever you may subsequently read on the subject.

Before the systematic establishment of geometrical laws of perspective formulated at the end of the fifteenth and the beginning of the sixteenth centuries, painting passed through a stage in which various artifices made it possible to structure space. The double band that appears in the sixth and seventh centuries on the walls of Santa Maria Maggiore is one way of treating certain stereognoses. But let's leave that aside. The important thing is that at a given moment one arrives at illusion. Around it one finds a sensitive spot, a lesion, a locus of pain, a point of reversal of the whole of history, insofar as it is the history of art and insofar as we are implicated in it; that point concerns the notion that the illusion of space is different from the creation of emptiness. It is this that the appearance of anamorphoses at the end of sixteenth and the beginning of the seventeenth centuries represents.

I spoke last time of a Jesuit convent; it was a mistake. I checked in Baltrusaïtis's excellent dictionary of anamorphoses, and it is a convent of the Minim Friars in Rome as well as in Paris. I don't know why I also placed Holbein's Ambassadors in the Louvre, when the painting is in the National Gallery in London. You will find in Baltrusaïtis's book a subtle study of that painting and of the skull that emerges when, having passed in front of it, you leave the room by a door located so that you see it in its sinister truth, at the very moment when you turn around to look at it for the last time.

Thus, as I say, the interest of anamorphosis is described as a turning point when the artist completely reverses the use of that illusion of space, when he forces it to enter into the original goal, that is to transform it into the support of the hidden reality – it being understood that, to a certain extent, a work of art always involves encircling the Thing.

This also allows us to approach a little closer to the unanswered question on the ends of art: is the end of art imitation or non-imitation? Does art imitate what it represents? If you begin by posing the question in those terms, you are already caught in the trap, and there is no way out of remaining in the impasse in which we find ourselves between figurative and so-called abstract art.

We can only sense the aberration that is articulated in the unyielding position of the philosopher; Plato places art at the lowest level among human works, since for him everything that exists only exists in relation to the idea, which is the real. Everything that exists is already no more than an imitation of a more-than-real, of a surreal. If art imitates, it is shadow of a shadow, imitation of an imitation. You can, therefore, see the vanity of the work of art, of the work of the brush.

That's a trap one must not enter. Of course, works of art imitate the objects they represent, but their end is certainly not to represent them. In offering the imitation of an object, they make something different out of that object. Thus they only pretend to imitate. The object is established in a certain relationship to the Thing and is intended to encircle and to render both present and absent.

Everybody knows this. At the moment when painting turns once again upon itself, at the moment when Cézanne paints his apples, it is clear that in painting those apples, he is doing something very different from imitating apples – even though his final manner of imitating them, which is the most striking, is primarily oriented toward a technique of presenting the object. But the more the object is presented in the imitation, the more it opens up the dimension in which illusion is destroyed and aims at something else. Everyone knows that there is a mystery in the way Cézanne paints apples, for the relationship to the real as it is renewed in art at that moment makes the object appear purified; it involves a renewal of its dignity by means of which these imaginary insertions are, one might say, repetitively restated. The fact is, as has been noted, such insertions cannot be detached from the efforts of earlier artists to realize the ends of art in their own way.

Obviously, the notion of historicity should not be used here without great caution. The expression "history of art" is highly misleading. Every appearance of this way of proceeding consists in overthrowing the illusory operation so as to return to the original end, which is to project a reality that is not that of the object represented. In the history of art, on the other hand, by virtue of the necessity that supports it, there is only substructure. The relation of the artist to the time in which he appears is always a contradictory one. It is against the current, in opposition to reigning norms – including, for example, political norms, or indeed, systems of thought – that art attempts to operate its miracle once more.

With the anamorphosis I have here, we find ourselves faced with a game that may seem futile to you, when you think of the sophisticated operational techniques required for the success of such a little artifact. And yet how can one not be touched or even moved when faced with this thing in which the image takes a rising and descending form? When faced with this sort of syringe which, if I really let myself go, would seem to me to be a kind of apparatus for taking a blood sample, a blood sample of the Grail? But don't forget that the blood of the Grail is precisely what is lacking.

The argument I have been developing thus far in my lecture should be interpreted only in a metaphorical way. I have only been following this line of argument because I want to discuss today that form of sublimation which appeared at a certain moment in the history of poetry, and which interests us in an exemplary way in connection with something that Freudian thought has placed at the center of our interest in the economy of the psyche, namely, Eros and eroticism.

I just wanted to point it out to you at the beginning: you might almost structure around this anamorphosis the ideas I am sketching out for you on the subject of the ethics of psychoanalysis. It is something that is wholly founded on the forbidden reference that Freud encountered at the terminal point of what in his thought one might call the Oedipus myth.

2

It is remarkable that the experience of what goes on in the neurotic caused Freud to leap to the level of the poetic creation of art, to the drama of Oedipus, insofar as it is something datable in the history of culture. You will see this when we take up Moses and Monotheism, which I asked you to read during our break. There is in Freud no distance from the facts of the Judeo-Greek experience, and I mean by that those that characterize our culture in its most modern everyday life.

It is equally striking that Freud couldn't fail to pursue his reflection on the origins of morality to the point of examining Moses' action. When you read the astonishing work that is Moses and Monotheism, you will see that Freud cannot help revealing the duplicity of his reference, of the reference that I have declared to you over the years to be the essential reference, namely, the No / Name-of-the-Father in its signifying function.

From a formal point of view, Freud makes recourse to paternal power for a structuring purpose that appears to be a sublimation. He emphasizes, in the same text in which he leaves at a distance the primordial trauma of the murder of the father – and without worrying about the contradiction – that this sublimation emerges at a given historical date against the background of a visible, evident fear that she who engenders is the mother. There is, he tells us, genuine progress in spirituality in affirming the function of the father, namely, of him of whom one is never sure. This recognition implies a whole mental elaboration. To introduce as primordial the function of the father represents a sublimation. But, Freud asks, how can one conceive of this leap, this progress, since, in order to introduce it, it was necessary that something appear that imposes its authority and its reality from outside?

He himself underlines the impasse constituted by the fact that sublimation exists, but that such sublimation can only be motivated historically by means of the myth to which it has recourse. At that point the function of myth becomes evident. In truth, this myth is nothing other than something that is inscribed in the clearest of terms in the spiritual reality of our time, namely, the death of God. It is as a function of the death of God that the murder of the father which represents it in the most direct way is introduced by Freud as a modern myth.

It is a myth that has all the properties of a myth. That is to say that it doesn't explain anything, anymore than any other myth. As I pointed out in citing Lévi-Strauss and especially in referring to that which buttresses his own formulation of the issue, myth is always a signifying system or scheme, if you like, which is articulated so as to support the antimonies of certain psychic relations. And this occurs at a level which is not simply that of individual anguish and which is not exhausted either in a construction presupposing the collectivity, but which assumes its fullest possible dimension.

We suppose that it concerns the individual and also the collectivity, but there is no such opposition between them at the level involved. For it is a matter here of the subject insofar as he suffers from the signifier. It is in this passion of the signifier that the critical point emerges, and its anguish is no more than an intermittent emotion that plays the role of an occasional signal.

Freud brought to the question of the source of morality the invaluable significance implied in the phrase Civilization and Its Discontents or, in other words, the breakdown by means of which a certain psychic function, the superego, seems to find in itself its own exacerbation, as the result of a kind of malfunctioning of the brakes which should limit its proper authority. It remains to be seen how within this breakdown in the depths of the psychic life the instincts may find their proper sublimation.

But to begin with, what is the possibility we call sublimation? Given the time at our disposal, I am not in a position to take you through the virtually absurd difficulties that authors have encountered every time they have tried to give a meaning to the term "sublimation." I would nevertheless like one of you to go to the Bibliothèque Nationale, look up Bernfeld's article in volume VIII of Imago entitled "Bemerkungen über Sublimierung," ["Observations on Sublimation"], and give us a summary of it here.

Bernfeld was a particularly powerful mind of the second generation, and in the end the weaknesses of his articulation of the problem of sublimation are of a kind that will prove illuminating. He is first of all quite troubled by Freud's reference to the fact that the operations of sublimation are always ethically, culturally, and socially valorized. This criterion, external to psychoanalysis, certainly creates a difficulty, and on account of its extra-psychological character clearly merits to be emphasized and criticized. But as we will see, this character causes less difficulty than at first appears.

On the other hand, the contradiction between the Zielablenkung side of the Strebung, of the Trieb or drive, and the fact that that takes place in a domain which is that of the object libido, also poses all kinds of problems for Bernfeld – problems that he resolves with the extreme clumsiness which characterizes everything that has so far been said on the analysis of sublimation.

According to him, at the point he reached around 1923–1924, we must start from the part of the instinct that may be employed for the ends of the ego, for the Ichziele, in order to define sublimation. And he goes on to give examples whose naiveté is striking. He refers to a certain little Robert Walter, who like many children tries his hand at poetry even before puberty. And what does he tell us on the subject? That to be a poet is an Ichziel for the boy. It is in relation to that choice fixed very early that everything that follows will be judged, namely, the way in which at the onset of puberty the upheaval of his libidinal economy, which is clinically perceptible although quite confused in this case, will be seen to be gradually integrated into the Ichziel. In particular, his activity as a little poet and his fantasms, which were quite separate at the beginning, come to be progressively coordinated.

Bernfeld thus assumes the primordial, primitive character of the goal set by the child to become a poet. And a similar argument is to be found in the other, equally instructive examples he gives us – some of which concern the function of the Verneinungen, of the negations that occur spontaneously among groups of children. He was, in effect, very interested in this question in a publication devoted to the problems of youth for which he was responsible at the time.

The important point to note on the subject is the following, and it is something that is to be found in all formulations of the problem, including Freud's. Freud points out that once the artist has carried out an operation on the level of sublimation, he finds himself to be the beneficiary of his operation insofar as it is acclaimed after the fact; it brings in its wake in the form of glory, honor, and even money, those fantasmic satisfactions that were at the origin of the instinct, with the result that the latter finds itself satisfied by means of sublimation.

That is all well and good as long as we assume that the already established function of poet exists on the outside. It seems to be taken for granted that especially among those whom Bernfeld calls eminent men, a little child might choose to become a poet as an ego goal. It is true that he hastens to add parenthetically that, in using the expression "hervorragender Mensch," eminent man, he is divesting it as much as possible of all connotations of value – something that is very strange as soon as one starts to talk of eminence. To be frank, the dimension of the eminent personality cannot be eliminated. And we see that, in fact, in Moses and Monotheism it isn't eliminated by Freud, but thrust into the foreground.

What needs to be justified is not simply the secondary benefits that individuals might derive from their works, but the originary possibility of a function like the poetic function in the form of a structure within a social consensus.

Well now, it is precisely that kind of consensus we see born at a certain historical moment around the ideal of courtly love. For a certain highly restricted circle, that ideal is to be found at the origin of a moral code, including a whole series of modes of behavior, of loyalties, measures, services, and exemplary forms of conduct. And if that interests us so directly, it is because its central point was an eroties.

3

What interests us here very probably emerged in the middle or at the beginning of the eleventh century, and continued into the twelfth or even, in Germany, to the beginning of the thirteenth. The phenomenon in question is courtly love, its poets and singers, who were known as "troubadours" in the South, as "trouvères" in the North of France, and as "Minnesänger" in the Germanic realm – England and parts of Spain were only involved at second hand. These games were linked to a very precise poetic craft and emerged at that moment, only to be eclipsed subsequently to the point where the following centuries only retained a somewhat dim memory of them.

At the high point, which stretches from the beginning of the eleventh century to the first third of the thirteenth, the very special technique of these courtly love poets played a highly important role. It is difficult for us today to evaluate precisely the importance of that role, but certain circles – in the courtly love sense, court circles, aristocratic circles – that occupied an elevated position in society were certainly influenced markedly.

The question as to whether there were, in fact, formal lessons in love has been raised. The way in which Michel de Nostre-Dame, otherwise known as Nostradamus, represents at the beginning of the fifteenth century the way in which juridical power was exercised by the Ladies – whose extravagant Languedocian names he cites – cannot fail to excite a thrill in us at its strangeness. This is something that was faithfully reproduced by Stendhal in On Love, an admirable work on the subject, and one that is very close to the interest displayed by the romantics in the resurgence of the poetry of courtly love, which was called Provençal at the time, but which was, properly speaking, from the region of Toulouse or indeed from the Limousin.

The existence and operations of these tribunals devoted to the casuistry of love and evoked by Michel de Nostre-Dame are open to debate and often debated. Nevertheless, we do have certain texts, including especially the work by Andreas Capellanus that Rénouart discovered and published in 1917. The shortened title is De Arte Amandi, which thus makes it a homonym of Ovid's treatise – a work that was passed down to posterity by the clergy.

This fourteenth-century manuscript that Rénouart discovered in the Bibliothèque Nationale gives us the text of judgments handed down by Ladies, who are well-known historical figures and include Eleanor of Aquitaine. She was successively – and this "successively" involved a great degree of personal involvement in the unfolding drama – the wife of Louis VII the Younger and Henry Plantagenet, whom she married when he was Duke of Normandy and who subsequently became King of England, with all that that involved relative to claims made on French territory. Then there was her daughter, who married a certain Henry I, Count of Champagne, and still others who were historical figures. In Capellanus's work they are all said to have participated in tribunals devoted to the casuistry of love, and such tribunals all presuppose perfectly coded points of reference that are by no means vague, but imply ideals to be pursued, of which I will give you some examples.

It doesn't matter whether we take them from the Southern French domain or the German domain except as far as the signifier is concerned, which in the former case is the "langue d'oc" and in the latter the German language – this is after all a poetry written in the vernacular. Except for the signifier, then, the terms overlap, repeat each other; both involve the same system. They are organized around diverse themes, the first of which is mourning, and even mourning unto death.

As one of those put it who at the beginning of the nineteenth century in Germany formulated its characteristics, the point of departure of courtly love is its quality as a scholastics of unhappy love. Certain terms define the register according to which the Lady's values are attained – a register indicated by the norms which regulate the exchanges between the partners of the strange rite, namely, reward, clemency, grace or Gnade, felicity. So as to imagine the extremely rarified and complex organization concerned, think of the seventeenth-century Map of Love (Carte du Tendre), although what one finds there is a far more pallid version; the précieuses, too, at another historical moment placed the emphasis on a certain social art of conversation.

With courtly love things are all the more surprising because they emerge at a time when the historical circumstances are such that nothing seems to point to what might be called the advancement of women or indeed their emancipation. To give you an idea of the situation, I would just refer to the story of the Countess of Comminges, the daughter of a certain William of Montpellier, that took place at the time of the full flowering of courtly love.

There was a certain Peter of Aragon, who was King of Aragon and was ambitious to extend his power north of the Pyrenees in spite of the obstacle raised at the time by the first historical campaign of the north against the south, namely, in the form of the Albigensian crusade and Simon de Montfort's victories over the Counts of Toulouse. By reason of the fact that the lady in question was the natural heir upon the death of her father of the county of Montpellier, Peter of Aragon wanted her. She was, however, already married, and seems to have been someone who was not cut out to involve herself in sordid intrigues. She was of a highly reserved personality, not far from sainthood in the religious sense of the word, since it was at Rome that she ended her days with a reputation for saintliness. Political intrigue and the pressure of the noble Lord Peter of Aragon forced her to leave her husband. Papal intervention obliged the latter to take her back, but on her father's death, everything happened in accordance with the will of the powerful Lord. She was repudiated by her husband, who was used to such things, and she married Peter of Aragon, who proceeded to mistreat her to such a degree that she fled. And that is why she finished her days in Rome under the protection of the Pope, who turned out to be on occasion the only protector of persecuted innocence.

The style of this story simply shows the effective position of woman in feudal society. She is, strictly speaking, what is indicated by the elementary structures of kinship, i.e., nothing more than a correlative of the functions of social exchange, the support of a certain number of goods and of symbols of power. She is essentially identified with a social function that leaves no room for her person or her own liberty, except with reference to her religious rights.

It is in this context that the very curious function of the poet of courtly love starts to be exercised. It is important to recall his social situation, which is of a kind to throw a little light on the fundamental idea or graphic style that Freudian ideology can give to a fashion whose function the artist manages in a way to delay.

Satisfactions of power are involved, Freud tells us. That is why it is all the more remarkable to emphasize that in the whole collection of Minnesange, there are numerous poets who occupy positions that are not inferior to those of emperor, king, or prince. There are, in fact, 126 Minnesange in the Manes manuscript collection, which was in the Bibliothèque Nationale in Paris at the beginning of the nineteenth century, and which Heinrich Heine used to go and pay homage to, as if to the very beginnings of German poetry. But after 1888, as the result of negotiations I know nothing about, but that were certainly justified, it was given back to the Germans and is now in Heidelberg.

The first of the troubadours was a certain Guillaume de Poitiers, the seventh Count of Poitiers and ninth Duke of Aquitaine. Before he devoted himself to his early poetic activities in the sphere of courtly love poetry, he appears to have been a formidable brigand of the kind that, goodness knows, every right-minded feudal nobleman of the period seems readily to have been. In a number of historical situations that I won't go into, he can be seen to have behaved in conformity with the norms of the most barbarous practice of ransom. That was the kind of service one could expect from him. Then, from a particular moment on, he became the poet of that singular form of love.

I urge you right away to read those specialized works that contain a thematic analysis of the veritable love ritual which was involved. The question is, How should we situate it as analysts?

I will just mention in passing a book that is somewhat depressing in the way it solves problems by neatly avoiding them, although it is full of material and quotations, namely, The Joy of Love by Pierre Perdu, which was published by Plon. Another work of a very different type, since it deals less with courtly love than its historical relations, is also worth reading, and that is the nice little collection of Benjamin Perret, which, without explaining very well what it's about, he has called The Anthology of Sublime Love. Then there is René Nelli's book, published by Hachette, Love and the Myths of the Heart, in which I find a certain philogenic moralism along with a lot of facts. And finally you have Henry Corbin's The Creative Imagination from Flammarion; however, it goes much further than the limited domain that interests us today.

I am not going to expatiate on the obvious themes of this poetry, both for lack of time and because you will find them in the examples in which I will show what might be called their conventional origin. On this subject all the historians agree: courtly love was, in brief, a poetic exercise, a way of playing with a number of conventional, idealizing themes, which couldn't have any real concrete equivalent. Nevertheless, these ideals, first among which is that of the Lady, are to be found in subsequent periods, down to our own. The influence of these ideals is a highly concrete one in the organization of contemporary man's sentimental attachments, and it continues its forward march.

Moreover, march is the right word because it finds its point of origin in a certain systematic and deliberate use of the signifier as such.

A great deal of effort has been expanded to demonstrate the relationship between this apparatus or organization of the forms of courtly love and an intuition that is religious in origin, mystical for example, and that is supposed to be located somewhere in the center that is sought, in the Thing, which comes to be exalted in the style of courtly love. Experience has shown that this whole effort is condemned to failure.

On the level of the economy of the reference of the subject to the love object, there are certain apparent relationships between courtly love and foreign mystical experiences, Hindu or Tibetan, for example. As everyone knows, Denis de Rougemont made a great deal of this, and that is why I told you to read Henry Corbin's book. There are nevertheless serious difficulties and even critical impossibilities involved, if only because of dates. The themes in question among certain Moslem poets from the Iberian peninsula, for example, appear after Guillaume de Poitier's poetry.

Of interest to us from a structural point of view is the fact that an activity of poetic creation was able to exercise a determining influence on manners at a time – and subsequently in its historical consequences – when the origin and the key concepts of the whole business had been forgotten. But we can only judge the function of this sublimated creation in features of the structure.

The object involved, the feminine object, is introduced oddly enough through the door of privation or of inaccessibility. Whatever the social position of him who functions in the role, the inaccessibility of the object is posited as a point of departure. Some of those involved were, in fact, servants, sirvens, at their place of birth; Bernard de Ventadour was, for example, the son of a servant at Ventadour castle, who was also a troubadour.

It is impossible to serenade one's Lady in her poetic role in the absence of the given that she is surrounded and isolated by a barrier.

Furthermore, that object or Domnei, as she is called – she is also frequently referred to with the masculine term, Mi Dom, or my Lord – this Lady is presented with depersonalized characteristics. As a result, writers have noted that all the poets seem to be addressing the same person.

The fact that on occasion her body is described as g'ra delgat e gen – that means that plumpness was part of the sex appeal of the period, e gen signifying graceful – should not deceive you, since she is always described in that way. In this poetic field the feminine object is emptied of all real substance. That is what made it easy subsequently for a metaphysical poet such as Dante, for example, to choose a person whom we definitely know existed – namely, little Beatrice whom he fell for when she was nine years old, and who stayed at the center of his poetry from the Vita Nuova to The Divine Comedy – and to make her the equivalent of philosophy or indeed, in the end, of the science of the sacred. That also enabled him to appeal to her in terms that are all the more sensual because the person in question is close to allegory. It is only when the person involved is transformed into a symbolic function that one is able to speak of her in the crudest terms.

Here we see functioning in the pure state the authority of that place the instinct aims for in sublimation. That is to say, that what man demands, what he cannot help but demand, is to be deprived of something real. And one of you, in explaining to me what I am trying to show in das Ding, referred to it neatly as the vacuole.

I don't reject the word, although its charm derives from the virtual reference to histology. Something of that order is, in effect, involved, if we indulge in that most risqué of reveries associated with contemporary speculation that speaks of communication in connection with transmission inside organic structures – transmission that functions pseudopodically. Of course, there is no communication as such. But if in a monocellular organism such communication were organized schematically around the vacuole, and concerned the function of the vacuole as such, we could, in fact, have a schematic form of what concerns us in the representation.

Where, in effect, is the vacuole created for us? It is at the center of the signifiers – insofar as that final demand to be deprived of something real is essentially linked to the primary symbolization which is wholly contained in the signification of the gift of love.

In this connection I was struck by the fact that, in the terminology of courtly love, the word domnei is used. The corresponding verb is domnoyer, which means something like "to caress," "to play around." Domnei, in spite of the fact that its first syllable in French is an echo of the word "don," gift, is, in fact, unrelated to it. It is related instead to the Domna, the Lady, or in other words, to her who on occasion dominates.

That has its amusing side. And one should perhaps explore historically the quantity of metaphors that exist around the term "donner," to give, in courtly love. Can "donner" be situated in the relationship between the partners as something that is predominantly on one side or the other? It has perhaps no other cause than the semantic confusion produced in connection with the term domnei and the use of the word domnoyer.

The poetry of courtly love, in effect, tends to locate in the place of the Thing certain discontents of the culture. And it does so at a time when the historical circumstances bear witness to a disparity between the especially harsh conditions of reality and certain fundamental demands. By means of a form of sublimation specific to art, poetic creation consists in positing an object I can only describe as terrifying, an inhuman partner.

The Lady is never characterized for any of her real, concrete virtues, for her wisdom, her prudence, or even her competence. If she is described as wise, it is not because she embodies an immaterial wisdom or because she represents its functions more than she exercises them. On the contrary, she is as arbitrary as possible in the tests she imposes on her servant.

The Lady is basically what was later to be called, with a childish echo of the original ideology, "cruel as the tigers of Ircania." But you will not find the extreme arbitrariness of the attitude expressed any better than among the authors of the period themselves, Chrétien de Troyes, for example.

4

Having brought out the artifices embodied in the construction of courtly love and before proceeding to show you to what extent these artifices have proved to be so durable, thus complicating still the relations between men and the service of women, I would like to say one other thing. The object in front of us, our anamorphosis, will also enable us to be precise about something that remains a little vague in the perspective adopted, namely, the narcissistic function.

You are aware that the mirror function, which I thought it necessary to present as exemplary of the imaginary structure, is defined in the narcissistic relation. And the element of idealizing exaltation that is expressly sought out in the ideology of courtly love has certainly been demonstrated; it is fundamentally narcissistic in character. Well now, the little image represented for us by this anamorphosis permits me to show you which mirror function is involved.

It is only by chance that beyond the mirror in question the subject's ideal is projected. The mirror may on occasion imply the mechanisms of narcissism, and especially the diminution of destruction or aggression that we will encounter subsequently. But it also fulfills another role, a role as limit. It is that which cannot be crossed. And the only organization in which it participates is that of the inaccessibilty of the object. But it's not the only thing to participate in that.

There is a whole series of motifs, which constitute the presuppositions or organic givens of courtly love. There is, for example, the fact that the object is not simply inaccessible, but is also separated from him who longs to reach it by all kind of evil powers, one of the names for which, in the charming Provençal language, is lauzengiers. The latter are the jealous rivals, but also the slanderers.

Another essential theme is that of the secret. It embodies a certain number of misapprehensions, among which is the idea that the object is never given except through an intermediary called the Senhal. It is something also found in Arab poetry in connection with similar themes, where the same curious rite always strikes commentators, since the forms are sometimes highly significant. In particular, at a certain point in his poems, the extraordinary Guillaume de Poitiers calls the object of his aspirations Bon vezi, which means "Good neighbor." As a result of which, historians have abandoned themselves to all kinds of conjectures and have been unable to come up with anything better than the name of a Lady who, it is known, played an important role in his personal history, a forward woman apparently, whose estates were close to Guillaume's.

What is for us much more important than the reference to the neighbor, who is supposedly the Lady whom Guillaume de Poitiers occasionally played naughty games with, is the relationship between the expression just referred to and the one Freud uses in connection with the first establishment of the Thing, with its psychological genesis, namely, the Nebenmensch. And he designated thereby the very place that from the point of view of the development of Christianity, was to be occupied by the apotheosis of the neighbor.

In brief, I wanted to make you realize today, first, that it is an artificial and cunning organization of the signifier that lays down at a given moment the lines of a certain asceticism, and, second, the meaning we must attribute to the negotiation of the detour in the psychic economy.

The detour in the psyche isn't always designed to regulate the commerce between whatever is organized in the domain of the pleasure principle and whatever presents itself as the structure of reality. There are also detours and obstacles which are organized so as to make the domain of the vacuole stand out as such. What gets to be projected as such is a certain transgression of desire.

And it is here that the ethical function of eroticism enters into play. Freudianism is in brief nothing but a perpetual allusion to the fecundity of eroticism in ethics, but it doesn't formulate it as such. The techniques involved in courtly love – and they are precise enough to allow us to perceive what might on occasion become fact, what is properly speaking of the sexual order in the inspiration of this eroticism – are techniques of holding back, of suspension, of amor interruptus. The stages courtly love lays down previous to what is mysteriously referred to as le don de merci, "the gift of mercy" – although we don't know exactly what it meant – are expressed more or less in terms that Freud uses in his Three Essays as belonging to the sphere of foreplay.

Now from the point of view of the pleasure principle, the paradox of what might be called the effect of Vorlust, of foreplay, is precisely that it persists in opposition to the purposes of the pleasure principle. It is only insofar as the pleasure of desiring, or, more precisely, the pleasure of experiencing unpleasure, is sustained that we can speak of the sexual valorization of the preliminary stages of the act of love.

Yet we can never tell if this act or fusion is a matter of mystical union, of distant acknowledgment of the Other or of anything else. In many cases, it seems that a function like that of a blessing or salutation is for the courtly lover the supreme gift, the sign of the Other as such, and nothing more. This phenomenon has been the object of speculation that has even gone as far as identifying this blessing with that which in the consolamentum orders the relations between the highest ranks of initiates among the Cathars. In any case, before reaching that point, the stages of the erotic technique are carefully distinguished and articulated; they go from drinking, speaking, touching, which is in part identified with what are known as services, to kissing, and the osculum, which is the final stage before that of the union in merci.

All that has come down to us in such an enigmatic form that, in order to explain it, the attempt has been made to relate it to Hindu or even Tibetan erotic practices, since it seems that the latter have been codified in the most precise way and constitute a disciplined asceticism of pleasure from which a kind of lived substance may emerge for the subject. It is only on the basis of extrapolation that it is supposed something analogous was effectively practiced by the troubadours. Personally, I don't believe a word of it. Moreover, without assuming an identity between the practices taken from different cultural spheres, I do believe the influence of this poetry has been decisive for us.

Following the notable failure of the different attempts to explain in terms of influence the emergence of this particular kind of idealizing cult of the feminine object in our culture, I am struck most by the fact that a number of the most ascetic and most paradoxical of the texts utilized in the discourse of courtly love are taken over from Ovid's Art of Love.

Ovid wrote in a sparkling verse form a little treatise for libertines in which one learns for example, in which neighborhoods of Rome one can meet the prettiest little whores. And he develops his theme in a poem in three parts that ends with the direct evocation of what can only be called the game of the two-backed beast. In the midst of all that one also comes across formulas such as Arte regendus Amor, "Love must be ruled by Art." And then, ten centuries later, with the help of those magic words, a group of poets starts to introduce all that word for word into a veritable operation of artistic incantation.

One also reads Militiae species amor est, "Love is a kind of military service" – which means for Ovid that the ladies of Rome aren't as easy as all that. And then in the discourse of chivalry, in a form that is nicely outlined in Don Quixote, such terms begin to resonate so as to evoke an armed militia devoted to the defense of women and children.

You can certainly understand the importance I attribute to such well-attested analogies, for it is clear that in the priesthood itself, Ovid's Ars Amandi had not been forgotten; Chrétien de Troyes even translated it. It is through these kinds of revivals that one is able to understand what the function of the signifier means. And I would like to make my boldest assertion today at this point in affirming that courtly love was created more or less as you see the fantasm emerge from the syringe that was evoked just now.

That doesn't mean that something fundamental isn't involved, however; otherwise it would be inconceivable that André Breton could celebrate in this day and age l'Amour fou, "the madness of love," as he puts it in terms dictated by his concerns, or by his interest in the relationship to what he calls "objective chance." That is a strange signifying configuration, since who, a century or so from now, on reading these things in their context, will understand that objective chance means things that occur and are all the richer in meaning because they take place somewhere where we are unable to perceive either rational, or causal, or any other kind of order, that can justify their emergence in the real?

In other words, it is once again in the place of the Thing that Breton has the madness of love emerge.

As I take leave of you today and remind you that we will meet again three weeks from now, I would like to conclude with four lines from a poem, which, thanks to my memory, came to mind this morning. They are from another surrealist poet, Paul Eluard. They are in their poetic context exactly at that frontier or limit which in my own words I am attempting to enable us to localize and feel:

> Against this dilapidated sky, these panes of fresh water,
> Which face will appear and, like a sonorous shell,
> Announce that the night of love has turned to day,
> Open mouth joined to a mouth that is closed?[2]

February 10, 1960

[2] Capitale de la Douleur

XII

A critique of Bernfeld

REACTION FORMATION AND SUBLIMATION
THE PRECOCIOUSNESS OF SUBLIMATION BETWEEN FREUDIAN AESTHETICS AND ETHICS
SUBLIMATION AND IDENTIFICATION A CURIOSITY

Let us not forget that this year I resolved that this seminar would be a real seminar.

This is all the more essential because we have among us not a few people capable of contributing, including someone whom I can call our friend. That is Pierre Kaufmann, who is an assistant at the Sorbonne. He has been following what goes on at this seminar for a long time now, and has been attentive to its work in the most useful of ways. Perhaps some of you follow his philosophical chronicle that appears in Combat on Thursdays. He has several times discussed my teaching, on the occasion of the Royaumont Conference, for example, or quite recently when he was good enough to give an account of work that was useful to an author such as Henri Lefebvre – he had complained of a deficiency of some kind in my teaching on the basis of the mere sight of a part of it or of an article.

In any case, four weeks ago I referred to a little article by Bernfeld. It was the "Bemerkungen über Sublimierung," which appeared in Imago in 1922. Mr. Kaufmann was good enough to show an interest in it, and our discussion progressed to the point where he brought me something which appeared to me to be both suggestive and promising enough for me to encourage him to develop it as far as time and interest permitted. He will thus present the thoughts that were inspired by Bernfeld's article and the further developments it inspired in him.

Please note especially that on a number of occasions in this presentation very interesting allusions will be made – I can only call them allusions, when I think of all that Mr. Kaufmann has added relative to the sources of the matter he was dealing with in the field of psychology at the moment when he became interested in it. In France, as in the English-speaking countries, we are quite ignorant of a whole, extremely rich German tradition, which shows that Freud, in fact, was the object of readings that were careful and extensive, or, in a word, immense.

On many points, we have a lot to learn about things that even Mr. Kaufmann hasn't yet formulated completely or published. You will get some idea of that today.

I now give him the floor and thank him in advance for what he has prepared for us. [Mr. Kaufmann's talk followed.]

1

What emerges from your talk is the frequent obscurity of Bernfeld's theory or at least of the application of it he attempts to give to the case under consideration. The result is quite ambiguous and gives rise to a problem. It is, in short, Bernfeld's thesis that one can only talk of sublimation when there is a transfer of energy from the object libido to the Ichziele.

The Ichziele are preexistent, and there is sublimation when libidinal energy is reinvigorated, updated, as the child enters the phase of puberty. A part of the energy is transferred from the aims of pleasure to the aims of the Ichgerechte, which are in conformity with the ego. And although the Freudian distinction between Verdrängung and Sublimierung is maintained, it is nevertheless only at the moment when Verdrängung appears that Sublimierung is perceptible. For example, it is only when the love of the child for the person Melitta is felt as a process of repression that that which is not completely obscured by the force of the latter is able to pass to the level of sublimation. Thus for him there is a kind of synchrony between the two processes. Let's say that Bernfeld is only able to grasp sublimation when he has the immediate correlative of repression.

Mr. Kaufmann: . . . Although he says that there is some ambiguity in the Three Essays, he nevertheless adds that it is clear that sublimation is distinguished from reaction formation by the non-repressed character of the libido.

Dr. Lacan: In reality, the greatest ambiguity reigns in the Three Essays on the Theory of Sexuality on the subject of the relations between spiritual reaction and Sublimierung. The problem begins with the text on pages 78 and 79 of the Gesammelte Werke. At that time this articulation of the problem caused a great many difficulties for the commentators. People wondered, depending on the different passages, whether Freud turns Sublimierung into a particular form of reaction formation or whether, on the contrary, reaction formation isn't to be located within a form in which Sublimierung would have a broader significance.

The only important thing to remember is the little sentence to be found at the bottom of note 79, which concludes the whole paragraph on reaction formation and sublimation. It makes a distinction that hasn't been further developed, as Bernfeld quite properly notes: "There may be sublimations by means of other, simpler mechanisms."

To summarize, the way of analyzing the economy of energy sources in the poetic activity of the young boy called Robert leaves an obvious residue that Bernfeld himself points to on page 339 as follows: "Aus dem Rest der Melitta geltenden Objektlibido entwickeln sich Stimmungen." – Melitta is the girl he loves. And then on page 340, Bernfeld writes: "Die Energie, mit der die tertiare Bearbeitung vollzogen wird, ist nun unbezweifelbar unverdrängte Objektlibido." There's where the problem lies if we make the phenomenon of sublimation dependent on the distinction between Libidoziel, Ichziele, Lustziele. And Sterba, too, in an article that appeared the previous year comes up against the same problem. If everything depends on the redirection of the energy from one sphere to another, or a certain set of aims which undergoes a profound disturbance at the time of puberty, then when Bernfeld identifies that crucial point which seems so important to him in the poetic production of the boy, he is led expressly to refer the poetic vocation to the Ichziele. And he resolves the question by saying that to become a poet is an aim of the ego, which was manifested very early in the boy in question. These precocious activities are, in Bernfeld's eyes, only to be distinguished by the fact that they reflect what he has learned at school in a diffuse and non-personalized way, as a result of which all the productions of the time are marked with the sign "of little value." They only seem to become interesting from the moment when the person concerned feels himself to be dramatically engaged in his activities.

I am emphasizing factors that present the author in the most favorable of lights. But in a more or less fleeting way, how many children are there who during the latency period don't engage in poetic activity periodically? Freud was in a good position to observe it in one of his children. There is a problem there that is different from that of cultural transmission or imitation. The problem of sublimation has to be posed early, but we don't for that reason have to limit ourselves to individual development. The reason why there are poets, why a poetic vocation may suggest itself early to a young human being, cannot simply be solved as with Bernfeld by considering genetic development and the new characteristics that appear at the moment when sexuality becomes an issue in an obvious way.

To fail to recognize that sexuality is there from the beginning in the young child, and is an even greater factor during the phase that precedes the latency period, is to fly in the face of the whole Freudian enterprise and discovery. If so much insistence has been placed on the pregenital sources of sublimation, it is for that reason. The problem of sublimation is raised long before the moment when the division between the aims of the libido and the aims of the ego are clear, apparent, and accessible on the level of consciousness.

If I may be permitted to emphasize here something that I have taught you, I would say that the term I use in the effort to articulate sublimation in relation to what we have to deal with, das Ding, or what I call the Thing, refers to a decisive place around which the definition of sublimation must be articulated – even before I was born, and, obviously, therefore, before the Ichziele, the aims of the I appear.

The same remark applies to the comparison you have made between the use I make of the image of the Thing and what Simmel does with it.

There is in Simmel something of interest to me, since he has the notion not only of distanciation but also of an object that cannot be attained. But it is nevertheless an object. On the other hand, what cannot be attained in the Thing is precisely the Thing – i.e., it's not an object. And the difference is a radical one that has to do with the appearance between his time and mine of the difference that is the Freudian unconscious.

Simmel comes close to something that you have interpreted as an apprehension of anality, but he is unable to grasp it fully precisely because of that fundamental difference.

Mr. Kaufmann: . . . As far as Bernfeld is concerned, the problem is merely made more confusing if the notion of value is introduced into the analysis of sublimation. He says, for example, that on the level of analysis one shouldn't distinguish between the work of an artist and a stamp collection. . . .

Dr. Lacan: Not only between a collection of works of art and a stamp collection, but between an art collection, and, in a given child or patient, a collection of dirty bits of paper. He resists introducing criteria that are alien to the criteria of psychic development.

The last part of the article has to do with an effort to articulate sublimation on to his curious experiment with groups of young people.

The verification of the size of the penis is in his eyes the essential significant element of that period when children engage in reciprocal exhibitionism. According to him there is here a conflict between the ego and the object libido. On the one hand, the ego exhibits itself narcissistically as the most handsome, strongest and biggest. Another part is opposed to the ego because it goes in the direction of genital excitation.

In the history of the association involved, that is for him the decisive side of the internal or esoteric ceremony of the group. It is from that point on that according to him one can talk of sublimation in their group activity.

The problematic character of all his needs to be emphasized, especially if one adds that, among those who consider themselves to be the strongest and boldest, this exhibitionism is accompanied by collective masturbation.

Mr. Kaufmann: . . . In short, Bernfeld was out of luck. He treated sublimation in connection with the ideal ego just before Freud was in a position to inform him of the nature of this ideal ego, and, in particular, of the need to take into consideration the relation to the other.

Dr. Lacan: You are an optimist. Those who have written on the subject afterwards also don't seem to have profited from the introduction of the ideal ego. Just read them, including in the end the "Observations on Sublimation" and the article "Neutralisation and Sublimation," which appeared in Analysis Studies; you won't find there the least attempt to articulate sublimation on to the ideal ego. And that's as far as we've got, that's the point we are starting from here.

2

I would like to thank you for your presentation today. So as to highlight what we have learned, I hope you will allow me to quote the sentence that expresses the essence of Bernfeldian theory: "Those components of the whole that are instinctive emotion and that are held together under the pressure of repression may be sublimated. Thus the particular qualities of these components enable the ego function to be supported through the reinforcement of ego instincts that are currently threatened."

That's the definition to which he holds and which includes the two extremes you refer to. That is, either the ego is strong, and those whose ego instincts are precociously powerful form an aristocracy, an elite – and it is futile for him to say parenthetically that no emphasis is placed on value, given that it is after all impossible to avoid such an emphasis. Or the ego instincts are threatened and have to call for the assistance furnished by the drives, to the extent, that is, that they can escape recuperation. That's the position Bernfeld reaches.

It is, I assume, clear to you all that what I am concerned with this year is situated somewhere between a Freudian ethics and a Freudian aesthetics. Freudian aesthetics is involved because it reveals one of the phases of the function of the ethics. And it really is surprising that it hasn't been given greater prominence, given that in another form the subject has preoccupied psychoanalysis – Jones, for example, is always talking about the moral complacency which is in a way that which ethics makes use of in order to render the Thing inaccessible to us, when it already was inaccessible from the beginning.

I am trying to show you how Freudian aesthetics, in the broadest meaning of the term – which means the analysis of the whole economy of signifiers – reveals that the Thing is inaccessible. That needs to be placed right at the start of the problem, so as to be able to articulate its consequences, and especially the question of idealization. In any case, you saw last time, in connection with the sublimation involved in the moral code of courtly love, the beginnings of the emergence of an ideal type.

By way of conclusion, I would like to introduce a word whose full meaning will be apparent later on. Insofar as we distinguish in the sphere of ethics between two levels that are already there in classical thinkers – and that is discussed in a passage of De Officiis to which I shall refer you later – the question is whether the summum bonum should be articulated according to honestas, that is the style of the honnête homme – and which must, therefore, be articulated as a certain form of organization, a certain life style that is located in relation to the initial sublimation – or according to utilitas, a concept that is at the basis of the utilitarianism, with which I began by posing the problem of ethics this year, and whose true essence I propose to show.

March 2, 1960

SUPPLEMENTARY NOTE

A CURIOUS CASE OF SUBLIMATION

I have for you today something curious and amusing. But I believe that we analysts are perhaps alone in being in a position to situate things properly.

Last time when Mr. Kaufmann had finished talking about Bernfeld's article, I stated that the problem we face is that of establishing the link between sublimation and identification. Before we leave the subject of sublimation as I have outlined it for you around the notion of the Thing – and it may still seem enigmatic and veiled for very good reasons – I would like to present you with a text, as it were as a note, on the subject of what might be called the paradoxes of sublimation.

Sublimation is not, in fact, what the foolish crowd thinks; and it does not on all occasions necessarily follow the path of the sublime. The change of object doesn't necessarily make the sexual object disappear – far from it; the sexual object acknowledged as such may come to light in sublimation. The crudest of sexual games can be the object of a poem without for that reason losing its sublimating goal.

In short, I don't think it a waste of time for me to read you a piece of evidence from the file of courtly love that even the specialists themselves literally don't know what to do with; they can't make head or tail of it.

There aren't two poems like this in the literature of courtly love. It's a hapax, a single occurrence. It appears in the work of one of the most subtle and polished of the troubadours, whose name is Arnaud Daniel, and who is famous for his extraordinarily rich formal inventiveness, most notably in the poetic form of the sestina, which I don't have time to go into here; however, you should at least know the name.

Arnaud Daniel wrote a poem on the oddest of those relations of service that I told you about between the lover and his Lady; it is a whole poem that is distinguished by the fact that, much to the delight of a number of startled writers, it breaches the boundaries of pornography to the point of scatology.

The poem is concerned with a case that seems to be presented as a question to be resolved in terms of the moral casuistry of courtly love. The case involves a Lady, called Domna Ena in the poem, who orders her knight to put his mouth to her trumpet – an expression that is quite unambiguous in the text; and the order is designed to test the worthiness of his love, his loyalty and his commitment.

So as not to make you wait any longer then, I will read the poem – in French because I don't think that any of you can understand that lost language which is the langue d'oc, a language that nevertheless has its style and its value. The poem is in stanzas of nine lines with a single rhyme, which changes with every stanza.

> Though Lord Raimond, in agreement with Lord Truc Malec, defends Lady Ena and her orders, I would grow old and white before I would consent to a request that involves so great an improriety. For so as "to put his mouth to her trumpet," he would need the kind of beak that could pick grain out of a pipe. And even then he might come out blind, as the smoke from those folds is so strong.
>
> He would need a beak and a long, sharp one, for the trumpet is rough, ugly and hairy, and it is never dry, and the swamp within is deep. That's why the pitch ferments upwards as it continually escapes, continually overflows. And it is not fitting that he who puts his mouth to that pipe be a favorite.
>
> There will be plenty of other tests, finer ones that are worth far more, and if Lord Bernart withdrew from that one, he did not, by Christ, behave like a coward if he was taken with fear and fright. For if the stream of water had landed on him from above, it would have scalded his whole neck and cheek, and it is not fitting also that a lady embrace a man who has blown a stinking trumpet.
>
> Bernart, I do not agree in this with the remarks of Raimon de Durfort, in saying that you were wrong; for even if you had blown away gladly, you would have encountered a crude obstacle, and the stench would soon have smitten you, that stinks worse than dung in a garden. You should praise God, against whomsoever seeks to dissuade you, that he helped you escape from that.
>
> Yes, he escaped from a great peril with which his son also would have been reproached and all those from Cornil. He would have done better to go into exile than to have blown in that funnel between spine and mount pubic, there where rust colored substances proceed. He could never have been certain that she would not piss all over his snout and eyebrows.
>
> Lady, may Bernart never venture to blow that trumpet without a large bung to stop up the penile hole; then only could he blow without peril.

This quite extraordinary document opens a strange perspective on the deep ambiguity of the sublimating imagination. One should first note that all the poetic works of the trouvères and troubadours have not come down to us, and that we only find some of Arnaud Daniel's poems in two or three manuscripts. Yet this poem, whose literary merit goes far beyond what a translation is able to reveal, not only was not lost but is to be found in some twenty manuscripts. We have other texts which show that two other trouvères, Trumalec and Raymond de Durfort, participated in this debate, arguing on the other side, but I won't go into that.

We find ourselves here faced with a sudden reversal, a strange reaction. Heaven knows that Arnaud Daniel went a long way in the direction of lending the greatest subtlety to the pact between lovers. Doesn't he push desire to the extreme point of offering himself in a sacrifice that involves his own annihilation? Well, he is the very same one who turns out to have written a poem, however reluctantly, on a subject that must have concerned him in some way for him to have taken so much trouble with it.

The idealized woman, the Lady, who is in the position of the Other and of the object, finds herself suddenly and brutally positing, in a place knowingly constructed out of the most refined of signifiers, the emptiness of a thing in all its crudity, a thing that reveals itself in its nudity to be the thing, her thing, the one that is to be found at her very heart in its cruel emptiness. That Thing, whose function certain of you perceived in the relation to sublimation, is in a way unveiled with a cruel and insistent power.

It is nevertheless difficult not to note echoes of this elsewhere, for the oddness involved is not without precedents. Remember, for example, the origin of the flute evoked in Longus's pastoral romance. Pan pursues the nymph Syrinx, who runs away from him and disappears among the reeds. In his rage, he cuts down the reeds, and that, Longus tells us, is the origin of the flute with pipes of unequal length – Pan wanted, the subtle poet adds, to express in that way the fact that his love was without equal. Syrinx is transformed into the pipe of Pan's flute. Now on the level of derision that is to be found in the strange poem that I brought to your attention here, we find the same structure, the same model of an emptiness at the core, around which is articulated that by means of which desire is in the end sublimated.

I wouldn't tell all if I didn't add to the file, in case it proves useful, that Dante places Arnaud Daniel in Canto XIV of his Purgatory in the company of sodomites. I haven't been able to pursue the particular genesis of this poem beyond that.

I am now going to ask Madame Hubert to speak. She will be talking to you about a text that is frequently referred to in analytic literature, namely, Sperber's article entitled "On the Influence of Sexual Factors on the Origin and Development of Language," but it also touches on all kinds of problems relative to what we have to say about sublimation.

In his article on the theory of symbolism – an article on which I wrote a commentary in our journal but which, I have heard, is not particularly accessible to a reader – Jones expressly singles out the Sperber article. If, he says, Sperber's theory is true, if we must consider certain forms of primitive work, agricultural work, in particular, the relations between man and the earth, as the equivalent of the sexual act, features whose traces are, as it were, retained in the meaning we give that primitive relation, then can this be explained by the process of symbolization? Jones says no. In other words, given the conception he has of the function of the symbol, he considers that what is involved is by no means a symbolic transposition, neither can it be registered as a sublimation effect. The sublimation effect is to be taken in its liberality, in its authenticity. The copulation between the ploughman and the earth is not a symbolization but the equivalent of a symbolic copulation.

It is worth taking the time to reflect on that, and in my article I draw certain consequences to which I will return. Sperber's text appeared in the first issue of Imago, and it is perhaps even more difficult to find than the others. But so that it may receive its due, Mrs. Hubert has been good enough to concentrate on it, and she will tell us today what it contains.

March 9, 1960

THE PARADOX OF JOUISSANCE

XIII

The death of God

ON SEXUAL SYMBOLISM FROM THE NUMEN TO MOSES'S MESSAGE THE GREAT MAN AND HIS MURDER
FREUD'S CHRISTOCENTRISM JOUISSANCE AND DEBT

If I wanted you to be acquainted with Sperber's article, it is because it is coupled to our sublimation train.

1

I will not engage in a serious critique of the text, for I hope that after several years of following my teaching here, most of you have found something irritating in the way in which Sperber proceeds. Though his goal is undoubtedly interesting, his mode of demonstration has its weaknesses. To refer to the fact that words with an original sexual meaning started to take on a series of meanings increasingly remote from their primitive meaning, as a way of proving the common sexual origin in a sublimated form of fundamental human activities, is to adopt an approach whose demonstrable value seems to me to be eminently refutable from the point of view of common sense.

That words whose meaning was originally sexual spread out so as to overlay meanings that are very remote doesn't mean as a consequence that the whole field of meaning is overlaid in that way. That doesn't mean that all the language we use is in the end reducible to the key words it contains, words whose valorization is considerably facilitated by the fact that one accepts as proven what is, in fact, most questionable, namely, the notion of a root or radical, and what in human language would be its constitutive link to sense.

This emphasis placed on roots and radicals in languages making use of inflections raises particular problems that are far from being applicable to human language universally. What would be the case with Chinese, for example, where all the signifying units are monosyllabic? The notion of a root is highly tenuous. In fact, what is involved is an illusion that is linked to the development of language, of the use of the language system, which can only seem very suspect to us.

That doesn't mean that Sperber's remarks concerning the use of words with what might be called sexual roots in Indo-European languages are of no interest. But they can hardly satisfy us from the perspective in which I believe you have been trained and formed by me, a perspective which involves distinguishing properly the function of the signifier or the creation of signification through the metonymic and metaphoric use of signifiers.

That's where the trouble begins. Why are those zones in which sexual signification spreads outward, why are those rivers through which it ordinarily flows – and, as you have seen, in a direction that isn't just random – specially chosen, so that in order to reach them one uses words that already have a given usage in the sexual sphere? Why is it precisely in connection with a half-failed act of pruning, with an act of cutting that is blocked, thwarted, messed up, that one should evoke the presumed origin of the word and find it in the hole drilling activities of work in its most primitive of forms, with the meaning of sexual operation, of phallic penetration? Why does one resurrect the metaphor "fuck" in connection with something that is "fucked up?" Why is it the image of the vulva that surfaces to express a number of different acts, including those of escaping, of fleeing, of cutting and running (se tailler), as the German term in the text has often been translated?

I have, in fact, tried to find confirmation of the historical moment when that nice little expression, se tailler (to cut and run), in the sense of "to flee" or "to escape," first appeared. I haven't had time to find out, and I didn't discover it in the dictionaries and other sources that I have at my disposal. It is true that I don't have in Paris the dictionaries that give the popular meanings of words. I would like someone to do some research on the topic.

Thus, why in our everyday life do we find that in our metaphors a certain type of meaning is involved, certain signifiers that are marked by their primitive use in connection with the sexual relation? Why, for example, do we use some slang expression that had originally a sexual significance in order to evoke metaphorically situations that have nothing to do with sex? The metaphorical usage involved is employed to obtain a certain modification.

But if it were only a question of showing how in the normal diachronic development of linguistic usage sexual references are used in a certain metaphorical sense – that is, if I were only concerned with providing another example of certain aberrations of psychoanalytic speculation – I wouldn't have presented you with the Sperber text. If it is still interesting, it is because of what is to be found on its horizon, something that isn't demonstrated there, but which in its intention it strives for, and that is the radical relationship that exists between the first instrumental relations, the earliest techniques, the principal actions of agriculture, such as that of opening the belly of the earth, or again the principal actions in the making of a vase that I have previously emphasized, and something very precise, namely, not so much the sexual act as the female sexual organ.

It is insofar as the female sexual organ or, more precisely, the form of an opening and an emptiness, is at the center of all the metaphors concerned, that the article is of interest and is valuable in focusing our thought, for it is obvious that there is a gap in the text, a leap beyond the supposed reference.

One takes note of the fact that the use of a term that originally meant "coitus" is capable of being extended virtually infinitely, that the use of a term that originally meant "vulva" is capable of generating all kinds of metaphorical uses. And it is in this way that it began to be supposed that the vocalization presumed to accompany the sexual act gave men the idea of using the signifier to designate either the organ, and especially the female organ, in a noun form, or the act of coitus in a verbal form. The priority of the vocal use of the signifier among men is thus supposed to find its origin in the chanted calls that are assumed to be those of primitive sexual relations among humans, in the same way that they are among animals and especially birds.

The idea is very interesting. But you can sense right away the difference that exists between the more-or-less standardized cry that accompanies an activity and the use of a signifier that detaches a given articulatory element, that is to say, either the act or the organ. We don't find the signifying structure as such here; nothing implies that the oppositional element which forms the structure of the use of signifiers – and is already fully developed in the Fort-Da from which we took our original example – is given in the natural sexual call. If the sexual call can be derived from a temporal modulation of the act whose repetition may involve the fixation of certain elements of vocal activity, it still cannot give us even the most primitive structuring element of language. There is a gap there.

Nevertheless, the interest of the article is in making us see the way in which what is essential in the development of our experience and in Freud's doctrine may be conceived, that is to say, that sexual symbolism in the ordinary sense of the word may polarize at its point of origin the metaphorical play of the signifier.

That's all I have to say on the subject today, with the understanding that I may return to it later.

2

I wondered how I should take up the thread of our discussions, how I should start out again today.

As the result of conversations I have had with some of you, I said to myself that there would be some value in my giving you an idea of the lectures, comments, and conversations in which I engaged in Brussels. The fact is, when I have something to communicate to you, it is always related to the line of thought I am pursuing, and even when I take it out into the world, I do little more than take it up more or less at the point I have reached.

But to suppose that you already know implicitly what I said up there, which isn't the case, would be to take too great a leap forward. It is, in fact, important that the issues raised not be ignored.

That may seem to you to be an unconventional way of proceeding, but given the distance we still have to go, I don't have time to indulge in professorial scruples. Mine is not a professor's role. I don't even like to put myself in the teaching situation, since a psychoanalyst who speaks to an initiated audience is in the position of a propagandist. If I agreed to talk at the Catholic University of Brussels, I did so in a spirit of mutual assistance; it was in order to support the presence and the activities of those who are our friends and colleagues in Belgium. This concern is not for me the primary one, of course, but it is a secondary one.

I thus found myself in front of an audience that was very large and of which I had a very good impression, summoned there by the Catholic University. And that alone is enough to explain my motivation for speaking to them of what Freud has to say about the function of the Father.

As you might expect from me, I didn't mince my words or censor my language. I didn't attempt to attenuate Freud's position on religion. Moreover, you know what my position is concerning the so-called religious truths.

It is perhaps worthwhile to be more precise on the subject for once, although I believe I have made it clear enough. Whether from personal conviction or in the name of a methodological point of view, the so-called scientific point of view – a point of view that is by the way reached by people who otherwise consider themselves to be believers, but who in a certain sphere assume they are required to put aside their religious point of view – there is a paradox involved in practically excluding from the debate and from analysis things, terms, and doctrines that have been articulated in the field of faith, on the pretext that they belong to a domain that is reserved for believers.

You once heard me make a series of remarks on a passage from Saint Paul's Epistle to the Romans in connection with the theme that it is the Law which causes sin. And you saw that, thanks to an artifice I could have done without, namely, the substitution of the term the Thing for what the text calls sin, I was able to achieve a very precise formulation of what I had to say at the time on the subject of the knot of the Law and desire. Well, that particular example was not chosen by chance – it belonged to a certain order of effectiveness in relation to a special case, and by means of a kind of sleight of hand it was unusually helpful in leading to something I needed at the time to bring to your attention.

We analysts, who claim to go beyond certain conceptions of prepsychology relative to the phenomena of our own field or who approach human realities without prejudice, do not have to believe in these religious truths in any way, given that such belief may extend as far as what is called faith, in order to be interested in what is articulated in its own terms in religious experience – in the terms of the conflict between freedom and grace, for example.

A notion as precise and articulate as grace is irreplaceable where the psychology of the act is concerned, and we don't find anything equivalent in classic academic psychology. Not only doctrines, but also the history of choices, that is, of heresies that have been attested to in this sphere, and the succession of emotional outbursts that have motivated a certain number of directions taken in the concrete ethics of generations, all belong to our sphere of inquiry; they, so to speak, demand all of our attention in their own register and mode of expression.

It is not enough that certain themes be raised only by those who believe they believe – after all, how can we know? – for the whole field to be reserved for them alone. If we accept that they truly believe, then they are not beliefs for them but truths. What they believe in, whether they believe they believe in it or they don't – nothing is more ambiguous than belief – one thing is certain, they believe they know. The knowledge in question is like any other, and for this reason it falls into the field of inquiry that we should conduct on all forms of knowledge; and such is the case, because as analysts we believe that there is no knowledge which doesn't emerge against a background of ignorance.

That is the reason why we accept as such the idea of other forms of knowledge than the kind that is founded scientifically.

It was not useless, then, for me to confront an audience that represents an important sector of the public. Whether or not I may have caused an ear or two to prick up is problematic; the future alone will reveal that. Moreover, it won't have the same impact on a very different audience, like you.

Freud himself took an unequivocal position on the subject of religious experience. He said that everything of that kind that implied a sentimental approach meant nothing to him; it was literally a dead letter for him. Yet if we in this assembly have the position on the letter that we do, that doesn't solve a thing; however dead it might be, that letter was nevertheless definitely articulated. Well now, faced with people who are supposed not to be able to dissociate themselves from a certain message concerning the function of the Father – given that it is at the heart of the experience defined as religious – I had no discomfort in affirming that as far as that matter was concerned, "Freud had what it took," as I put it in a subtitle that was found a little startling.

You only have to open the little book entitled Moses and Monotheism that Freud cogitated over for some ten years, for after Totem and Taboo he thought of nothing but that, of Moses and the religion of his fathers. And if it weren't for the article on the Spaltung of the ego, one might say that the pen fell from his hands at the end of Moses and Monotheism. Contrary to what has been suggested to me over the last few weeks in connection with Freud's intellectual production toward the end of his life, I don't at all think that there was a decline. Nothing seems to me to be more firmly articulated in any case and more in conformity with all Freud's previous thought than this work.

It bears on the monotheistic message as such; and for him there is no doubt that it contains an uncontestable weight of superior value over any other. The fact that Freud was an atheist doesn't make any difference. For the atheist that Freud was, if not necessarily for all atheists, the goal of the radical core of this message was of decisive value. On the left of this message, there are some things that are henceforth outdated, obsolete; they no longer hold beyond the manifestation of the message. On the right, things are quite different.

The situation is quite clear from the spirit of Freud's argument. That doesn't mean that there is nothing at all outside of monotheism, far from it. He doesn't give us a theory of the gods, but enough is said concerning the ambiance that is usually connoted by "pagan," a late connotation linked to its retreat to the milieu of the peasantry. In that pagan ambiance at the time when it was flourishing, the numen rises up at every step, at the corner of every road, in grottoes, at crossroads; it weaves human experience together, and we can still see traces of it in a great many fields. That is something that contrasts greatly with the monotheistic profession of faith.

The numinous rises up at every step and, conversely, every step of the numinous leaves a trace, engenders a memorial. It didn't take much for a new temple to be erected, for a new religion to be established. The numinous proliferates and intervenes on all sides in human experience; it is, moreover, so abundant that something in the end must be manifested through man; its power cannot be overcome.

It is to this immense envelopment and at the same time to a degradation that the genre of the fable bears witness. Ancient fables are full of meanings that remain richly rewarding, but we have trouble realizing that they could have been compatible with something like a faith in the gods, because, whether they are heroic or vulgar, they are shot through with a kind of riotousness, drunkenness, and anarchy born of divine passions. The laughter of the Olympians in the Iliad sufficiently illustrates this on the heroic plane. There's a lot to be said about this laughter. From the pen of the philosophers, on the other hand, we have the other side of this laughter, of the derisory character of the adventures of the gods. It is difficult for us to conceive this.

In opposition to this we have the monotheistic message. How is it possible? How did it rise to this level? The way in which Freud articulates it is crucial if we are to appreciate the level at which its progress is to be situated.

For him everything is founded on the notion of Moses the Egyptian and of Moses the Midianite. I believe that an audience of people like you, eighty per cent of whom are psychoanalysts, should know this book by heart.

Moses the Egyptian is the Great Man, the legislator, the politician, the rationalist, the one whose path Freud claims to discover with the historical appearance in the fourteenth century B.C. of the religion of Akhenaton – something that has been attested by recent discoveries. This religion promotes a unitarianism of energy, symbolized by the sun from which it radiates and spreads out across the earth. This first attempt at a rationalist vision of the world, which is presupposed in the unitarianism of the real, in the substantive unification of the world centered on the sun, failed. Hardly had Akhenaton disappeared, when religious ideas of all kinds begin to multiply again, especially in Egypt; the pandemonium of the gods returns to take charge once more and utterly wipes out the reform. One man keeps the flame of this rationalist cause alight, Moses the Egyptian; it is he who chooses a small group of men and leads them through the test that will make them worthy to found a community based on his principles. In other words, someone wanted to create socialism in a single country, except, of course, there was in addition no country but just a bunch of men to carry the project through.

That's Freud conception of the true Moses, the Great Man; and what we need to know is how his message has come down to us.

You will perhaps respond that this Moses was after all a bit of a magician. How otherwise did he produce the swarms of locusts and frogs? But that was his business. It's not an essential question from the point of view that concerns us here, that of his place in religion. Let's leave the question of magic aside, although it doesn't seem to have hurt him with anyone.

On the other hand, there is Moses the Midianite, the son-in-law of Jethro, whom Freud also calls the one from Sinai, from Horeb, and Freud teaches us that this one was confused with the other. It is this one who claims to have heard the decisive word emerge from the burning bush, the word that cannot be eluded, as Freud eludes it: "I am," not as the whole Christian gnosis has attempted to interpret it, "he who is" – thereby exposing us to difficulties relative to the concept of being that are far from being over, and which have perhaps contributed to compromising exegesis – but "I am what I am." Or, in other words, a God who introduces himself as an essentially hidden God.

This hidden god is a jealous God. He seems to be very difficult to dissociate from the one who, according to the Bible, proclaims in that same ambiance of fire which makes him inaccessible the famous ten commandments to the assembled people, who are required to remain at a certain distance. Given that these commandments turn out to be proof against anything – and by that I mean that whether or not we obey them, we still cannot help hearing them – in their indestructible character they prove to be the very laws of speech, as I tried to show you.

Moses the Midianite seems to pose a problem of his own – I would like to know whom or what he faced on Sinai and on Horeb. But after all, since he couldn't bear the brilliance of the face of him who said "I am what I am," we will simply say at this point that the burning bush was Moses's Thing, and leave it there. In any case, we still have to calculate the consequences of that revelation.

By what means is the problem resolved for Freud? He considers that Moses the Egyptian was assassinated by his little people, who were less docile than ours relative to socialism in a single country. And then these people went on to devote themselves to all kinds of paralyzing observances at the same time that they caused trouble for countless neighbors – for we shouldn't overlook what is, in effect, the history of the Jews. One only has to read a little into these ancient works to realize that they knew all about colonial ambition in Canaan. They even managed to induce neighboring populations to have themselves circumcised on the quiet, and then they profited from the paralysis that that operation between your legs causes for a time, in order to wipe them out. But I don't mention that simply to record grievances about a stage of the religion that is now far behind us.

Having said that, however, it's clear that Freud doesn't for a moment doubt that the major interest of Jewish history is that of being the bearer of the message of one God.

And that's where things stand. We have the dissociation between the rationalist Moses and the inspired, obscurantist Moses, who is scarcely ever discussed. But basing his argument on the examination of historical evidence, Freud finds no other path adapted to the transmission of the rationalist Moses' message than that of darkness; in other words, this message is linked through repression to the murder of the Great Man. And it is precisely in this way, Freud tells us, that it could be transmitted and maintained in a state of efficacy that can be historically measured. It's so close to the Christian tradition that it's really remarkable; it is because the primordial murder of the Great Man reemerges in a second murder that in a sense translates and brings it to light, the murder of Christ, that the monotheistic message is completed. It is because the secret malediction of the murder of the Great Man – which itself only draws its power from the fact that it echoes the inaugural murder of humanity, that of the primitive father – it is because this event emerges into the light of day, that what, in the light of Freud's text, we are obliged to call Christian redemption may be accomplished.

That tradition alone pursues to the end the task of revealing what is involved in the primitive crime of the primordial law.

How after that can one avoid taking note of the originality of Freud's position relative to all that is to be found in the field of the history of religions? The history of religions consists essentially of establishing the common denominator of religiosity. We stake out the religious region in man within which we are required to include religions as different as one from Borneo, Confucianism, Taoism, and the Christian religion. It's not without its difficulties, although, when one sets out to produce typologies, there's no reason why one shouldn't end up with something. And this time, one ends up with a classification of the imaginary, which is in opposition to that which characterizes the origin of monotheism, and which is integrated into the primordial commandments insofar as they are the laws of speech: "Thou shalt not make a carved image of me," and so as to avoid that risk altogether, "Thou shalt not make any image at all."

And since I have happened to talk to you about the primitive sublimation of architecture, let me say that the problem of the temple that was destroyed without trace remains. To which symbolic order, to which set of precautions, to which exceptional circumstances did it appeal for everything to be destroyed, everything down to the remotest corner that might have made possible the reappearance, on the sides of a vase – and it wouldn't have been difficult – of images of animals, plants, and all those forms that were outlined on the walls of the cave? This temple was, in effect, only supposed to be the cover of what was at its center, of the Ark of union, that is the pure symbol of the pact, of the tie that bound him who said "I am what I am," and gave the commandments, to the people who received them, so that among all peoples it might be distinguished as the one that had wise and intelligent laws. How was this temple to be constructed so as to avoid all the traps of art?

It's a question that cannot be answered by any document, by any material image. I simply leave it open.

3

What is involved here is discussed by Freud in Moses and Monotheism in connection with the business of the moral law. He thoroughly integrates it there into the adventure which, as he writes in his text, only found its further development and its fulfillment in the Judeo-Christian story.

As far as other religions are concerned – he vaguely defines these as Oriental, thereby alluding apparently to a whole range that includes Buddhism, Lao-Tseu, and others – he affirms, with a boldness that one can only wonder at, that they are all nothing more than the religion of the Great Man. Thus things there remained stuck halfway, more or less aborted, without reaching the point of the primitive murder of this Great Man.

I am far from agreeing with all that. Yet in the history of the avatars of Buddhism, one can find a great many things which, legitimately or not, can be made to illustrate Freud's theory; in other words, it is because they did not push the development of the drama through to the end that they stayed where they are. But it is, needless to say, odd to find this strange Christocentrism in Freud's writings. There must have been a reason for him to have slipped into it almost without realizing it.

In any case, we find ourselves brought back to following the path to the end.

So that something like the order of the law may be transmitted, it has to pass along the path traced by the primordial drama articulated in Totem and Taboo, that is to say, the murder of the father and its consequences, the murder at the origin of culture of the figure about whom one can say nothing, a fearful and feared as well as dubious figure, an all-powerful, half-animal creature of the primal horde, who was killed by his sons. As a result of which – and the articulation here is important – an inaugural pact is established that is essential for a time to the institution of that law, which Freud does his best to tie to the murder of the father and to identify with the ambivalence that is thus at the basis of the relations between son and father or, in other words, involves the return of love once the act is accomplished.

All the mystery is in that act. It is designed to hide something, namely, that not only does the murder of the father not open the path to jouissance that the presence of the father was supposed to prohibit, but it, in fact, strengthens the prohibition. The whole problem is there; that's where, in fact as well as in theory, the fault lies. Although the obstacle is removed as a result of the murder, jouissance is still prohibited; not only that, but the prohibition is reinforced.

This fault that denies is thus sustained, articulated, made visible by the myth, but at the same time it is also camouflaged by it. That is why the important feature of Totem and Taboo is that it is a myth, and, as has been said, perhaps the only myth that the modern age was capable of. And Freud created it.

It is important to grasp what is embodied in this fault. Everything that passes across it is turned into a debt in the Great Book of debts. Every act of jouissance gives rise to something that is inscribed in the Book of debts of the Law. Furthermore, something in this regulatory mechanism must either be a paradox or the site of some irregularity, for to pass across the fault in the other direction is not equivalent.

Freud writes in Civilization and Its Discontents that everything that is transferred from jouissance to prohibition gives rise to the increasing strengthening of prohibition. Whoever attempts to submit to the moral law sees the demands of his superego grow increasingly meticulous and increasingly cruel.

Why isn't it the same in the other direction? It is a fact that it isn't the case at all. Whoever enters the path of uninhibited jouissance, in the name of the rejection of the moral law in some form or other, encounters obstacles whose power is revealed to us every day in our experience in innumerable forms, forms that nevertheless perhaps may be traced back to a single root.

We are, in fact, led to the point where we accept the formula that without a transgression there is no access to jouissance, and, to return to Saint Paul, that that is precisely the function of the Law. Transgression in the direction of jouissance only takes place if it is supported by the oppositional principle, by the forms of the Law. If the paths to jouissance have something in them that dies out, that tends to make them impassable, prohibition, if I may say so, becomes its all-terrain vehicle, its half-track truck, that gets it out of the circuitous routes that lead man back in a roundabout way toward the rut of a short and well-trodden satisfaction.

That is the point that our experience leads us to, on condition that we are guided by Freud's articulation of the problem. Sin needed the Law, Saint Paul said, so that he could become a great sinner – nothing, of course, affirms that he did, but so that he could conceive of the possibility.

Meanwhile, what we see here is the tight bond between desire and the Law. And it is in the light of this that Freud's ideal is an ideal tempered with civility that might be called patriarchal civility, in the full idyllic sense. The father is as sentimental a figure as you can imagine, the kind of figure suggested by the humanitarian ideal that resonates in Diderot's bourgeois dramas, or indeed in the figures that are the favorites of eighteenth-century engravings. That patriarchal civility is supposed to set us on the most reasonable path to temperate or normal desires.

Yet what Freud is proposing through his myth is, in spite of its novelty, not something that wasn't from a certain point of view a response to a demand. The demand to which it was, in fact, a response is not difficult to see.

The myth of the origin of the Law is incarnated in the murder of the father; it is out of that that the prototypes emerged, which we call successively the animal totem, then a more-or-less powerful and jealous god, and, finally, the single God, God the Father. The myth of the murder of the father is the myth of a time for which God is dead.

But if for us God is dead, it is because he always has been dead, and that's what Freud says. He has never been the father except in the mythology of the son, or, in other words, in that of the commandment which commands that he, the father, be loved, and in the drama of the passion which reveals that there is a resurrection after death. That is to say, the man who made incarnate the death of God still exists. He still exists with the commandment which orders him to love God. That's the place where Freud stops, and he stops at the same time – the theme is developed in Civilization and Its Discontents – at the place that concerns the love of one's neighbor, which is something that appears to be insurmountable for us, indeed incomprehensible.

I will attempt to explain why next time. I just wanted to emphasize the fact today that there is a certain atheistic message in Christianity itself, and I am not the first to have mentioned it. Hegel said that the destruction of the gods would be brought about by Christianity.

Man survives the death of God, which he assumes, but in doing so, he presents himself before us. The pagan legend tells us that at the moment when the veil of the temple was rent on the Aegean Sea, the message resounded that "The great Pan is dead." Even if Freud moralizes in Civilization and Its Discontents, he stops short at the commandment to love thy neighbor. It is to the heart of this problem that his theory of the meaning of the instinct brings us back. The relationship of the great Pan to death was, then, a stumbling block for the psychologism of his current disciples.

That's why my second lecture in Brussels turned on the question of love of one's neighbor. It was another theme I had in common with my audience. What I did, in fact, come up with, I will allow you to judge next time.

March 16, 1960

XIV

Love of one's neighbor

A SPECIAL GOD FOOL AND KNAVE
THE TRUTH ABOUT TRUTH
WHY JOUISSANCE IS EVIL[1]
SAINT MARTIN KANTIAN TALES

You know that last time I picked up my discussion with you by connecting it to my lecture to the Catholics.

Don't imagine that that was an easy way out. I didn't merely serve up again what I had to say in Brussels; I didn't tell them half of what I told you.

What I laid out last time concerning the death of God the Father will lead us to another question today, one that will show you Freud situating himself directly at the center of our true experience. For he doesn't attempt to evade the issue by making generalizations about the religious function in man. He is concerned with the way in which it manifests itself to us, that is to say, in the commandment which is expressed in our civilization in the form of the love of one's neighbor.

1

Freud confronts this commandment directly. And if you take the time to read Civilization and Its Discontents, you will see that that is where he begins, where he remains throughout, and where he ends up. He talks of nothing but that. What he has to say on the subject should under normal circumstances make our ears ring and set our teeth on edge. But that doesn't happen. It's a funny thing, but once a text has been in print for a certain period of time, it allows the transitory vertigo that is the vital source of its meaning to evaporate.

So I will try to reanimate the meaning of Freud's lines today. And since that will lead me toward some pretty potent notions, all I can do is ask language, what Freud would call logos, to lend me a measured tone.

God, then, is dead. Since he is dead, he always has been. I explained to

[1] It should be borne in mind throughout the following discussion that "le mal" in French includes the ideas both of "evil" and of "suffering."

you Freud's theory on the topic, namely, the myth expressed in Totem and Taboo. It is precisely because God is dead, has always been dead, that it was possible to transmit a message via all those beliefs which made him appear to be still alive, resurrected from the emptiness left by his death in those non-contradictory gods whom Freud indicates proliferated above all in Egypt.

The message in question is that of a single God who is both the Lord of the universe and the dispenser of the light that warms life and spreads the brightness of consciousness. His attributes are those of a thought which regulates the order of the real. It is Akhenaton's God, the God of the secret message that the Jewish people bears by reason of the fact that, by assassinating Moses, it reenacted the archaic murder of the father. That, according to Freud, is the God to whom the sentiment, of which only a few are capable, is addressed, namely, amor intellectualis Dei.

Freud also knows that, although that love is articulated now and then in the thought of such exceptional men as the famous polisher of lenses who lived in Holland, it is nevertheless not of such great importance; it didn't prevent the construction in the same period of Versailles, a building whose style proves that the Colossus of Daniel with the feet of clay was still standing upright, as is still the case, although it had collapsed a hundred times.

No doubt a science has been erected on the fragile belief I was discussing, namely, the one that is expressed in the following terms, which always reappear at the horizon of our aims: "The real is rational, the rational is real."

It's a strange thing that if the science in question has made use of the belief, it has nevertheless remained subservient, remained in the service of the colossus I just referred to, the one that has collapsed a hundred times and is still there. The fervent love that a solitary individual like Spinoza or Freud may feel for the God of the message has nothing to do with the God of the believers. Nobody doubts that, and especially the believers themselves, who, whether Jews or Christians, have never failed to cause Spinoza trouble.

But it is odd to see that for some time now, since it became known that God was dead, the believers involved practice ambiguity. By referring to the dialectical God, they are seeking an alibi for the crisis of confidence in their faith. It is a paradoxical fact, which hadn't occurred before in history, that the torch of Akhenaton functions nowadays as an alibi for the disciples of Ammon.

And I don't say this to slander the historical role played by the God of the believers, the God of the Judeo-Christian tradition. That the message of Akhenaton's God was preserved in the tradition of the latter made it worthwhile for Moses the Egyptian to be confused with the Midianite, with the Moses whose Thing, speaking from the burning bush, affirmed himself to be a special God – not the only God, note, but a special God, compared to whom all the others don't count. I don't want to emphasize more than necessary the line I am pursuing today on this point; it's not, strictly speaking, that it is forbidden to honor other gods, but you musn't do it in the presence of the God of Israel – the distinction is no doubt important for historians.

We who are trying to articulate Freud's thought and experience so as to give them their due weight and importance, we will articulate it in the following form: if this Symptom-God, this Totem-God or taboo, is worthy of our pondering the claim to turn him into a myth, it is because he was the vehicle of the God of truth. It is by means of the former that the truth about God could come to light, namely, that God was really killed by men, and that once the thing was reenacted, the primitive murder was redeemed. Truth found its way via him who the Scriptures no doubt call the Word, but also the Son of Man, thereby admitting the human nature of the Father.

Freud does not overlook the No/Name-of-the-Father. On the contrary, he speaks about it very well in Moses and Monotheism – in a contradictory way clearly, if you fail to take Totem and Taboo for what it is, namely, a myth; and he says that in human history the recognition of the function of the Father is a sublimation that is essential to the opening up of a spirituality that represents something new, a step forward in the apprehension of reality as such.

Freud also doesn't overlook – far from it – the real father. It is desirable according to Freud that in the course of the adventure of the subject, there is, if not the Father as God, then at least the Father as good father. I will read you some time the passage in which Freud speaks almost tenderly of the exquisiteness of that virile identification which flows from the love for the father and from his role in the normalization of desire. But that result only occurs in a favorable form as long as everything is in order with the No/Name-of-the-Father, that is to say, with the God who doesn't exist. The resulting situation for this good father is a remarkably difficult one; to a certain extent he is an insecure figure.

We know this only too well in practice. And it is also articulated in the Oedipus myth – although the latter also shows as well that it is preferable for the subject himself to be unaware of these reasons. But he now knows them, and the fact of knowing them is precisely that which has certain consequences in our time.

These consequences are self-evident. They can be seen in common speech and, indeed, in the speech of the analyst. If we want to complete the task we have given ourselves this year, it is only fitting that we articulate them.

Let me note in passing that as the first person to demystify the function of the Father, Freud himself couldn't be a thoroughly good father. I don't want to dwell on it today; it is something we can sense through his biography, and it could be the topic of a special chapter. Suffice it to characterize him as what he was, a bourgeois whose biographer and admirer, Jones, calls "uxorious." As we all know, he wasn't a model father.

There, too, where he was truly the father, the father of us all, the father of psychoanalysis, what did he do but hand it over to the women, and also perhaps to the master-fools? As far as the women are concerned, we should reserve judgment; they are beings who remain rich in promise, at least to the extent that they haven't yet lived up to them. As for the master-fools, that's another story altogether.

2

To the extent that a sensitive subject such as ethics is not nowadays separable from what is called ideology, it seems to me appropriate to offer here some clarification of the political meaning of this turning point in ethics for which we, the inheritors of Freud, are responsible.

That is why I spoke of master-fools. This expression may seem impertinent, indeed not exempt from a certain excess. I would like to make clear here what in my view is involved.

There was a time, an already distant time right at the beginning of our Society, you will remember, when we spoke of intellectuals in connection with Plato's Meno. I would like to make a few condensed comments on the subject, but I believe they will prove to be illuminating.

It was noted then that, for a long time now, there have been left-wing intellectuals and right-wing intellectuals. I would like to give you formulas for them that, however categorical they may appear at first sight, might nevertheless help to illuminate the way.

"Fool" (sot) or, if you like, "simpleton" (demeuré) – quite a nice term for which I have a certain fondness – these words only express approximately a certain something for which the English language and its literature seem to me to offer a more helpful signifier – I will come back to this later. A tradition that begins with Chaucer, but which reaches its full development in the theater of the Elizabethan period is, in effect, centered on the term "fool."[2]

The "fool" is an innocent, a simpleton, but truths issue from his mouth that are not simply tolerated but adopted, by virtue of the fact that this "fool" is sometimes clothed in the insignia of the jester. And in my view it is a similar happy shadow, a similar fundamental "foolery," that accounts for the importance of the left-wing intellectual.

[2] In this and subsequent passages, the words "fool" and "knave" along with "foolery" and "knavery" in quotation marks are in English in the original.

And I contrast this with the designation for that which the same tradition furnishes a strictly contemporary term, a term that is used in conjunction with the former, namely, "knave" – if we have the time, I will show you the texts, which are numerous and unambiguous.

At a certain level of its usage "knave" may be translated into French as valet, but "knave" goes further. He's not a cynic with the element of heroism implied by that attitude. He is, to be precise, what Stendhal called an "unmitigated scoundrel." That is to say, no more than your Mr. Everyman, but your Mr. Everyman with greater strength of character.

Everyone knows that a certain way of presenting himself, which constitutes part of the ideology of the right-wing intellectual, is precisely to play the role of what he is in fact, namely, a "knave." In other words, he doesn't retreat from the consequences of what is called realism; that is, when required, he admits he's a crook.

This is only of interest if one considers things from the point of view of their result. After all, a crook is certainly worth a fool, at least for the entertainment he gives, if the result of gathering crooks into a herd did not inevitably lead to a collective foolery. That is what makes the politics of right-wing ideology so depressing.

But what is not sufficiently noted is that by a curious chiasma, the "foolery" which constitutes the individual style of the left-wing intellectual gives rise to a collective "knavery."

What I am proposing here for you to reflect on has, I don't deny, the character of a confession. Those of you who know me are aware of my reading habits; you know which weeklies lie around on my desk. The thing I enjoy most, I must admit, is the spectacle of collective knavery exhibited in them – that innocent chicanery, not to say calm impudence, which allows them to express so many heroic truths without wanting to pay the price. It is thanks to this that what is affirmed concerning the horrors of Mammon on the first page leads, on the last, to purrs of tenderness for this same Mammon.

Freud was perhaps not a good father, but he was neither a crook nor an imbecile. That is why one can say about him two things which are disconcerting in their connection and their opposition. He was a humanitarian – who after checking his works will contest that? – and we must acknowledge it, however discredited the term might be by the crooks on the right. But, on the other hand, he wasn't a simpleton, so that one can say as well, and we have the texts to prove it, that he was no progressive.

I am sorry but it's a fact, Freud was in no way a progressive. And as far as this is concerned, there are even some extraordinarily scandalous things in his writings. From the pen of one of our guides, the little optimism manifested for the perspectives opened by the masses is certainly apt to shock, but it is indispensable for us to remember that, if we want to know where we stand.

You will see in what follows the usefulness of such remarks, which may appear crude.

One of my friends and patients had a dream which bore the traces of some yearning or other stimulated in him by the formulations of this seminar, a dream in which someone cried out concerning me, "But why doesn't he tell the truth about truth?"

I quote this, since it is an impatience that I have heard expressed by a great many in other forms than dreams. The formula is true to a certain extent – I perhaps don't tell the truth about truth. But haven't you noticed that in wanting to tell it – something that is the chief preoccupation of those who are called metaphysicians – it often happens that not much truth is left? That's what is so risky about such a pretension. It is a pretension that so easily lands us at the level of a certain knavery. And isn't there also a certain "knavery," a metaphysical "knavery," when one of our modern treatises on metaphysics, under this guise of the truth about truth, lets a great many things by which truly ought not to be let by?

I am content to tell the truth of the first stage and to proceed step by step. When I say that Freud is a humanitarian but not a progressive, I say something true. Let's try to follow the thread and take another true step.

We started out from the truth, which we must take to be a truth if we follow Freud's analysis, that we know God is dead.

However, the next step is that God himself doesn't know that. And one may suppose that he never will know it because he has always been dead. This formula nevertheless leads us to something that we have to resolve here, to something that remains on our hands from this adventure, something that changes the bases of the ethical problem, namely, that jouissance still remains forbidden as it was before, before we knew that God was dead.

That's what Freud says. And that's the truth – if not the truth about truth, then at least the truth about what Freud has to say.

As a result, if we continue to follow Freud in a text such as Civilization and Its Discontents, we cannot avoid the formula that jouissance is evil. Freud leads us by the hand to this point: it is suffering because it involves suffering for my neighbor.

This may shock you, upset certain habits, cause consternation among the happy souls. But it can't be helped; that's what Freud says. And he says it at the point of origin of our experience. He wrote Civilization and Its Discontents to tell us this. That's what was increasingly announced, promulgated, publicized, as analytical experience progressed. It has a name; it's what is known as beyond the pleasure principle. And it has effects that are by no means metaphysical; they oscillate between a "certainly not" and a "perhaps."

Those who like fairy stories turn a deaf ear to talk of man's innate tendencies to "evil, aggression, destruction, and thus also to cruelty." And Freud's text goes on: "Man tries to satisfy his need for aggression at the expense of his neighbor, to exploit his work without compensation, to use him sexually without his consent, to appropriate his goods, to humiliate him, to inflict suffering on him, to torture and kill him."[3]

If I hadn't told you the title of the work from which this passage comes, I could have pretended it was from Sade. Moreover, my upcoming lecture will, in effect, concern the Sadean account of the problem of morality.

For the time being, we will stick to Freud. Civilization and Its Discontents concerns the effort to rethink the problem of evil once one acknowledges that it is radically altered by the absence of God. This problem has always been avoided by the moralists in a way that is literally calculated to arouse our disgust once we have been alerted to the terms of the experience.

Whoever he might be, the traditional moralist always falls back into the rut of persuading us that pleasure is a good, that the path leading to good is blazed by pleasure. The trap is striking, for it has a paradoxical character that lends it its air of audacity. One is, so to speak, swindled in the second degree; one assumes there is just a hidden drawer, and one is pleased to have found it, but one is screwed even more when one has found it than if one hadn't even suspected its existence. Something that is relatively rare, for everyone can see that there's something fishy.

What does Freud have to say about this? Even before the formulations of Beyond the Pleasure Principle, it is evident that the first formulation of the pleasure principle as an unpleasure principle, or least-suffering principle, naturally embodies a beyond, but that it is, in effect, calculated to keep us on this side of it rather than beyond it. Freud's use of the good can be summed up in the notion that it keeps us a long way from our jouissance.

Nothing is more obvious in our clinical experience. Who is there who in the name of pleasure doesn't start to weaken when the first half-serious step is taken toward jouissance? Isn't that something we encounter directly everyday?

One can understand, therefore, the dominance of hedonism in the moral teachings of a certain philosophical tradition, whose motives do not seem to us to be absolutely reliable or disinterested.

In truth, it isn't because they have emphasized the beneficial effects of pleasure that we criticize the so-called hedonist tradition. It is rather because they haven't stated what the good consisted of. That's where the fraud is.

In the light of this one can understand that Freud was literally horrified by the idea of love for one's neighbor. One's neighbor in German is der Nächste. "Du sollst den Nächsten lieben wie sich selbst" – that's how the commandment, "Thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself," is expressed in German. Freud underlines the excessive side of this by means of an argument that starts from several different points, which are, in fact, one and the same.

[3] S.E. XXI, p. iii.

In the first place, the neighbor, whose fundamental nature is, as you have seen, revealed in Freud's writings, is bad. But that's not all there is to it. Freud also says – and it shouldn't make you smile just because it is expressed in a somewhat sparse manner – my love is something precious and I'm not going to give it whole to whomever claims to be what he is, simply because he happened to come by.

Freud makes comments about this that are quite right, moving comments on the subject of what is worth loving. He reveals how one must love a friend's son because, if the friend were to lose his son, his suffering would be intolerable. The whole Arisotelian conception of the good is alive in this man who is a true man; he tells us the most sensitive and reasonable things about what it is worth sharing the good that is our love with. But what escapes him is perhaps the fact that precisely because we take that path we miss the opening on to jouissance.

It is in the nature of the good to be altruistic. But that's not the love of thy neighbor. Freud makes us feel this without articulating it fully. We will now attempt, without forcing anything, to do so in his stead.

We can found our case on the following, namely, that every time that Freud stops short in horror at the consequences of the commandment to love one's neighbor, we see evoked the presence of that fundamental evil which dwells within this neighbor. But if that is the case, then it also dwells within me. And what is more of a neighbor to me than this heart within which is that of my jouissance and which I don't dare go near? For as soon as I go near it, as Civilization and Its Discontents makes clear, there rises up the unfathomable aggressivity from which I flee, that I turn against me, and which in the very place of the vanished Law adds its weight to that which prevents me from crossing a certain frontier at the limit of the Thing.

As long as it's a question of the good, there's no problem; our own and our neighbor's are of the same material. Saint Martin shares his cloak, and a great deal is made of it. Yet it is after all a simple question of training; material is by its very nature made to be disposed of – it belongs to the other as much as it belongs to me. We are no doubt touching a primitive requirement in the need to be satisfied there, for the beggar is naked. But perhaps over and above that need to be clothed, he was begging for something else, namely, that Saint Martin either kill him or fuck him. In any encounter there's a big difference in meaning between the response of philanthropy and that of love.

It is in the nature of the useful to be utilized. If I can do something in less time and with less trouble than someone near me, I would instinctively do it in his place, in return for which I am damned for what I have to do for that most neighborly of neighbors who is inside me. I am damned for having assured him to whom it would cost more time and trouble than me, what precisely? – some measure of ease that only means something because I imagine that, if I had that ease or absence of work, I would make the best possible use of it. But it is far from proven that I would know how to do so, even if I had all the power required to satisfy myself. Perhaps I would simply be bored.

Consequently, by granting others such power, perhaps I am just leading them astray. I imagine their difficulties and their sufferings in the mirror of my own. It is certainly not imagination that I lack; it is, if anything, tenderness, namely, what might be called the difficult way, love for one's neighbor. And here again you may note how the trap of the same paradox occurs to us in connection with the so-called discourse of utilitarianism.

I began my lectures this year with the onerous topic of the utilitarians, but the utilitarians are quite right. They are countered with something that, in effect, only makes the task of countering them much more difficult, with a sentence such as "But, Mr. Bentham, my good is not the same as another's good, and your principle of the greatest good for the greatest number comes up against the demands of my egoism." But it's not true. My egoism is quite content with a certain altruism, altruism of the kind that is situated on the level of the useful. And it even becomes the pretext by means of which I can avoid taking up the problem of the evil I desire, and that my neighbor desires also. That is how I spend my life, by cashing in my time in a dollar zone, ruble zone or any other zone, in my neighbor's time, where all the neighbors are maintained equally at the marginal level of reality of my own existence. Under these conditions it is hardly surprising that everyone is sick, that civilization has its discontents.

It is a fact of experience that what I want is the good of others in the image of my own. That doesn't cost so much. What I want is the good of others provided that it remain in the image of my own. I would even say that the whole thing deteriorates so rapidly that it becomes: provided that it depend on my efforts. I don't even need to ask you to go very far into your patients' experience: if I wish for my spouse's happiness, I no doubt sacrifice my own, but who knows if her happiness isn't totally dissipated, too?

Perhaps the meaning of the love of one's neighbor that could give me the true direction is to be found here. To that end, however, one would have to know how to confront the fact that my neighbor's jouissance, his harmful, malignant jouissance, is that which poses a problem for my love.

It wouldn't be difficult at this point to take a leap in the direction of the excesses of the mystics. Unfortunately, many of their most notable qualities always strike me as somewhat puerile.

No doubt the question of beyond the pleasure principle, of the place of the unnameable Thing and of what goes on there, is raised in certain acts that provoke our judgment, acts of the kind attributed to a certain Angela de Folignio, who joyfully lapped up the water in which she had just washed the feet of lepers – I will spare you the details, such as the fact that a piece of skin stuck in her throat, etc. – or to the blessed Marie Allacoque, who, with no less a reward in spiritual uplift, ate the excrement of a sick man. The power of conviction of these no doubt edifying facts would vary quite a lot if the excrement in question were that of a beautiful girl or if it were a question of eating the come of a forward from your rugby team. In other words, the erotic side of things remains veiled in the above examples.

That is why I will have to back up a little. We are now on the threshold of exploring something which has after all attempted to break down the doors of the hell within. Its claim to do so is clearly much greater than ours. Yet it is our concern, too. And that is why, in order to show you step by step the ways in which access to the problem of jouissance may be envisaged, I will lead you through what someone by the name of Sade has had to say about it.

I would certainly need a couple of months to talk about Sadism. I will not talk about Sade as eroticist, for he is definitely an inferior eroticist. The path of jouissance with a woman is not necessarily to subject her to all the acts practiced on poor Justine. On the other hand, in the domain of the articulation of ethical questions, it seems to me that Sade has some very solid things to say, at least in connection with the problem that currently concerns us.

4

Before I take up the question next time, I would like to end today by making you sense this in connection with a contemporary example, namely, Kant's, which I have already devoted some time to – and it's not for nothing that it is contemporary with Sade.

In the example in question Kant claims to prove the weight of the Law, formulated by him as practical reason, as something that imposes itself in purely reasonable terms, that is to say, divorced from all pathological affect, as he puts it, which means with no motive that appeals to the subject's interest. This is a critical exercise that will bring us back to the very center of the problem we are addressing today.

Let me remind you that Kant's example is made up of two little stories. The first concerns the individual who is placed in the situation of being executed on his way out, if he wants to spend time with the lady whom he desires unlawfully – it's not a waste of time to emphasize this, because even the apparently simplest details constitute traps. The other case is that of someone who lives at the court of a despot and who is put in the position of either bearing false witness against someone who, as a result, will lose his life or of being put to death himself if he doesn't do it.

Thereupon, Kant, our dear Kant, tells us in all his innocence, his innocent subterfuge, that in the first case everyone, every man of good sense, will say no. For the sake of spending a night with a woman, no one would be mad enough to accept an outcome that would be fatal to him, since it isn't a question of combat but of death by hanging. For Kant, the answer to the question is not in doubt.

In the other case, whatever the degree of pleasure promised as a result of bearing false witness or whatever the harshness of the penalty following the refusal to bear such witness, one can at least assume that the subject stops to reflect for a moment. One might even conceive that, rather than bear false witness, the subject will envisage accepting his own death in the name of the so-called categorical imperative. In effect, if an assault on the goods, the life, or the honor of someone else were to become a universal rule, that would throw the whole of man's universe into a state of disorder and evil.

Can't we stop here and offer our critique?

The striking significance of the first example resides in the fact that the night spent with the lady is paradoxically presented to us as a pleasure that is weighed against a punishment to be undergone; it is an opposition which homogenizes them. There is in terms of pleasure a plus and a minus. I will not quote the worst examples – in his Essay on Negative Greatness, Kant discusses the feelings of the Spartan mother who learns of the death of her son on the field of honor. And the little mathematical calculation Kant makes concerning the pleasure the family derives from the glory, from which one has to deduct the pain felt at the boy's loss, is quite touching. But it is important to note that one only has to make a conceptual shift and move the night spent with the lady from the category of pleasure to that of jouissance, given that jouissance implies precisely the acceptance of death – and there's no need of sublimation – for the example to be ruined.

In other words, it is enough for jouissance to be a form of evil, for the whole thing to change its character completely, and for the meaning of the moral law itself to be completely changed. Anyone can see that if the moral law is, in effect, capable of playing some role here, it is precisely as a support for the jouissance involved; it is so that the sin becomes what Saint Paul calls inordinately sinful. That's what Kant on this occasion simply ignores.

Then there is the other example, whose little errors of logic should not, between ourselves, be overlooked. The circumstances involved are somewhat different. In the first case, pleasure and pain are presented as a single packet to take or leave, in consideration of which one avoids the risk and gives up jouissance. In the second case, there is pleasure or pain. It's not insignificant that I underline it, for this choice is destined to produce in you a certain effect of a fortiori, as a result of which you may be deceived about the real significance of the question.

What's at issue here? That I attack the rights of another who is my fellow man in that statement of the universal rule, or is it a question of the false witness as such?

And what if I changed the example a little? Let's talk about true witness, about a case of conscience which is raised if I am summoned to inform on my neighbor or my brother for activities which are prejudicial to the security of the state. That question is of a kind that shifts the emphasis placed on the universal rule.

And I who stand here right now and bear witness to the idea that there is no law of the good except in evil and through evil, should I bear such witness?

This Law makes my neighbor's jouissance the point on which, in bearing witness in this case, the meaning of my duty is balanced. Must I go toward my duty of truth insofar as it preserves the authentic place of my jouissance, even if it is empty? Or must I resign myself to this lie, which, by making me substitute forcefully the good for the principle of my jouissance, commands me to blow alternatively hot and cold? Either I refrain from betraying my neighbor so as to spare my fellow man or I shelter behind my fellow man so as to give up my jouissance.

March 20, 1960

XV

The jouissance of transgression

THE BARRIER TO JOUISSANCE
THE RESPECT OF THE IMAGE OF THE OTHER SADE, HIS FANTASM AND HIS DOCTRINE
METIPSEMUS FRAGMENTED AND INDESTRUCTIBLE

I announced that I would talk about Sade.

It is not without some vexation that I take up the subject today because of the break for the vacation, which will be a long one.

I would like at least during this lecture to clear up the misunderstanding that might occur because we are dealing with Sade, and it might be thought that that constitutes a wholly external way of looking upon ourselves as pioneers or militants embracing a radical position. Such a view implies that, as a result of our function or profession, we are destined to embrace extremes, so to speak, and that Sade in this respect is our progenitor or precursor, who supposedly opened up some impasse, aberration or aporia, in that domain of ethics we have chosen to explore this year, and that we would be well-advised to follow him.

It is very important to clear up that misunderstanding, which is related to a number of others I am struggling against in order to make some progress here before you.

The domain that we are exploring this year isn't interesting for us only in a purely external sense. I would even say that up to a certain point this field may involve a certain degree of boredom, even for such a faithful audience as you, and it's not to be neglected – it has its own significance. Naturally, since I am speaking to you, I try to interest you; that's part of the deal. But that mode of communication which binds us together isn't necessarily calculated to avoid something that the art of the teacher normally proscribes. When I compare two audiences, if I managed to interest the one in Brussels, so much the better, but it isn't at all in the same way that you here are interested in my teaching.

If I adopt for a moment the point of view of what one finds in the situation, not so much of the young analyst, as of the analyst beginning his practice – and it's such a humanly sensitive and valid position – I would say that it is conceivable that what I am attempting to articulate under the title of the ethics of psychoanalysis comes up against the domain of what might be called analysis's pastoral letter.

Even then I am ascribing to what I am aiming at its noble name, its eternal name. A less flattering name would be the one invented by one of the most unpleasant authors of our time, "intellectual comfort." The question of "How does one proceed?" may, in effect, lead to impatience and even disappointment, when one is faced with the need to approach things at a level, that, it seems, is not that of our technique on the basis of which a great many things are to be resolved – or such at least is the promise. A great many things perhaps, but not everything. And we shouldn't necessarily turn our eyes away from those things that our technique warns us constitute an impasse or even a gap, even if all the consequences of our action are in question.

As for this young person who is beginning his practice as an analyst, I would call what is involved here his skeleton; it will give his action a vertebrate solidarity, or the opposite of that movement toward a thousand forms which is always on the point of collapsing in on itself and of becoming caught up in a circle – something that a certain number of recent explorations give the image of.

It is, therefore, not a bad idea to expose the fact that something may degenerate from the expectation of assurance – which is doubtless of some use in the exercise of one's profession – into a form of sentimental assurance. It is as a result of this that those subjects whom I take to be at a crossroads in their existence turn into prisoners of an infatuation that is the source of both an inner disappointment and a secret demand.

And if we are to make any progress, this is what the perspective of the ethical ends of psychoanalysis, whose significance I am trying to demonstrate here, has to combat. It is something one encounters sooner rather than later.

1

Our path thus far has led us to a point that I will call the paradox of jouissance.

The paradox of jouissance introduces its problematic into that dialectic of happiness which we analysts have perhaps rashily set out to explore. We have grasped the paradox in more than one detail as something that emerges routinely in our experience. But in order to lead you to it and relate it to the thread of our discussion, I have chosen this time the path of the enigma of its relation to the Law. And this is something that is marked by the strangeness of the way the existence of this Law appears to us, as founded on the Other as I have long taught you.

In this we have to follow Freud; not the individual with his atheistic profession of faith, but the Freud who was the first to acknowledge the value and relevance of a myth that constituted for us an answer to a certain fact that was formulated for no particular reason, but that has wide currency and is fully articulated in the consciousness of our time – though it went unnoticed by the finest minds and even more so by the masses – I mean the fact we call the death of God.

That's the problematic with which we begin. It is there the sign appears that I presented to you in my graph in the form of S (O). Situated as you know in the upper left section, it signifies the final response to the guarantee asked of the Other concerning the meaning of that Law articulated in the depths of the unconscious. If there is nothing more than a lack, the Other is wanting, and the signifier is that of his death.

It is as a function of this position, which is itself dependent on the paradox of the Law, that the paradox of jouissance emerges. This I will now try to explain.

We should note that only Christianity, through the drama of the passion, gives a full content to the naturalness of the truth we have called the death of God. Indeed, with a naturalness beside which the approaches to it represented by the bloody combats of the gladiators pale. Christianity, in effect, offers a drama that literally incarnates that death of God. It is also Christianity that associates that death with what happened to the Law; namely, that without destroying that Law, we are told, but in substituting itself for it, in summarizing it, and raising it up in the very movement that abolishes it – thus offering the first weighty historical example of the German notion of Aufhebung, i.e., the conservation of something destroyed at a different level – the only commandment is henceforth "Thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself."

The whole thing is articulated as such in the Gospel, and it is there that we will continue on our way. The two notions, the death of God and the love of one's neighbor, are historically linked; and one cannot overlook that fact unless one attributes to everything that occurred in history in the Judeo-Christian tradition as constitutionally just a matter of chance.

I am aware of the fact that the message of the believers is that there is a resurrection in the afterlife, but that's simply a promise. That's the space through which we have to make our way. It is thus appropriate if we stop in this pass, in this narrow passage where Freud himself stops and retreats in understandable horror. "Thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself," is a commandment that seems inhuman to him.

Everything he finds objectional is summed up in this phrase. As the examples he cites confirm, it is in the name of the most legitimate ἐυδαιμονία on all levels that he stops and rightly acknowledges, when he reflects on the commandment's meaning, the extent to which the historical spectacle of a humanity that chose it as its ideal is quite unconvincing, when that ideal is measured against actual accomplishments.

I have already referred to what it is that arouses Freud's horror, arouses the horror of the civilized man he essentially was. It derives from the evil in which he doesn't hestitate to locate man's deepest heart.

I don't really need to emphasize the point where I bring my two threads together to form a knot. Man's rebellion is involved here, the rebellion of Jederman, of everyman, insofar as he aspires to happiness. The truth that man seeks happiness remains true. The resistance to the commandment "Thou shalt love they neighbor as thyself" and the resistance that is exercised to prevent his access to jouissance are one and the same thing.

Stated thus, this may seem an additional paradox, a gratuitous assertion. Yet don't you recognize there what we refer to in the most routine way each time we see a subject retreat from his own jouissance? What are we drawing attention to? To the unconscious aggression that jouissance contains, to the frightening core of the destrudo, which, in spite of all our feminine affectations and quibbles, we constantly find ourselves confronting in our analytical experience.

Whether or not this view is ratified in the name of some preconceived view of nature, it is nevertheless true that at the heart of everything Freud taught, one finds the following: the energy of the so-called superego derives from the aggression that the subject turns back upon himself.

Freud goes out of his way to add the supplementary notion that, once one has entered on that path, once the process has been begun, then there is no longer any limit; it generates ever more powerful aggression in the self. It generates it at the limit, that is to say, insofar as the mediation of the Law is lacking. Of the Law insofar as it comes from elsewhere, from the elsewhere, moreover, where its guarantor is lacking, the guarantor who provides its warranty, namely, God himself.

To say that the retreat from "Thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself" is the same thing as the barrier to jouissance, and not its opposite, is, therefore, not an original proposition.

I retreat from loving my neighbor as myself because there is something on the horizon there that is engaged in some form of intolerable cruelty. In that sense, to love one's neighbor may be the cruelest of choices.

That, then, is the nicely whetted edge of the paradox I am asserting here. No doubt in order to give it its full weight, one should take it step by step, so that by understanding the way in which that intimate line of demarcation appears, we may not so much know as feel the ups and downs to be found on its path.

We have, of course, long learned to recognize in our analytical experience the jouissance of trangression. But we are far from knowing what its nature might be. In this respect our position is ambiguous. Everybody knows that we have restored full civil rights to perversion. We have dubbed it a component drive, thereby employing the idea that it harmonizes with a totality, and at the same time shedding suspicion on the research, which was revolutionary at a certain moment in the nineteenth century, of Krafft-Ebing with his monumental Psychopathia Sexualis, or also on the work of Havelock Ellis.

Incidentally, I don't want to fail to give the latter's work the kind of thumbs down I think it deserves. It offers amazing examples of a lack of systematicity – not the failure of a method, but the choice of a failed method. The so-called scientific objectivity that is exhibited in books that amount to no more than a random collection of documents offers a living example of the combination of a certain "foolery" with the sort of "knavery," a fundamental knavery, that I invoked last time as the characteristic of a certain kind of thought known as left-wing, without excluding the possibility of its spreading its stain to other domains. In short, if I recommend reading Havelock Ellis, it is simply in order to show you the difference, not just in results but in tone, that exists between such a futile mode of investigation and what Freud's thought and experience reintroduce into the domain – it's simply a question of responsibility.

We are familiar with the jouissance of transgression, then. But what does it consist of? Does it go without saying that to trample sacred laws under foot, laws that may be directly challenged by the subject's conscience, itself excites some form of jouissance? We no doubt constantly see the strange development in a subject that might be described as the testing of a faceless fate or as a risk that, once it has been survived by the subject, somehow guarantees him of his power. Doesn't the Law that is defied here play the role of a means, of a path cleared that leads straight to the risk? Yet if the path is necessary, what is the risk that is involved? What is the goal jouissance seeks if it has to find support in transgression to reach it?

I leave these questions open for the moment so as to move on. If the subject turns back on his tracks, what is it that guides this backtracking? On this point, we find a more motivated response in analysis; we are told that it is the identification with the other that arises at the extreme moment in one of our temptations. And by extreme here I do not mean it has to do with extraordinary temptations, but with the moment when one perceives their consequences.

We retreat from what? From assaulting the image of the other, because it was the image on which we were formed as an ego. Here we find the convincing power of altruism. Here, too, is the leveling power of a certain law of equality – that which is formulated in the notion of the general will. The latter is no doubt the common denominator of the respect for certain rights – which, for a reason that escapes me, are called elementary rights – but it can also take the form of excluding from its boundaries, and therefore from its protection, everything that is not integrated into its various registers.

And the power of expansion is also seen in what I expressed last time as the utilitarian tendency. At this level of homogenization, the law of utility, as that which implies its distribution over the greatest number, imposes itself in a form that is effectively innovative. It is an enchanting power, scorn for which is sufficiently indicated in the eyes of us analysts when we call it philanthropy, but which also raises the questions of the natural basis of pity in the sense implied by that morality of feeling which has always sought its foundation there.

We are, in effect, at one with everything that depends on the image of the other as our fellow man, on the similarity we have to our ego and to everything that situates us in the imaginary register. What is the question I am raising here, when it seems to be obvious that the very foundation of the law "Thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself" is to be found there?

It is indeed the same other that is concerned here. Yet one only has to stop for a moment to see how obvious and striking the practical contradictions are – individual, inner contradictions as well as social ones – of the idealization expressed relative to the respect that I formulated for the image of the other. It implies a certain continuity and filiation of problematic effects on the religious law, which is expressed and manifested historically by the paradoxes of its extremes, i.e., the extremes of saintliness, and moreover by its failure on the social level, insofar as it never manages to achieve fulfillment, reconciliation, or the establishment on earth of what is promised by it.

To emphasize the point even more strongly, I will refer directly to something that seems to be opposed to this denunciation of the image, that is to the statement which is always listened to with a kind of more-or-less amused purr of satisfaction, "God made man in his own image." Religious tradition once again reveals more cunning in pointing to the truth than the approach of psychological philosophy imagines.

You can't get away with answering that man no doubt paid God back in kind. The statement in question is of the same inspiration, the same body, as the holy book in which is expressed the prohibition on forging images of God. If this prohibition has a meaning, it is that images are deceitful.

Why is that? Let's go to what is simplest: if these are beautiful images – and goodness only knows that religious images always correspond by definition to reigning canons of beauty – one doesn't notice that they are always hollow images. Moreover, man, too, as image is interesting for the hollow the image leaves empty – by reason of the fact that one doesn't see in the image, beyond the capture of the image, the emptiness of God to be discovered. It is perhaps man's plenitude, but it is also there that God leaves him with emptiness.

Now God's power resides in the capacity to advance into emptiness. All of that gives us the figures of the apparatus of a domain in which the recognition of another reveals itself as an adventure. The meaning of the word recognition tends toward that which it assumes in every exploration, with all the accents of militancy and of nostalgia we can invest in it.

Sade is at this limit.

2

Sade is at this limit, and insofar as he imagines going beyond it, he teaches us that he cultivates its fantasm with all the morose enjoyment – I will come back to this phrase – that is manifest in that fantasm.

In imagining it, he proves the imaginary structure of the limit. But he also goes beyond it. He doesn't, of course, go beyond it in his fantasm, which explains its tedious character, but in his theory, in the doctrine he advances in words that at different moments in the work express the jouissance of destruction, the peculiar virtue of crime, evil sought for evil's sake, and, in the last instance, the Supreme-Being-in-Evil – a strange reference made by the character of Saint-Fond, who proclaims in The Story of Juliette his renewed but not particularly new belief in this God.

This theory is called in the same work the System of Pius VI, the Pope who is introduced as one of the characters in the novel. Taking things even further, Sade lays out a vision of Nature as a vast system of attraction and repulsion of evil by evil. Under these circumstances the ethical stance consists in realizing to the most extreme point this assimilation to absolute evil, as a consequence of which its integration into a fundamentally wicked nature will be realized in a kind of inverted harmony.

I am just pointing to something that appears not as stages of thought in search of a paradoxical formulation, but much more as its wrenching apart, its collapse, in the course of a development that created its own impasse.

Can't one nevertheless say that Sade teaches us, in the order of symbolic play, how to attempt to go beyond the limit, and how to discover the laws of one's neighbor's space as such? The space in question is that which is formed when we have to do not with this fellow self whom we so easily turn into our reflection, and whom we necessarily implicate in the same misrecognitions that characterize our own self, but this neighbor who is closest to us, the neighbor whom we sometimes take in our arms, if only to make love to. I am not speaking here of ideal love, but of the act of making love.

We know well how the images of the self may frustrate our propulsion into that space. Don't we have something to learn about the laws of this space from the man who enters it with his atrocious discourse, given that the imaginary capture by the image of one's fellow man functions as a lure there?

You can see where I am taking you. At the precise point to which I attach our inquiry, I am not prejudging what the other is. I simply emphasize the lures of one's fellow man because it is from this fellow as such that the misrecognitions which define me as a self are born. And I will just stop for a moment and refer to a little fable in which you will recognize my personal touch.

I once spoke to you about a mustard pot. If I draw three pots here, I simply demonstrate that you have a whole row of mustard or jam pots. They stand on shelves and are numerous enough to satisfy your contemplative appetites. Note that it is insofar as the pots are identical that they are irreducible. Thus at this level we come up against the condition of individuation. And that's as far as the problem usually goes, namely, that there is this one, which isn't that one.

Naturally, the affected quality of this little trick doesn't escape me. But do try to understand the truth it hides, like all sophisms. I don't know if you have noticed that the etymology of the French word même (self) is none other than metipsemus, which makes this même in moi-même redundant. The phonetic evolution is from metipsemus to même – that which is most myself in myself, that which is at the heart of myself, and beyond me, insofar as the self stops at the level of those walls to which one can apply a label. What in French at least serves to designate the notion of self or same (même), then, is this interior or emptiness, and I don't know if it belongs to me or to nobody.

That's what the use of my sophism signifies; it reminds me that my neighbor possesses all the evil Freud speaks about, but it is no different from the evil I retreat from in myself. To love him, to love him as myself, is necessarily to move toward some cruelty. His or mine?, you will object. But haven't I just explained to you that nothing indicates they are distinct? It seems rather that they are the same, on condition that those limits which oblige me to posit myself opposite the other as my fellow man are crossed.

And here I should make my approach clear. Panic drunkenness, sacred orgy, the flagellants of the cults of Attis, the Bacchantes of the tragedy of Euripides, in short, all that remote Dionysionism lost in a history to which reference has been made since the nineteenth century with the expectation of restoring, beyond Hegel, Kierkegaard and Nietzsche, the vestiges still available to us of the sphere of the great Pan, in an apologetic, utopian and apocalyptic form that was condemned by Kierkegaard and not less effectively by Nietzsche – that's not what I mean when I speak of the sameness (mêmeté) of someone else and myself. That is by the way why I finished the seminar before last with the evocation of the statement that is correlative to the rending of the veil of the temple, namely, Great Pan is dead.

I will say no more today. It's not just a question of my prophesying in my turn, but I will take an appointment with you for the time when I will have to try to justify why and from what the Great Pan died, and at the precise moment no doubt that the legend points to.

3

It is Sade's approach that concerns us now, insofar as it points the way to my neighbor's space in connection with what I will call – thereby paraphrasing the title of the work of his that is called Ideas on the Novel – the idea of a technique oriented toward a sexual jouissance that is not sublimated.

This idea shows us all kinds of lines of divergence, to the point that it gives rise to the idea of difficulty. Consequently, it will be necessary for us to evaluate the scope of the literary work as such. And isn't that quite a detour, which will definitely set us back again, and haven't I been criticized for being slow for some time now?

To finish rapidly with this further refinement, I will need to evoke several directions from which Sade's work may be grasped, if only to indicate the one that I am choosing.

Is this work a form of witness? A conscious or unconscious witness? Don't think in terms of the psychoanalytic unconscious here; I mean by "unconsious" here the fact that the subject Sade wasn't fully aware of the conditions in which he as nobleman found himself, during the period from the beginning of the French Revolution and down through the Terror, which he was to live through only to be banished to the asylum at Charenton, apparently at the will of the First Consul.

In truth, Sade seems to me to have been fully aware of the relationship of his work to the attitudes of the type I called the man of pleasure. The man of pleasure as such bears witness against himself, by publicly confessing the extremes to which he may go. The great joy with which he recalls the emergence of this tradition historically is a clear sign of the point the master always reaches when he doesn't bow his head before the being of God.

There is no reason to hide in any way the realistic side of Sade's atrocities. Their developed, insistent, extravagant character is so obvious and constitutes such a challenge to credibility that the idea that this is an ironic discourse becomes quite plausible. It is nevertheless true that the things involved are commonly found in the works of Suetonius, Dion Cassius and others. Read the Memoirs on the Great Days in Auvergne by Esprit Fléchier, if you want to learn what a great Lord at the beginning of the seventeenth century could get up to with his peasants.

We would be quite wrong to think that, in the name of the self-restraint the fascinations of the imaginary impose on our weakness, men are incapable in certain situations of transgressing given limits without knowing what they are doing.

In this connection, Freud helps us out with that absolute lack of subterfuge, that total absence of "knavery" that characterizes him, when he doesn't hesitate to make the point in Civilization and Its Discontents that there is nothing in common between the satisfaction a jouissance affords in its original state and that which it gives in the indirect or even sublimated forms that civilization obliges it to assume.

In one place he doesn't disguise his view of the fact that those jouissances which are forbidden by conventional morality are nevertheless perfectly accessible and accepted by certain people, who live under a given set of conditions and whom he points to, namely, those whom we call the rich – and it is doubtless the case that, in spite of obstacles that are familiar to us, they sometimes make the most of their opportunities.

To make things clear, let me use this passage to make an incidental remark, similar to the remarks Freud makes on the subject, but that are often omitted or neglected. The security of jouissance for the rich in our time is greatly increased by what I will call the universal legislation of work. Just imagine what social conflicts were like in times past. Try to find something equivalent nowadays not at the frontiers of our societies, but within them.

And now a point on the value of Sade's work as witness of reality. Shall we investigate its value as sublimation? If we consider sublimation in its most developed form, indeed in the fiercest and most cynical form in which Freud took pleasure in representing it, namely, as the transformation of the sexual instinct into a work in which everyone will recognize his own dreams and impulses, and will reward the artist for having given him that satisfaction by granting the latter a fuller and happier life – and for giving him in addition access to the satisfaction of the instinct involved from the beginning – if we seek to grasp the work of Sade from this perspective, then it's something of a failure.

It's something of a failure, if one thinks of the amount of time poor Sade spent either in prison or interned in special institutions. As for the work itself, at least The New Justine along with The Story of Juliette had a great deal of success during his lifetime in an underground form, a success of the night, a success of the damned. But I won't insist on that here. If I refer to it, it is so as to cast some light on those sides of Sade that are worth illuminating.

Let us now try to see how we should situate Sade's work. It has been called an unsurpassable body of work, in the sense that it achieves an absolute of the unbearable in what can be expressed in words relative to the transgression of all human limits. One can acknowledge that in no other literature, at no other time, has there been such a scandalous body of work. No one else has done such deep injury to the feelings and thoughts of mankind. At a time when Henry Miller's stories make us tremble, who would dare rival the licentiousness of Sade? One might indeed claim that we have there the most scandalous body of work ever written. Thus, as Maurice Blanchot puts it, "Isn't that a reason for us to be interested in it?"

And we are interested in just that way here. I urge you to make the effort to read the book in which two articles by Blanchot on Lautréamont and Sade are to be found. They constitute a part of the material to be put in our file.

That is certainly saying a lot then. It seems, in fact, as if one cannot conceive of an atrocity that isn't to be found in Sade's catalogue. The assault on one's sensibility is of a kind that is literally stupefying; in other words, one loses one's bearings. As far as this is concerned, one might even say that the effect in question is achieved artlessly, without any consideration for an economy of means, but through the accumulation of details and perepetia, to which is added a whole stuffing of treatises and rationalizations whose contradictions are of particular interest to us and that we can analyze in detail.

It takes a crude mind to assume that the treatises are simply there to make the erotic passages acceptable. Even minds that are far subtler have attributed to such treatises, dubbed digressions, a loss of suggestive tension on the level that the subtler minds in question – I am thinking of Georges Bataille – consider to be that of the works' true value, namely, their power to open up the possibility of the assumption of being on the level of immorality.

That's a mistake. The real problem is something else. It is nothing else but the response of a being, whether reader or writer, at the approach to a center of incandescence or an absolute zero that is physically unbearable. The fact that the book falls from one's hands no doubt proves that it is bad, but literary badness here is perhaps the guarantee of the very badness or mauvaisité, as it was still called in the eighteenth century, that is the object of our investigation. As a consequence, Sade's work belongs to the order of what I shall call experimental literature. The work of art in this case is an experiment that through its action cuts the subject loose from his psychosocial moorings – or to be more precise, from all psychosocial appreciation of the sublimation involved.

There is no better example of such a work than the one which I hope some of you at least are addicted to – addicted to in the same sense as "addicted to opium" – namely, the Songs of Maldoror by Lautréamont. And it is only fitting if Maurice Blanchot combines the points of view he presents us with on these two authors.

But with Sade the social reference is retained, and he claims to valorize socially his extravagant system, whence his astonishing avowals that suggest incoherence and lead to a multiple contradiction, which one would be wrong to ascribe purely and simply to the absurd. The absurd has recently become a somewhat too convenient category. One respects the dead, but I can't avoid noting the indulgence shown by a certain Nobel Prize winner to all the mumbo jumbo on the topic.[1] That prize is a wonderful universal reward for "knav-ery"; its honor roll bears the stigmata of a form of abjection in our culture.

[1] The reference is to Albert Camns, who received the Nobel Prize for literature in 1957.

By way of conclusion, I will focus on two terms that point to the next stage in our project.

When one approaches that central emptiness, which up to now has been the form in which access to jouissance has presented itself to us, my neighbor's body breaks into pieces. Proclaiming the law of jouissance as the foundation of some ideally utopian social system, Sade expresses himself in italics in the nice little edition of Juliette published recently by Pauvert, though it is still a book that circulates surreptiously: "Lend me the part of your body that will give me a moment of satisfaction and, if you care to, use for your own pleasure that part of my body which appeals to you."

We find in this formulation of the fundamental law, which expresses the side of Sade's social system that claims to be socially viable, the first considered manifestation of something that we psychaoanlysts have come to know as part object.

But when the notion of part object is articulated in that way, we imply that this part object only wants to be reintegrated into the object, into the already valorized object, the object of our love and tenderness, the object that brings together within it all the virtues of the so-called genital stage. Yet we should consider the problem a little differently; we should notice that this object is necessarily in a state of independence in a field that we take to be central as if by convention. The total object, our neighbor, is silhouetted there, separate from us and rising up, if I may say so, like the image of Carpaccio's San Giorgio degli Schiavone in Venice, in the midst of a charnel house figure.

The second term that Sade teaches us concerns that which appears in the fantasm as the indestructible character of the Other, and emerges in the figure of his victim.

Whether in Justine itself or in a certain Sadean posterity that is less than distinguished, namely, that erotic or pornographic posterity, which recently produced one of its finest works, The Story of O-, the victim survives the worst of her ordeals, and she doesn't even suffer in her sensual power of attraction, that the author never ceases evoking, as is always the case in such descriptions; she always has the prettiest eyes in the world, the most pathetic and touching appearance. That the author always insists on placing his subjects under such a stereotyped heading poses a problem in itself.

It seems that whatever happens to the subject is incapable of spoiling the image in question, incapable even of wearing it out. But Sade, who is different in character from those who offer us these entertaining little stories, goes further, since we see emerge in him in the distance the idea of eternal punishment. I will come back to this point, because it amounts to a strange contradiction in a writer who wants nothing of himself to survive, who doesn't even want any part of the site of his tomb to remain accessible to men, but wants it instead to be covered with bracken. Doesn't that indicate that he locates in the fantasm the content of the most intimate part of himself, which we have called the neighbor, or in other words the metipsemus?

I will finish my lecture today on a point of detail. By what deep attachments is it that a certain relationship to the Other, that we call Sadistic, reveals its true connection to the psychology of the obsessional? – the obsessional, whose defenses take the form of an iron frame, of a rigid mold, a corset, in which he remains and locks himself up, so as to stop himself having access to that which Freud somewhere calls a horror he himself doesn't know.

March 30, 1960

PARENTHESIS

The Death Drive According to Bernfeld

You will not be hearing the continuation of my last lecture today. You will not be hearing it for personal reasons.

The break occasioned by the vacation was used by me to prepare an article for the next issue of our periodical, which is devoted to structure, and it took me back to an earlier period of my thinking. It also broke my rhythm relative to the subject I am exploring with you, namely, the deeper dimension of analytical thought, work and technique that I am calling ethics.

I read over what I said last time, and, believe me, it's not bad at all. It is because I want to stay at that level that I will postpone the continuation until next time.

We have at present reached that barrier beyond which the analytical Thing is to be found, the place where brakes are applied, where the inaccessibility of the object as object of jouissance is organized. It is in brief the place where the battlefield of our experience is situated. This crucial point is at the same time the new element psychoanalysis brings, however inaccessible it may be in the field of ethics.

In order to compensate for that inaccessibility, all individual sublimation is projected beyond that barrier, along with the sublimations of the systems of knowledge, including – why not? – that of analytical knowledge itself.

That's something I will probably be obliged to articulate for you next time; that is to say, the last word of Freud's thought, and especially that concerning the death drive, appears in the field of analytical thought as a sublimation.

From this point of view, it seemed to me to be useful, by way of a parenthesis, to give you the background against which this notion might be formulated. In the usual spirit of a seminar, I have, therefore, asked Mr. Kaufmann to summarize for us what the representatives of a good psychoanalytic generation, namely, Bernfeld and his collaborator Freitelberg, thought up on the subject of the meaning of the drive, so as to try to give it its fullest extension in the scientific context of the time, where they believe it should be situated.

As a result, you will learn about a moment in the history of psychoanalytic thought today. You know the importance I attach to such moments, precisely because in their very aporia I often teach you to find an authentic ridge in the land across which we are traveling.

You will see the difficulties encountered by Bernfeld in his attempt to insert the death drive in a theory of energy that is no doubt already dated, but that is definitely that of the context in which Freud was speaking. Mr. Kaufmann has made a great many helpful comments on the common fund of scientific notions from which Freud borrowed some of his terms, terms that we misread simply by taking them as is, and limiting ourselves to Freud's enunciation of them alone. It is, of course, true that their internal coherence gives them their meaning, but knowing from which period discourse they were borrowed is never futile. [Mr. Kaufmann's presentation follows]

I would like to thank Mr. Kaufmann emphatically for having helped us to unravel the chain of reflections represented by these three essential articles of Bernfeld's.

If to some of you – and I hope that such is the case with as few as possible – the whole thing may have seemed to be a mere detour relative to the overall plan of our research, it is certainly not an hors-d'oeuvre. If the death drive in Freud encounters in Bernfeld's work the objection that it supposedly teaches us nothing about the phenomenon from within, you will see that it teaches us a lot about the space in which Freud's thought moves. In a word, you have heard enough to know that this dimension is, properly speaking, that of the subject. It is the necessary condition for the natural phenomenon of the instinct in entropy to be taken up at the level of the person, so that it may take on the value of an oriented instinct and is significant for the system insofar as the latter as a whole is situated in an ethical dimension.

We would be wrong to be surprised, otherwise this would be neither the method nor the therapeutic nor indeed ascetic way, of our analytical experience.

April 27, 1960

XVI

The death drive

MARX AND THE PROGRESSIVES JOUISSANCE, THE SATISFACTION OF A DRIVE
THE SYSTEM OF POPE PIUS VI
CREATIONISM AND EVOLUTIONISM WOMAN AS EX NIHILO

I wouldn't want to begin my seminar today without telling you briefly what I didn't have time to tell you yesterday at the meeting of our Society.

We heard a remarkable paper, given by someone who wasn't trying to revolutionize the field of hysteria, and who wasn't in a position to bring us an immense or original body of experience, since the person involved is only just beginning his career in psychoanalysis; nevertheless, his very complete and, as was noted, perhaps overly rich presentation was extremely well articulated.

That doesn't mean that it was perfect. And if I had felt it necessary to force the issue by intervening after the somewhat premature termination of the discussion, I would certainly have rectified certain points made concerning the relations of the hysteric to the ego ideal and the ideal ego, notably in the element of uncertainty in the linking of these two functions.

But that isn't important. A presentation of the kind in question reveals how the categories that I have been striving to promote in this seminar for years prove to be useful and allow one to articulate things with some precision. They shed a light that is adequate to the limits of our experience. And however much one may take issue with some point of detail or other, you can see the theoretical concepts come alive as if by themselves, and make contact with the level of experience.

We have spoken about the relations between the hysteric and the signifier. In our clincial experience we can feel its presence at every moment, and last night you were presented with what might well be called a well-oiled machine that started working before your very eyes. So many points were presented to the test of experience, but the whole brought you into direct contact with the convergence of the theoretical notions I have given you and the structure that concerns us, namely, a structure that is defined by the fact that the subject is to be situated in the signifier. Directly in front of us, we see appear the "It speaks."[1]

The "It speaks" derived from theory joins everyday clinical experience.

We saw the hysteric come alive in her own sphere, and not by reference to obscure forces that are unevenly divided in a space that is not moreover homogeneous – the latter is typical of a discourse that only claims to be analytical. The reason it can only claim to be analytical is that it alienates itself in all kinds of references to sciences that are altogether worthy in their own domain, but which are often only involved by the theorist so as to mask his clumsiness in moving about in his own sphere.

This is not simply a form of homage paid to the work you heard, nor is it a simple hors-d'oeuvre to what I am attempting with you, but a reminder that I am trying with all the means at my disposal, which are simply those of experience, to make the ethical dimension of psychoanalysis come alive before you.

1

I don't claim to do anything more this year than I have done in years past in the form of a progressive development – from the first reference to speech and to language up to the attempt last year to define the function of desire in the economy of our experience – that is guided by Freudian thought.

In this discussion of Freud's thought I do not proceed like a professor. The usual approach of professors to the thought of those who happen to have taught us something in the course of human history generally consists in formulating it in such a way that it can only be seen from its narrowest and most partial side. Hence the impression of taking in deep breaths one always has when one goes directly to the original texts – I am, of course, referring to texts that are worthwhile.

One never goes beyond Descartes, Kant, Marx, Hegel and a few others because they mark a line of inquiry, a true orientation. One never goes beyond Freud either. Nor does one attempt to measure his contribution quantitatively, draw up a balance sheet – what's the point of that? One uses him. One moves around within him. One takes one's bearings from the direction he points in. What I am offering you here is an attempt to articulate the essence of an experience that has been guided by Freud. It is in no way an effort to measure the volume of his contribution or summarize him.

[1] "Le ça parle." "Le ça" is the everyday French word Lacan prefers to translate "das Es." That is why "it" seems more appropriate in this particular context than "Id."

That the ethical dimension is the stuff of our experience is revealed to us in the implicit deviations in ethics that appear in the so-called objectifying notions which have been gradually laid down through the different periods of analytical thought. Isn't an implicit ethical notion contained in the concept of the offering that you often see me criticize here? Don't those unformulated, scarcely acknowledged, yet often explicit goals that are expressed in the notion of remaking the subject's ego or of accomplishing through analysis the restructuring of the subject's ego – not to speak of reformation or reform with all its implications in analysis – don't they all imply an ethical dimension? I just want to show you that it doesn't correspond to the reality of our experience, to the real dimensions in which the ethical problem is posed. Freud suggests as much through the particular orientation he has opened up for us.

Thus by leading you on to the ground of the ethics of psychoanalysis this year, I have brought you up against a certain limit that I illustrated through a confrontation, or heightening of the difference by contrast, of Kant and Sade, however paradoxical that may seem. I have led you to the point of apocalypse or of revelation of something called transgression.

This point of transgression has a significant relation to something that is involved in our inquiry into ethics, that is to say, the meaning of desire. And my discussions of previous years have taught you to make a strict distinction between desire and need in Freudian experience, which is also our own daily experience. There is no way one can reduce desire in order to make it emerge, emanate, from the dimension of need. That provides you with the framework in which our research progresses.

Let me come back to something which has a contingent character in the comments I have made to you. In a byway of one of my lectures, I made a paradoxical and even whimsical excursion on the topic of two figures that I set in opposition to one another, those of the left-wing intellectual and the right-wing intellectual.

By using these two terms in a certain register and by setting them up in opposition to each other, I might have seemed to bear witness to that imprudence which encourages indifference on political questions. In brief, it turned out that I was criticized for having emphasized in terms I chose with some care that Freud wasn't a progressive – yet I did go out of my way to say that Freud's ethics in Civilization and Its Discontents were humanitarian, which is not exactly to say that he was a reactionary.

The remarks made struck some as dangerous, although their accuracy was not, in fact, challenged. I was surprised that something of the kind was said to me, and especially given the political orientation from which it came. To those who may have been similarly surprised, I would encourage them to take the time to look these things up by reading certain short works – that's always a valuable exercise, if one wants to check up on the movements of one's feelings.

I have brought one such work today. It is the first volume of Karl Marx's Philosophical Works, translated by Molitor, and published by Alfred Coste. I encourage those concerned to read, for example, "The Contribution to the Critique of Hegel's Philosophy of Law," or quite simply that curious little work called "The Jewish Question." Perhaps they would get a more precise notion of what Marx would think, if he were alive now, about what is called progressivism; and I mean by that a certain style of ideology, characterized by its generosity and apparently widespread in our bourgeoisie. The way in which Marx would evaluate such progressivism will be apparent to all those who look up those sources I just mentioned; they are a good, healthy standard of a certain kind of intellectual honesty.

Thus, in saying Freud was not a progressive, I didn't at all want to say, for example, that he wasn't interested in the Marxist experience. But it is nevertheless a fact that he wasn't a progressive. I am not imputing things of a political nature to Freud in saying that; it is just that he did not share certain types of bourgeois prejudice.

However, it is also a fact that Freud wasn't a Marxist. I didn't emphasize that because I don't really see the interest or the ramifications of it. I will reserve for later a discussion of the interest that the dimension opened up by Freud might have for Marxism. This point will be much more difficult to introduce, since up to now no one among the Marxists seems to have noticed particularly – if it is true that Marxists still exist – the meaning embodied in the experience opened up by Freud.

Marx takes up the tradition of a thought that culminated in the work which was the object of his perspicacious comments, namely, Hegel's Philosophy of Law – a work that articulates something that, as far as I know, we are still immersed in, namely, the foundation of the State, of the bourgeois State, which lays down the rules of a human organization founded on need and reason. Marx makes us see the biased, partial and incomplete character of the solution given in this framework. He shows that the harmony between need and reason is at this level only an abstract and dissociated solution.

Need and reason are harmonized only in law, but everyone is left a victim of the egoism of his private needs, of anarchy and of materialism. Marx aspires to the creation of a State where, as he puts it, human emancipation will be not only political but real, a State where man will find himself in a non-alienated relation to his own organization.

Now you know that, in spite of the openings that history has given to the direction pointed to by Marx, we don't seem to have produced integral man yet. On this road, Freud shows us – and it is in this sense that he doesn't go beyond Marx – that, however far the articulation of the problem has been taken by the tradition of classical philosophy, the two terms of reason and of need are insufficient to permit an understanding of the domain involved when it is a question of human self-realization. It is in the structure itself that we come up against a certain difficulty, which is nothing less than the function of desire, as I have articulated it in this seminar.

It is a curious and even paradoxical fact – but analytical experience can be registered in no other way – that reason, discourse, signifying articulation as such, is there from the beginning, ab ovo; it is there in an unconscious form before the birth of anything as far as human experience is concerned. It is there buried, unknown, not mastered, not available to him who is its support. And it is relative to a situation structured in this way that man at a subsequent moment has to situate his needs. Man's captivity in the field of the unconscious is primordial, fundamental in character. Now, because this field is organized logically from the beginning, it embodies a Spaltung, which persists in the whole subsequent development; and it is in relation to this Spaltung that the functioning of desire as such is to be articulated. This desire reveals certain ridges, a certain sticking point, and it is for this reason that Freudian experience has found that man's route to the integration of self is a complicated one.

The problem involved is that of jouissance, because jouissance presents itself as buried at the center of a field and has the characteristics of inaccessibility, obscurity and opacity; moreover, the field is surrounded by a barrier which makes access to it difficult for the subject to the point of inaccessibility, because jouissance appears not purely and simply as the satisfaction of a need but as the satisfaction of a drive – that term to be understood in the context of the complex theory I have developed on this subject in this seminar.

As you were told last time, the drive as such is something extremely complex for anyone who considers it conscientiously and tries to understand Freud's articulation of it. It isn't to be reduced to the complexity of the instinct as understood in the broadest sense, in the sense that relates it to energy. It embodies a historical dimension whose true significance needs to be appreciated by us.

This dimension is to be noted in the insistence that characterizes its appearances; it refers back to something memorable because it was remembered. Remembering, "historicizing," is coextensive with the functioning of the drive in what we call the human psyche. It is there, too, that destruction is registered, that it enters the register of experience.

This is something that I will now attempt to illustrate by leading you into the sphere, not so much of the myth of Sade (the term is inappropriate) but of the fable of Sade.

2

On page seventy-eight of Volume IV of Juliette in the edition that is most easily accessible to you, namely, Jean-Jacques Pauvert's, Sade expounds the System of Pope Pius VI, since it is to this pope that the theories in question are imputed.

Sade lays out for our benefit the theory that it is through crime that man collaborates in the new creations of nature. The idea is that the pure force of nature is obstructed by its own forms, that because the three realms present fixed forms they bind nature to a limited cycle, that is, moreover, manifestly imperfect, as is demonstrated by the chaos and abundance of conflicts as well as the fundamental disorder of their reciprocal relations. As a result, the deepest concern that can be imputed to this psychic subject that is Nature is that of wanting to wipe the slate clean, so that it may begin its task once more, set out again with a new burst of energy.

This discussion is completely literary, in the sense that it is not scientifically founded, but is rather poetic in character. In this luxuriant hodge-podge, from time to time one comes across what some people might take to be tedious digressions. But as you will see, they are entertaining to read. Thus, although reading always risks distracting one's audience's attention, I am going to read a passage from Sade's system:

> Without destruction the earth would receive no nourishment and, as a result, there would be no possibility for man to reproduce his species. It is no doubt a fateful truth, since it proves in an invincible way that the vices and virtues of our social system are nothing, and that the very vices are more necessary than the virtues, because they are creative and the virtues are merely created; or, if you prefer, the vices are causes and the virtues no more than effects. . . . A too perfect harmony would thus be a greater disadvantage than disorder; and if war, discord and crime were banished from the earth, the power of the three realms would be too violent and would destroy in its turn all the other laws of nature. The celestial bodies would all stop. Their influences would be halted by the excessive power of one of them; there would be neither gravitation nor movement. It is thus men's crimes that introduce disorder into the sphere of the three realms and prevent this sphere from achieving a level of superiority that would disrupt all the others, by maintaining the perfect balance Horace called rerum concordia discors. Thus crime is necessary in the world. But the most useful crimes are no doubt those that disrupt the most, such as the refusal of propagation or destruction; all the others are worthless or rather only those two are worthy of the name of crime. Thus only the crimes mentioned are essential to the laws of the three realms and essential also to the laws of nature. A philosopher in antiquity called war the mother of all things. The existence of murderers is as necessary as plagues; without both of them everything in the universe would be upset. . . . such dissolution serves nature's purposes, since it > recomposes that which is destroyed. Thus every change operated by man on organized matter serves nature much more than it opposes it. What am I saying? The service of nature requires far more total destructions . . . destructions much more complete than those we are able to accomplish. Nature wants atrocities and magnitude in crimes; the more our destructions are of this type, the more they will be agreeable to it. To be of even greater service to nature, one should seek to prevent the regeneration of the body that we bury. Murder only takes the first life of the individual whom we strike down; we should also seek to take his second life, if we are to be even more useful to nature. For nature wants annihilation; it is beyond our capacity to achieve the scale of destruction it desires.

I presume that you have grasped the significance of the core of this last statement. It takes us to the heart of what was explained last time, in connection with the death drive, as the point of division between the Nirvana or annihilation principle, on the one hand, and the death drive, on the other – the former concerns a relationship to a fundamental law which might be identified with that which energetics theorizes as the tendency to return to a state, if not of absolute rest, then at least of universal equilibrium.

The death drive is to be situated in the historical domain; it is articulated at a level that can only be defined as a function of the signifying chain, that is to say, insofar as a reference point, that is a reference point of order, can be situated relative to the functioning of nature. It requires something from beyond whence it may itself be grasped in a fundamental act of memorization, as a result of which everything may be recaptured, not simply in the movement of the metamorphoses but from an initial intention.

This is to schematize what you heard last time in Mr. Kaufmann's very full and helpful summary of the work of Bernfeld and Feitelberg; it brought out the three stages at which the death drive is articulated. At the level of material systems considered to be inanimate – and, therefore, including that which involves material organization within living organisms – the operation of an irreversible tendency that proceeds in the direction of the advent of a terminal state of equilibrium is, properly speaking, something that in energetics is known as entropy. That is the first meaning that can be given to the death drive in Freud. Is that what is, in fact, involved?

Bernfeld and Feitelberg's text adds something particularly relevant to Freud's on the subject of the difference introduced by a living structure. In inanimate physical systems the dimensions of intensity and extension involved in the formula of energetics are homogeneous. According to Bernfeld living organizations as such are distinguished by the element of structure – in Goldstein's sense of the structure of an organism – that causes the two poles of the equation to become heterogeneous. That is posited at the elementary level between the nucleus and the cytoplasm as well as at the level of superior organisms between the neurological apparatus and the rest of the structure. That heterogeneity is responsible for the conflict at the level of the living structure from the beginning.

It is at this point that Bernfeld says, "I will stop here." According to him, what one finds in the drive as articulated by Freud is a general tendency of all systems to return to a state of equilibrium insofar as they are subject to the energetic equation. That may be called an instinct, as the orthodox Freudian, Bernfeld, expresses it, but it isn't what we psychoanalysts designate as the drive in our discourse.

The drive as such, insofar, as it is then a destruction drive, has to be beyond the instinct to return to the state of equilibrium of the inanimate sphere. What can it be if it is not a direct will to destruction, if I may put it like that by way of illustration?

Don't put the emphasis on the term "will" here. Whatever interest may have been aroused in Freud by an echo in Schopenhauer, it has nothing to do with the idea of a fundamental Wille. And it is only to make you sense the difference of register relative to the instinct to return to equilibrium that I am using the word in this way here. Will to destruction. Will to make a fresh start. Will for an Other-thing, given that everything can be challenged from the perspective of the function of the signifier.

If everything that is immanent or implicit in the chain of natural events may be considered as subject to the so-called death drive, it is only because there is a signifying chain. Freud's thought in this matter requires that what is involved be articulated as a destruction drive, given that it challenges everything that exists. But it is also a will to create from zero, a will to begin again.

This dimension is introduced as soon as the historical chain is isolated, and the history presents itself as something memorable and memorized in the Freudian sense, namely, something that is registered in the signifying chain and dependent on its existence.

That's what I am illustrating by quoting the passage from Sade. Not that Freud's notion of the death drive is not a notion that is scientifically unjustifiable, but it is of the same order as Sade's Pope Pius VI. As in Sade, the notion of the death drive is a creationist sublimation, and it is linked to that structural element which implies that, as soon as we have to deal with anything in the world appearing in the form of the signifying chain, there is somewhere – though certainly outside of the natural world – which is the beyond of that chain, the ex nihilo on which it is founded and is articulated as such.

I am not telling you that the notion of the death wish in Freud is not something very suspect in itself – as suspect and, I would say, almost as ridiculous as Sade's idea. Can anything be poorer or more worthless after all than the idea that human crimes might, for good or evil, contribute in some way to the cosmic maintenance of the rerum concordia discors?

It is even doubly suspect, since it amounts in the end to substituting a subject for Nature – and that is how I read Beyond the Pleasure Principle. However we construct this subject, it turns out to have as its support a subject who knows, or Freud, in effect, since he is the one who discovered the beyond of the pleasure priniple. Nevertheless, Freud is consistent with himself in also pointing, at the limit of our experience, to a field in which the subject, if he exists, is incontestably a subject who doesn't know in a point of extreme, if not absolute, ignorance. One finds there the core of Freudian exploration.

I don't even say that at this point of speculation things still have a meaning. I simply want to say that the articulation of the death drive in Freud is neither true nor false. It is suspect; that's all I affirm. But it suffices for Freud that it was necessary, that it leads him to an unfathomable spot that is problematic, since it reveals the structure of the field. It points to the site that I designate alternatively as impassable or as the site of the Thing. Freud evokes there his sublimation concerning the death instinct insofar as that sublimation is fundamentally creationist.

One also finds there the essential point of the warning whose tone and note I have given you on more than one occasion: beware of that register of thought known as evolutionism. Beware of it for two reasons. What I have to tell you now may seem dogmatic, but that's more apparent than real.

The first reason is that, however much the evolutionist movement and Freud's thought may share in terms of contemporaneity and historical affinities, there is a fundamental contradiction between the hypotheses of the one and the thought of the other. I have already indicated the necessity of the moment of creation ex nihilo as that which gives birth to the historical dimension of the drive. In the beginning was the Word, which is to say, the signifier. Without the signifier at the beginning, it is impossible for the drive to be articulated as historical. And this is all it takes to introduce the dimension of the ex nihilo into the structure of the analytical field.

The second reason may seem paradoxical to you; it is nevertheless essential: the creationist perspective is the only one that allows one to glimpse the possibility of the radical elimination of God.

It is paradoxically only from a creationist point of view that one can envisage the elimination of the always recurring notion of creative intention as supported by a person. In evolutionist thought, although God goes unnamed throughout, he is literally omnipresent. An evolution that insists on deducing from continuous process the ascending movement which reaches the summit of consciousness and thought necessarily implies that that consciousness and that thought were there at the beginning. It is only from the point of view of an absolute beginning, which marks the origin of the signifying chain as a distinct order and which isolates in their own specific dimension the memorable and the remembered, that we do not find Being [l'être] always implied in being [l'étant], the implication that is at the core of evolutionist thought.

It isn't difficult to make what is called thought emerge from the evolution of matter, when one identifies thought with consciousness. What is difficult to make emerge from the evolution of matter is quite simply homo faber, production and the producer.

Production is an original domain, a domain of creation ex nihilo, insofar as it introduces into the natural world the organization of the signifier. It is for this reason that we only, in effect, find thought – and not in an idealist sense, but thought in its actualization in the world – in the intervals introduced by the signifier.

/

This field that I call the field of the Thing, this field onto which is projected something beyond, something at the point of origin of the signifying chain, this place in which doubt is cast on all that is the place of being, on the chosen place in which sublimation occurs, of which Freud gives us the most massive example – where do the view and notion of it emerge from?

It is also the place of the work that man strangely enough courts; that is why the first example I gave you was taken from courtly love. You have to admit that to place in this beyond a creature such as woman is a truly incredible idea.

Rest assured that I am in no way passing a derogatory judgment on such beings. In our cultural context, one isn't exposed to any danger by being situated as absolute object in the beyond of the pleasure principle. Let them go back to their own problems, which are homogeneous with our own, that is to say, just as difficult. That's not the issue.

If the incredible idea of situating woman in the place of being managed to surface, that has nothing to do with her as a woman, but as an object of desire. And it is that which has given rise to all the paradoxes of the famous courtly love that have caused so many headaches, because those concerned associate it with all the demands of a form of love that obviously has nothing to do with the historically specific sublimation in question.

The historians or poets who have attacked the problem cannot manage to conceive how the fever, indeed the frenzy, that is so manifestly coextensive with a lived desire, which is not at all Platonic and is indubitably manifested in the productions of courtly poetry, can be reconciled with the obvious fact that the being to whom it is addressed is nothing other than being as signifier. The inhuman character of the object of courtly love is plainly visible. This love that led some people to acts close to madness was addressed at living beings, people with names, but who were not present in their fleshly and historical reality – there's perhaps a distinction to be made there. They were there in any case in their being as reason, as signifier.

By the way this is what explains the extraordinary series of ten-line stanzas by the poet Arnaud Daniel that I read to you. One finds there the response of the shepherdess to her shepherd, for the woman responds for once from her place, and instead of playing along, at the extreme point of his invocation to the signifier, she warns the poet of the form she may take as signifier. I am, she tells him, nothing more than the emptiness to be found in my own internal cesspit, not to say anything worse. Just blow in that for a while and see if your sublimation holds up.

That's not to say there is no other solution to the perspective of the field of the Thing. Another solution that is also historically specific and, curiously enough, occurs at a period that isn't so different from the one I have just referred to, is perhaps a little more serious. It is called in Sade the Supreme-Being-in-Evil.

I say Sade because I prefer relatively close, living references to remote ones, but it is not just an invention of Sade's. It belongs to a long historical tradition, which goes at least as far back as Manicheism, if not beyond, that Manicheism which was already referred to in the time of courtly love.

In the time of courtly love there were people to whom I made a passing reference, the Cathars, and they did not doubt the fact that the Prince of this world was quite similar to this Supreme-Being-in-Evil. The Grimmigkeit of Boehme's God, fundamental evil as one of the dimensions of supreme life, proves that it is not simply in libertine and antireligious thought that this dimension may be evoked.

The Cathars were not Gnostics; everything indicates that they were even good Christians. The practice of their sacrament, the consolamentum, is sufficient proof of that. The idea they had of salvation, which is not different from the fundamental idea of Christianity, was that there is a word that saves; and the consolamentum was nothing more than the transmission from one subject to another of the blessing of this word. They were people who placed all of their hope in the advent of a word. In short, people who took quite seriously the message of Christianity.

The trouble is that for such a word to be not so much effective as viable, it has to be separated from discourse. Yet there is nothing more difficult than separating a word from discourse. You put your faith in a word that saves, but as soon as you begin at this level, the whole discourse comes running after you. And this is something that the Cathars didn't fail to notice in the shape of the ecclesiastical authorities, who manifested themselves briefly as the bad word and taught them that one still has to explain oneself even if one belongs to the pure. Now everybody knows that as soon as one begins to be questioned by discourse on this subject, even if it is the discourse of the Church, then the matter can only end in one way. You are definitively silenced.

We have now arrived at a certain limit, that is to say, the field which opens on to what is involved relative to desire. How can we get any closer? How can we question this field? What happens when one doesn't project one's dreams there in a sublimated way, and that thematics emerges to which the most sober of minds are reduced, the most commonplace and the most scientific, even including a certain petty bourgeois from Vienna? What happens to us whenever the hour of desire sounds?

Well, we don't get any closer and for the best of reasons.

This will be the focus of my next lecture. One doesn't get any closer on account of the very reasons that structure the domain of the good in the most traditional sense, which is linked by a whole tradition to pleasure. It wasn't the coming of Freud that introduced a radical revolution in antiquity's point of view on the good insofar as it can be deduced from the paths of pleasure. I will try next time to show you where things stood at the time of Freud; this historical crossroads I am taking you back to is that of utility.

This time I hope to gauge for you in a definitive way and from a Freudian point of view the ethical register of utilitarianism. Freud on this occasion allows himself to go definitively beyond it; he articulates that which is basically valid in it and that which at the same time bounds it, and points to its limits.

I will try to discuss the point of view not only of the progress of thought, but also of the evolution of history, in order to demystify the Platonic and the Aristotelian view of the good, indeed of the Supreme Good, and to situate it on the level of the economy of goods.[2] It is essential to grasp the issue from the Freudian perspective of the pleasure principle and the reality principle, if one is go on to conceive the novelty of what Freud brings to the domain of ethics.

Beyond this place of restraint constituted by the concatenation and circuit of goods, a field nevertheless remains open to us that allows us to draw closer to the central field. The good is not the only, the true, or the single barrier that separates us from it.

What is this second barrier? I will tell you right away, and it will probably seem quite natural to you once I haave told you. But it isn't after all so self-evident. It is a domain in relation to which Freud always revealed a great deal of reticence; and it really is strange that he didn't identify it. The true barrier that holds the subject back in front of the unspeakable field of radical desire that is the field of absolute destruction, of destruction beyond putrefaction, is properly speaking the aesthetic phenomenon where it is identified with the experience of beauty – beauty in all its shining radiance, beauty that has been called the splendor of truth. It is obviously because truth is not pretty to look at that beauty is, if not its splendor, then at least its envelope.

[2] English usage, unlike French usage, generally limits the plural of "the good," namely, "the goods" to a specific and material meaning. Here and in what follows, however, "goods" in the plural is to be read as also retaining the ethical connotations implied by the singular.

In other words, I will explain next time our forward march resumes that on the scale that separates us from the central field of desire, if the good constitutes the first stopping place, the beautiful forms the second and gets closer. It stops us, but it also points in the direction of the field of destruction.

That in this sense, when one aims for the center of moral experience, the beautiful is closer to evil than to the good, shouldn't, I hope, surprise you very much. As we have long said in French: "Better is the enemy of the good."

May 4, 1960

XVII

The function of the good

SAINT AUGUSTINE AND SADE MEMORY, FACILITATION, RITE
THE SUBJECT, ELISION OF A SIGNIFIER
THE TEXTILE FABLE UTILITY AND JOUISSANCE

We have reached the barrier of desire then, and, as I indicated last time, I will speak about the good. The good has always had to situate itself on that barrier. I shall be concerned today with the way in which psychoanalysis enables one to articulate that situation.

I will speak then about the good, and perhaps what I have to say will be bad in the sense that I don't have all the goodness required to speak well of it. I won't perhaps speak too well of it because I am myself not quite well enough to speak at that high level the subject requires. But the idea of nature that I have told you about means that I will not be stopped by such an accidental contingency. I simply ask you to excuse the presentation if at the end you are not completely satisfied.

1

The question of the good is as close as possible to our sphere of action. All exchanges between men and especially interventions of the type we engage in are usually placed under the tutelage and authority of the good – the perspective is a sublime one, indeed a sublimated one. Now sublimation could be defined from a certain point of view as an opinion in the Platonic sense of the term, an opinion arranged in such a way as to reach something that might be the object of science, but that science doesn't manage to reach where it is to be found. A sublimation of any kind, even including that universal, the good itself, may be momentarily in this brief parenthesis considered to be a phony science.

Everything in your analytical experience suggests that the notion and finality of the good are problematic for you. Which good are you pursuing precisely as far as your passion is concerned? That question concerning our behavior is always on the agenda. At every moment we need to know what our effective relationship is to the desire to do good, to the desire to cure.

We have to deal with that as if it were something that is likely to lead us astray, and in many cases to do so instantly. I will even add that one might be paradoxical or trenchant and designate our desire as a non-desire to cure. Such a phrase is meaningful only insofar as it constitutes a warning against the common approaches to the good that offer themselves with a seeming naturalness, against the benevolent fraud of wanting-to-do-one's-best-for-the-subject.

But in that case what do you want to cure the subject of? There is no doubt that this is central to our experience, to our approach, to our inspiration – wanting to cure him from the illusions that keep him on the path of his desire. But how far can we go in this direction? Moreover, even if these illusions are not respectable in themselves, the subject still has to want to give them up. Is the limit of resistance here simply individual?

Here the question of different goods[1] is raised in their relation to desire. All kinds of tempting goods offer themselves to the subject; and you know how imprudent it would be for us to put ourselves in a position of promising the subject access to them all, to follow "the American way." It is nevertheless the possibility of having access to the goods of this world that determines a certain way of approaching psychoanalysis – what I have called "the American way." It also determines a certain way of arriving at the psychoanalyst's and making one's demand.

Before entering into the problem of different goods, I would like to sketch out the illusions on the path of desire. Breaking these illusions is a question of specialized knowledge – knowledge of good and evil indeed – that is located in this central field whose irreducible, ineradicable character in our experience I have attempted to show you. It is bound up with that prohibition, that reservation, that we explored specifically last year when I spoke to you about desire and its interpretation. I pointed to its essential character in the notion of "he didn't know," which is in the imperfect tense in French and which remains centrally within the field of enunciation, or in other words within the deepest relationship of the subject to signifying practice. That is to say, the subject is not the agent but the support, given that he couldn't even calculate the consequences. It is through his relationship to signifying practice that, as a consequence, he emerges as subject.

Moreover, to refer to that fantasmic experience that I chose to produce before you so as to exemplify the central field involved in desire, don't forget the moments of fantasmic creation in Sade, moments in which one finds expressed directly – in diabolically jubilatory terms that make it intolerable to read – the idea that the greatest cruelty is that the subject's fate is displayed before his eyes with his full awareness of it. The plot against the victim is openly hatched in front of him. The value of this fantasm is that it confronts the subject with the most radical kind of interrogation, with a final "he didn't know," insofar as expressed thus in the imperfect tense, the question asked is too much for him. I just ask you to recall the ambiguity revealed by linguistic experience in connection with the French imperfect. When one says "a moment later and the bomb exploded (éclatait)," that may mean two contradictory things in French, namely, either the bomb did, in fact, explode or something happened which caused it not to explode.

[1] See note 2 above, p. 216.

We have now reached the subject of the good. The subject is in no sense new, and one has to admit that thinkers from earlier periods, whose concerns may for one reason or another seem dated to us, nonetheless sometimes formulate the issues in interesting ways. I have nothing against bringing them to your attention, however strange they may seem when presented here out of context in an apparently abstract form that doesn't seem designed to arouse our interest. Thus, when Saint Augustine writes the following in Book VII, Chapter XII, of his Confessions, I think it deserves far more than an indulgent smile.

That everything that is, is good, because it is the work of God.

I understood that all corruptible things are good, and that they wouldn't be corruptible if they were sovereignly good; no corruption would occur if they were not good. For if they were of sovereign good, they would be incorruptible, and if they had no good in them, there would be nothing in them capable of being corrupted, since corruption injures that which it corrupts, and it can only injure it if diminishes good.

And now we come to the core of the argument in the French version of the Garnier edition.

Thus either corruption causes no damage, which cannot be upheld, or all things that are corrupted lose some good, which is undeniable. That if they had lost everything that was good, they would no longer exist at all. Or in other words, if they continued to live without being susceptible to corruption any longer, they would be in a more perfect state than they were before having lost all that was good about them, since they would remain forever in an incorruptible state.

I assume that you grasp the core and indeed the irony of this argument, and moreover that it is precisely the question that interests us. If it is unbearable to realize that everything that is good is extracted from the heart of all things, what can we say of that which remains, which is, after all, something, something different? The question goes echoing down through the centuries and down through human experience. We find it again in The Story of Juliette, with the difference that it is attached, as it should be, to the question of the Law, and in a no less odd way. I would like to draw your attention to this oddness because it is the oddness of a structure that is at issue. Sade writes as follows:

> Tyrants are never born out of anarchy. One only ever sees them rise up in the shadow of laws; they derive their authority from laws. The reign of law is, therefore, evil; it is inferior to anarchy. The greatest proof of this position is the obligation of any government to plunge back into anarchy whenever it wants to remake its constitution. In order to abrogate its ancient laws, it is obliged to establish a revolutionary regime in which there are no laws. Under this regime new laws are eventually born, but the second is less pure than the first since it derives from it, since the first good, anarchy, had to occur, if one wanted to achieve the second good, the State's constitution.

I give you this as a fundamental example. The same kind of argument, formulated by minds that were certainly very remote from one another in their concerns, clearly shows that some form of necessity must exist there that gives rise to this sort of logical stumbling along a certain path.

As far as we are concerned, the question of the good is articulated first of all in its relationship to the Law. On the other hand, nothing is more tempting than to evade the question of the good behind the implication of some natural law, of some harmony to be found on the way to the elucidation of desire. Yet our daily experience proves to us that beneath what we call the subject's defenses, the paths leading to the pursuit of the good only reveal themselves to us constantly, and I would add, in their original form, in the guise of some alibi on the part of the subject. The whole analytical experience is no more than an invitation to the revelation of his desire; and it changes the primitiveness of the relationship of the subject to the good compared to everything which up to that point had been articulated by the philosophers. One has undoubtedly to look closely, for it seems at first that nothing is changed, and that with Freud the compass still points toward the register of pleasure.

I have emphasized this since the beginning of the year: from the origin of moral philosophy, from the moment when the term ethics acquired the meaning of man's reflection on his condition and calculation of the proper paths to follow, all meditation on man's good has taken place as a function of the index of pleasure. And I mean all, since Plato, certainly since Aristotle, and down through the Stoics, the Epicureans, and even through Christian thought itself in Saint Thomas Aquinas. As far as the determination of different goods is concerned, things have clearly developed along the paths of an essentially hedonist problematic. It is only too evident that all that has involved the greatest of difficulties, and that these difficulties are those of experience. And in order to resolve them, all the philosophers have been led to discern not true pleasures from false, for such a distinction is impossible to make, but the true and false goods that pleasure points to.

Doesn't Freud's articulation of the pleasure principle give us an advantage, a reward in terms of knowledge and clarity?

Isn't it in a definitive way profoundly different from the meaning previously given to pleasure by anyone else?

2

Let me just draw your attention to the fact that the conception of the pleasure principle is inseparable from the reality principle, that it is in a dialectical relationship with it. But one has to begin, and I would simply like to begin by pointing out what Freud articulates exactly.

Notice how the pleasure principle is articulated from the Entwurf, where we began this year, right up to the end in Beyond the Pleasure Principle. The end illuminates the beginning, and one can already see in the Entwurf the nerve center to which I want to draw your attention for a moment.

Apparently there is no doubt that the pleasure principle organizes the final reactions for the human psyche, there is no doubt that pleasure is articulated in relation to the presupposition of a satisfaction, and it is driven by a lack in the order of need that the subject becomes caught up in its toils, until a perception occurs that is identical to that which first gave satisfaction. The crudest of references to the reality principle indicates that one finds satisfaction along paths that have already procured it. But look a little closer: is that all Freud has to say? Certainly not. The originality of the Entwurf resides in the notion of facilitations that control the distribution of libidinal investments in such a way that a certain level beyond which the degree of excitation is unbearable for the subject is never exceeded.

The introduction of the function of facilitations opens on to a theme that will become increasingly important as Freud's thought develops, in light of the fact that Freud's thought is his experience.

I have been criticized for having said that, from the point of view of ethics, our experience derives its exemplary value from the fact that it doesn't recognize the dimension of habit, in terms of which human behavior has customarily been assumed to be a process of improvement, of training. In this connection, the notion of facilitation has been used against me. I reject this opposition. The recourse to facilitation in Freud has nothing at all to do with the function of habit as it is defined when one thinks of a learning process. With Freud, it is not a question of creative imprinting but of the pleasure engendered by the functioning of the facilitations. Now the core of the pleasure principle is situated at the level of subjectivity. Facilitation is not a mechanical effect; it is invoked as the pleasure of a facility, and it will be taken up again as the pleasure of a repetition or, more precisely, as repetition compulsion. The core of Freudian thought as it is deployed by us as analysts, whether we attend this seminar or not, is that the function of memory, remembering, is at the very least a rival of the satisfactions it is charged with effecting. It has its own dimension whose reach goes beyond that of a satisfying finality. The tyranny of memory is that which is elaborated in what we call structure.

Such is the originality, the breakthrough, one cannot avoid emphasizing, if one wants to see clearly what is new in the conception of human behavior introduced by Freudian thought and experience. No doubt if someone wants to fill that fault line, he can always claim that nature involves cycles and returns. Faced with that objection, I won't affirm that he's mad; I will just suggest the terms you may use to respond.

A natural cycle is perhaps immanent in everything that exists. Moreover, it is highly diverse in its registers and levels. But I ask you to consider the break that, in the order of the manifestation of the real embodied in the cycle, is introduced by the simple fact that man is the bearer of language.

His relation to a couple of signifiers is all it takes, such as, for example, to make a traditional reference in the sketchiest of modes, yin and yang, that is to say, two signifiers, one of which is assumed to be eclipsed by the rise and return of the other – I don't care particularly for yin and yang; you can choose sine and cosine instead if you like. In other words, the structure engendered by memory must not in our experience mask the structure of memory itself insofar as it is made of a signifying articulation. If you omit it, you absolutely cannot maintain the register that is essential in the articulation of our experience, namely, the autonomy, the dominance, the agency of remembering as such, and not at the level of the real, but of the functioning of the pleasure principle.

This is not a Byzantine discussion. Thus if we create a fault line and an abyss, alternatively we fill in elsewhere something that also had the appearance of a fault line and an abyss. And it is here that one can see that the subject as such is born, a subject, moreover, whose emergence is unjustified by anything else.

As I have already pointed out, the finality of the evolution of matter toward consciousness is a mystical, elusive notion, and one that is properly speaking historically indeterminable. There is no homogeneity between the order of the apparition of phenomena, whether they be premonitory, preliminary, partial, or preparatory to consciousness, and any kind of natural order, because it is through its current state that consciousness manifests itself as a phenomenon whose activity is completely erratic and, I would even say, fragmented. It is at levels that are very different from our relationship to our own real that the mark or the touch of consciousness appears, but in the absence of any continuity or homogeneiety of consciousness. Freud came up against this fact more than once in his investigations, and he always emphasized the fact that consciousness cannot be functionalized.

With relation to the functioning of the signifying chain, on the other hand, our subject has a place in history that is quite solid and almost locatable. The function of the subject on its emergence, of the original subject, of the subject that may be traced in the chain of phenomena, we have a completely new formula for him, one that is capable of objective localization. A subject originally represents nothing more than the following fact: he can forget. Strike out that "he"; the subject is literally at his beginning the elision of a signifier as such, the missing signifier in the chain.

Such is the first place, the first person. Here the appearance of the subject is manifested as such; and it makes us directly aware of why and in what way the notion of the unconscious is central in our experience.

If you start at that point, you will see the explanation of a great many things, including that strange phenomenon that can be pinpointed in history that we call rites. I mean those rites by which man in so-called primitive civilizations believes he must accompany one of the most natural things in the world, namely, the return of natural cycles themselves. If the Emperor of China doesn't start the ploughing at a given day in spring, the rhythm of the seasons will be spoiled. If order is not preserved in the Royal House, the domain of the sea will advance upon the domain of the land. We still find echoes of this at the beginning of the sixteenth century in Shakespeare. What is this, if it isn't the essential relation, the one which binds the subject to the production of meaning and which makes him from the beginning responsible for forgetting? What relation can there be between man and the return of the sunrise, if it is not the case that as a speaking man he is sustained in a direct relation to the signifier? To refer to myth, the original position of man in relation to nature is that of Chantecler – which is a theme to be found in a minor poet, who might be approached more sympathetically, if I hadn't started another seminar by denouncing the figure of Cyrano de Bergerac by reducing him to a grotesque lucubration that had nothing to do with the monumental structure of the character.

We have now reached the point where we must raise the question of the good at this level.

3

The question of the good is situated athwart the pleasure principle and the reality principle. There's no possibility that from such a point of view we can escape conflict, given that we have regularly shifted the center.

It is impossible at this point not to bear witness to the following fact, one that is too little articulated in the Freudian conception itself, namely, that reality is not the simple dialectical correlative of the pleasure principle. Or more exactly, that reality isn't just there so that we bump our heads up against the false paths along which the functioning of the pleasure principle leads us. In truth, we make reality out of pleasure.

This is an essential notion. It is wholly summed up in the notion of praxis in the two senses that that word has acquired historically. On the one hand, in the domain of ethics, it concerns action, insofar as action has not just an ἔργον as its goal, but is also inscribed in an ἐνέργεια; on the other hand, it has to do with making, with the production ex nihilo I spoke to you about last time. It is no accident if these two meanings are subsumed under the same term.

We must see right away how crude it is to accept the idea that, in the ethical order itself, everything can be reduced to social constraint, as is so often the case in the theoretical writings of certain analysts – as if the fashion in which that constraint develops doesn't in itself raise a question for people who live within the realms of our experience. In the name of what is social constraint exercised? Of a collective tendency? Why in all this time hasn't such social constraint managed to focus on the most appropriate paths to the satisfaction of individuals' desires? Do I need to say anymore to an audience of analysts to make clear the distance that exists between the organization of desires and the organization of needs?

But who knows? Perhaps I need to insist after all.

Perhaps I would get a stronger reaction from an audience of school boys. They at least would realize right away that the order imposed in their school is not designed to enable them to jerk off under the best possible conditions. I nevertheless assume that the eyes of an analyst are made to interpret that which runs through a certain dream world, which we call, significantly enough, utopia. Take Fourier, for example, since reading him is by the way such fun. The farcical effect his work generates is instructive. He shows how distant what is called social progress is from whatever is done in the expectation, not so much of opening up the flood gates, as of merely thinking through a given collective order in terms of the satisfaction of desires. For the moment we just want to know if we can see a little more clearly here than others.

We are not the first to have gone along this road. As for myself, there is among those assembled here an audience of Marxists, and I assume that those who are part of it can recall the intimate, profound relationship, a relationship woven into the lines of the text, between what I am proposing here and Marx's fundamental discussions concerning the relations between man and the object of his production. To hurry things along, that brings us back to that point at which I left you in a digression of my lecture before last, namely, with Saint Martin cutting in two with his sword the large piece of cloth in which he was enveloped for his journey to Cavalla.

Let's take up the point as it stands, at the level of different goods, and let's ask ourselves the question of what that piece of cloth is.

Given that with it one can make a piece of clothing, the piece of cloth has a use value with which others before me have been concerned. You would be wrong to think that the relation of man to the object of his production at its fundamental level has been completely elucidated – even by Marx, who took things very far in this respect.

I am not going to offer here a critique of economic structures. Something very interesting did happen to me, however, one of those things I enjoy because their meaning is to be found at a level that is within our grasp but that is always more or less mystifying. It seems that in my last seminar I am supposed to have made an allusion to a given chapter of the latest book of Sartre, to his Critique of Dialectical Reason. I like the idea, since I am about to refer to it; the only problem is that the point in question has to do with thirty pages that I read for the first time last Sunday.

I don't know what to say about the work as a whole because I have only read these thirty pages, but I must say that they are pretty good. They concern precisely the original relations of man to the object of his needs. It seems to me that it is in this particular register that Sartre intends to take things to their final term, and if that is his purpose, if he does manage to be exhaustive, the work will certainly prove useful.

This fundamental relationship is defined starting from the notion of scarcity as that which founds man's condition, as that which makes him man in his relation to his needs. For a body of thought that aims for total dialectical transparency, such a final term is certainly rather obscure, whereas we have managed to introduce into this cloth, whether rare or not, a little breath of air which sets it floating and enables us to describe it in less opaque terms.

Psychoanalysts have given themselves plenty of room in the effort to see what this cloth symbolizes; they tell us what it both shows and hides, that the symbolism of clothes is a valid symbolism, without our knowing whether at any given moment what is being done with this cloth-phallus concerns disclosure or concealment. The profound bivalence of the whole of analytical theory on the subject of the symbolism of clothes enables us to evaluate the impasse reached with the notion of the symbol as handled up till now in psychoanalysis. If you are able to find the large volume of the International Journal of Psychoanalysis that was produced for Jones's fiftieth birthday, you will see an article by Flügel on the symbolism of clothes in which you will find the same impasses I pointed to, in the last issue of our journal, in Jones's own articulation of symbolism, but in an even more striking and almost caricatural form.

In any case, all the absurd things that have been said about symbolism do nevertheless lead us somewhere. There is something hidden there, and it is always, we are told, that damned phallus. We are brought back to something that one might have expected would have been thought of right off, that is to say, to the relationship of the cloth to the missing hair – but it's not missing everywhere on our body. At this point we do find a psychoanalytic writer who tells us that all the cloth we are concerned with is nothing more than the extrapolation or development of woman's fleece, the famous fleece that hides the fact that she doesn't have what it takes. These apparent revelations of the unconscious always have their comic side. But it's not completely screwy; I even think that it's a nice little fable.

Perhaps it might even contain an element of phenomenology relative to the function of nudity. Is nudity purely and simply a natural phenomenon? The whole of psychoanalytic thought is designed to prove it isn't. The thing that is particularly exalting about it and significant in its own right is that there is a beyond of nudity that nudity hides. But we don't need to engage in phenomenology; I prefer fables.

The fable on this occasion concerns Adam and Eve, with the proviso that the dimension of the signifier also be present, the signifier as introduced by the father in the benevolent directions he gives: "Adam, you must give names to everything around you." Here is Adam, then, and here is the famous hair of an Eve that we hope is worthy of the beauty that this first gesture evokes. Adam pulls out one of her hairs. Everything I am trying to show you here turns on a hair, a frog's hair.[2] Adam pulls out a hair from the woman who is given to him as his wife, who has been expected for the whole of eternity, and the next day she comes back with a mink coat over her shoulders.

Therein lies the power of the nature of cloth. It's not because man has less hair than other animals that we have to check out everything that down the ages will burst forth from his industry. If we are to believe the linguists, the problem of different goods is raised within a structure. At the beginning everything is structured as a signifier, even if only a chain of hairs is involved.

Textile is first of all a text. There is cloth, and – let me invoke the driest of minds, Marx, for example – it is impossible to posit as primary some producers' cooperative or other, unless, of course, one wants to make a psychological fable. In the beginning there is the producer's inventiveness, namely, the fact that man – and why he alone? – begins to weave something, something that isn't in the form of a covering or cocoon for his own body, but something that as cloth is going to take off on its own in the world, is going to move around. Why? Because this cloth has time value.

[2] The pun in the French – "poil de grenouille" – turns on the fact that as well as connoting something that does not exist, the phrase also reminds the listener of the slang meaning of "grenouille" as a pejorative term for a woman, e.g., "grenouille de bénitier."

That's what distinguishes it from any form of natural production. One can come close to it in the creations of the animal world, but it is originated only when it is fabricated, when it is open to the world, to age and to newness; it is use value, time value; it is a reservoir of needs; it is there whether one needs it or not; and it is around this cloth that a whole dialectic of rivalry and of sharing is organized, wherein needs will be constituted.

In order to grasp this, simply set in the distance in opposition to this function, the word of the Messiah according to the Gospel when he shows men what happens to those who trust in the Father's Providence: "They weave not neither do they spin; they offer men an imitation of the robe of the lilies and the plumage of birds." This is a stupefying abolition of the text by the word. As I pointed out last time, the chief characteristic of this world is that one has to uproot it from its text if one is to have faith in it. But the history of humanity takes place in the text and it is in the text that we have the cloth.

Saint Martin's gesture means in the beginning that man as such, man with his rights, begins to be individualized as soon as one begins to make holes in this cloth through which his head and his arms can emerge, through which, in effect, he begins to organize himself as clothed, that is to say, as having needs that have been satisfied. What can there be behind this? What in spite of that can he continue to desire? – I say "in spite of that" because from that moment on we know less and less about it.

We have now reached the crossroads of utilitarianism.

Jeremy Bentham's thought is not the simple continuation of that gnoseology to which a whole tradition tirelessly devoted itself in order to reduce the transcendental or supernatural dimension of the progress of knowledge that supposedly needed elucidating. Bentham, as that work of his which has recently drawn some attention, The Theory of Fictions, shows, is the man who approaches the question at the level of the signifier.

With relation to institutions in their fictive or, in other words, fundamentally verbal dimension, his search has involved not attempting to reduce to nothing all the multiple, incoherent, contradictory rights of which English jurisprudence furnishes an example, but, on the contrary, observing on the basis of the symbolic artifice of these terms, which are themselves also creators of texts, what there is there that may be used to some purpose, that is to say, become, in effect, the object of a division. The long historical development of the problem of the good is in the end centered on the notion of how goods are created, insofar as they are organized not on the basis of so-called natural and predetermined needs, but insofar as they furnish the material of a distribution; and it is in relation to this that the dialectic of the good is articulated to the degree that it takes on effective meaning for man.

Man's needs find their home on the level of utility, which involves that portion of the symbolic text that may be of some use. At this stage there is no problem; the greatest utility for the greatest number – such indeed is the law in the light of which the problem of the function of goods is organized. At this level we find ourselves, in effect, prior to the moment when the subject puts his head through the holes in the cloth. The cloth is so made that the greatest number of subjects possible may put their heads and their limbs through it.

Yet all this talk wouldn't mean anything if things didn't start functioning differently. Now in this thing, whether it be rare or not, but in any case a made thing, in all this wealth finally – whatever its correlative in poverty – there is from the beginning something other than use value. There is its jouissance use.

As a result, the good is articulated in a wholly different way. The good is not at the level of the use of the cloth. The good is at the level where a subject may have it at his disposal.

The domain of the good is the birth of power. The notion of control of the good is essential, and if one foregrounds this, everything is revealed concerning the meaning of the claim made by man, at a certain point in his history, once he has managed to achieve control of himself.

It was Freud, not me, who took upon himself the task of unmasking what this has effectively meant historically. To exercise control over one's goods, as everyone knows, entails a certain disorder, that reveals its true nature, i.e., to exercise control over one's goods is to have the right to deprive others of them.

There is, I think, no point in making you sense the fact that historical destiny is played out around such a situation. The whole question concerns the moment when one can consider that this process has come to an end. For this function of the good engenders, of course, a dialectic. I mean that the power to deprive others is a very solid link from which will emerge the other as such.

Remember what I once told you concerning privation, which has subsequently caused a problem for some of you. You will see clearly in this connection that I don't say anything by chance.

Opposing privation to frustration and castration, I said that it was a function instituted as such in the symbolic order, to the extent that nothing is deprived of nothing – which doesn't prevent the good one is deprived of from being wholly real. The important thing is to recognize that the depriving agent is an imaginary function. It is the little other, one's fellow man, he who is given in the relationship that is half rooted in naturalness of the mirror stage, but such as he appears to us there where things are articulated at the level of the symbolic. There is a fact observed in experience that one always has to remember in analysis, namely, what is meant by defending one's goods is one and the same thing as forbidding[3] oneself from enjoying them.

The sphere of the good erects a strong wall across the path of our desire. It is, in fact, at every moment and always, the first barrier that we have to deal with.

How can we conceive crossing over it? That is a problem I will take up next time, when I point out that a radical repudiation of a certain ideal of the good is necessary, if one is to grasp the direction in which our experience is leading.

May 11, 1960.

[3] The play on words in French depends on using "défendre" both in the sense of "defend" – "défendre ses biens" – and "forbid" – "se défendre à soi-même d'en jouir."

XVIII

The function of the beautiful

THE DUPLICITY OF THE GOOD ON THE POTLATCH
THE DISCOURSE OF SCIENCE FORGETS NOTHING OUTRAGE AND PAIN

It seemed to me this morning that it wasn't inappropriate to begin my seminar by asking the question, Have we crossed the line?

I don't mean in what we are doing here, but in what is happening out there in the world in which we live. It isn't because what is occurring there makes such a vulgar noise that we should refuse to hear it.

At a time when I am speaking to you about the paradox of desire – in the sense that different goods obscure it – you can hear outside the awful language of power. There's no point in asking whether they are sincere or hypocritical, whether they want peace or whether they calculate the risks. The dominating impression at such a moment is that of something that may pass for a prescribed good; information addresses and captures impotent crowds to whom it is poured forth like a liquor that leaves them dazed as they move toward the slaughter house. One might even ask if one would allow the cataclysm to occur without first giving free reign to this hubbub of voices.

Is there anything more disconcerting than the transmission via those little machines that we all possess of what are known as press conferences? Or, in other words, questions that are stupidly repeated to which the leader replies with a false casualness, while he calls for more interesting questions and even on occasion engages in witticisms.

There was one somewhere yesterday, in Paris or in Brussels, that told us about our gloomy future. I swear it was absurd. Don't you think that the only way to adjust our hearing to what is proclaimed may be formulated along the lines of "What does it mean? What is it aiming at?" Yet everyone falls asleep on the soft pillow of "It's not possible" – whereas, in fact, nothing is more possible, the possible is above all that. That's possible because the possible is that which can answer man's demand, and because man doesn't know what he is setting in motion with his demand.

The frightening unknown on the other side of the line is that which in man we call the unconscious, that is to say the memory of those things he forgets.

And the things he forgets – you can see in which way – are those things in connection with which everything is arranged so that he doesn't think about them, i.e., stench and corruption that always yawn like an abyss. For life after all is rottenness.

And it is even more so recently, since the anarchy of forms, that second destruction that Sade was talking about the other day in the quotation I read you – the destruction that calls for subversion even beyond the cycle of generation-corruption – are for us pressing problems. The possibility of a second destruction has suddenly become a tangible reality for us, including the threat of anarchy at the level of the chromosomes of a kind that could break the ties to given forms of life. Monsters obsessed a great deal those who up to the eighteenth century still attributed a meaning to the word "Nature." It has been a long time since we accorded any importance to calves with six feet or children with two heads. Yet we may now perhaps see them appear in the thousands.

That is why when we ask what is beyond the barrier erected by the structure of the world of the good – where is the point on which this world of the good turns, as we wait for it to drag us to our destruction – our question has a meaning that you would do well to remember has a terrifying relevance.

1

What is beyond this barrier? Don't forget that if we know there is a barrier and that there is a beyond, we know nothing about what lies beyond.

It is a false beginning to say, as on the basis of our experience some have, that it is the world of fear. To center our life, even our religion, on fear as a final term is an error. Fear with its ghosts is a localizable defense, a protection against something that is beyond, and which is precisely something unknown to us.

It is at the moment when these things are possible but wrapped in the injunction "Thinking about them is prohibited," that it is appropriate to point out the distance and the proximity that links this possible to those extraordinary texts that I have chosen this year as the fulcrum of my proof, namely, Sade's works.

One doesn't have to read very far for this collection of horrors to engender incredulity and disgust in us, and it is only fleetingly, in a brief flash, that such images may cause something strange to vibrate in us which we call perverse desire, insofar as the darker side of natural Eros enters into it.

In the end, any imaginary or indeed real relationship to the research appropriate to perverse desire only suggests the incapacity of natural desire, of the natural desire of the senses, to go very far in this direction. On this path, this desire quickly gives up, is the first to give up. It is no doubt understandable if modern man's thought seeks the beginning, the trace, the point of departure there, the path toward self-knowledge, toward the mystery of desire, but, on the other hand, all the fascination that this beginning exercises over both scientific and literary studies – witness for example the revels to be found in the works of the not untalented author of Sexus, Plexus and Nexus[1] – founders on a rather sterile pleasure-taking. We must be lacking in the proper method, if everything that has been elaborated on the topic by writers or scientists was outdistanced in advance some time ago, was rendered thoroughly outdated by the lucubrations of someone who was only after all a country squire, a social example of the degeneration of the nobility at a time when its privileges were about to be abolished.

It is nevertheless the case that Sade's extraordinary catalogue of horrors, which causes not only the senses and human possibilities but the imagination, too, to flinch, is nothing at all compared to what will, in effect, be seen on a collective scale, if the great and very real explosion occurs that threatens us all. The only difference between Sade's exorbitant descriptions and such a catastrophe is that no pleasure will enter into the motivation of the latter. Not perverts but bureaucrats will set things off, and we won't even know if their intentions were good or bad. Things will go off by command; they will be carried through according to regulations, mechanically, down the chain of command, with human wills bent, abolished, overcome, in a task that ceases to have any meaning. That task will be the elimination of an incalculable waste that reveals its constant and final dimension for man.

Let us not forget that that has, in effect, always been one of the dimensions in which we can recognize what a fond dreamer once charmingly referred to as "the humanization of the planet." There's never any problem in recognizing man's passage through the world, his footstep, mark, trace, touch; there where one finds a huge accumulation of oyster shells, only man can have manifestly been. The geological ages have left their waste, too, waste that allows us to recognize order. But the pile of garbage is one of the sides of the human dimension that it would be wrong to mistake.

Having sketched the outlines of this sepulchral mound at the limit of the politics of the good, of the general good, of the good of the community, we will pick up again where we left off last time.

What is the sphere of the search for the good composed of, once it has been undeceived of the error of judgment that I cited by way of example in Saint Augustine?

His reasoning is as follows: it is by the mental process of the subtraction of the good from the good that one ends up refuting the existence of anything else but the good in being, given that that which remains, since it is more perfect than that which previously was, can in no way be evil. Saint Augustine's reasoning here is calculated to surprise us, and we cannot help wondering what the historical emergence of such a form of thought signifies. It's a question I will leave open.

[1] The author referred to is, of course, Henry Miller.

Last time we defined the good in symbolic creation as the initium that is the point of departure of the human subject's destiny in his coming to terms with the signifier. The true nature of the good, its profound duplicity, has to do with the fact that it isn't purely and simply a natural good, the response to a need, but possible power, the power to satisfy. As a result, the whole relation of man to the real of goods is organized relative to the power of the other, the imaginary other, to deprive him of it.

Let us recall the terms around which, in the first year of my seminar devoted to Freud's Technical Writings, I organized the ideal ego and the ego ideal, terms that I represented in my graph. The big I designates the identification of omnipotence with the signifier, with the ego ideal. On the other hand, as image of the other, it is the Urbild of the ego, the original form on the basis of which the ego models itself, sets itself up, and operates under the auspices of pseudomastery. We will now define the ego ideal of the subject as representing the power to do good, which then opens up within itself the beyond that concerns us today. How is it that as soon as everything is organized around the power to do good, something completely enigmatic appears and returns to us again and again from our own action – like the ever-growing threat within us of a powerful demand whose consequences are unknown? As for the ideal ego, which is the imaginary other who faces us at the same level, it represents by itself the one who deprives us.

At these two poles of the structuralization of the world of goods, what is it we see outlined?

On the one hand, starting with the unveiling with which the revelation of classical philosophy terminates, that is to say, starting with the point at which Hegel is said to have been stood on his feet, the social conflict proves to be the thread which gives meaning to the enlightened segment of history in the classical sense of the term.

On the other hand, at the other end, there appears something that looks to us like a question offering hope.

2

Scientific research conducted in what is problematically referred to as the "human sciences" has revealed that for a very long time, outside the domain of classical history, man in non-historical societies has, it is believed, invented a practice conceived to have a salutary function in the maintenance of intersubjective relations. In my eyes this is like the little stone that was miraculously made to inform us that not everything is caught up in the necessary dialectic of the competition for goods, of the conflict between goods, and of the necessary catastrophe that it gives rise to, and that, moreover, in the world we are exploring, there have existed signs that positively show how men have thought that the destruction of goods as such might be a function expressive of value.

I assume you are all well enough informed so that I don't have to remind you what a potlatch is. Let me just note briefly that it concerns ritual ceremonies involving the extensive destruction of a variety of goods, consumer goods as well as luxury goods and goods for display. The practice is found in societies that are now no more than relics, vestiges of a form of human social existence that our expansion has tended to wipe out. The potlatch bears witness to man's retreat from goods, a retreat which enabled him to link the maintenance and discipline of his desire, so to speak – insofar as this is what concerns him in his destiny – to the open destruction of goods, that were both personal and collective property. The problem and the drama of the economy of the good, its ricochets and rebounds, all turn on this point.

Furthermore, as soon as that key is given us, we clearly see that it is not simply the privilege of primitive societies. I couldn't find today the piece of paper on which I noted that at the beginning of the twelfth century – that through courtly love marked the rise to the surface in European culture of a problematic of desire as such – we see appear in a feudal rite the manifestation of something wholly analogous. The rite in question occurred at a festival, a meeting of barons somewhere in the region of Narbonne, and it involved huge destruction, not only of the goods that were consumed directly as part of the festivities, but also of animals and harnesses. Everything occurred as if the foregrounding of the problematic of desire required as its necessary correlative the need for ostentatious forms of destruction, insofar as they are gratuitous. Those who in the community claim to be privileged subjects, feudal Lords, those who set themselves up as such in this ceremony, throw down challenges to each other, rival each other in attempting to destroy the most.

This is at the other extreme the only example we have of the order of destruction that is carried out consciously and in a controlled way, that is to say, in a very different way from that massive destruction which we have all witnessed, given that we belong to generations that are relatively close to it. This latter destruction seems to us to be an inexplicable accident, a resurgence of savagery, whereas it is rather necessarily linked to the leading edge of our discourse.

A new problem arises for us, one that even Hegel found obscure. For a long time in The Phenomenology of Mind, Hegel tried to articulate the problem of human history in terms of conflicts between discourses. The tragedy of Antigone especially appealed to him because he saw the clear opposition there between the discourse of the family and that of the state. But in my opinion things are much less clear.

As far as we are concerned, we find in the discourse of the community, of the general good, the effects of a scientific discourse in which we see revealed for the first time the power of the signifier as such. That question is our very own. As far as we are concerned, the question raised is subsumed beneath the order of thought that I am trying to present to you here.

The sudden, prodigious development of the power of the signifier, of the discourse that emerged from the little letters of mathematics and that is distinct from all previously existing discourses, becomes an additional alienation. In what way? Insofar as it is a discourse that by reason of its structure forgets nothing. That is why it is different from the discourse of primary memorization, which carries on inside us without our knowledge, different from the memorizing discourse of the unconscious whose center is absent, whose place is identified through the phrase "he didn't know," that is precisely the sign of that fundamental omission in which the subject is situated. At a certain moment in time, man learned to emit and place the discourse of mathematics in circulation, in the real as well as in the world, and that discourse cannot function unless nothing is forgotten. It only takes a little signifying chain to begin to function based on this principle, for things to move forward as if they were functioning by themselves. So much so that we even wonder if the discourse of physics, as engendered by the omnipotence of the signifier, will reach the point of the integration of nature or its disintegration.

This fact strangely complicates the problem of our desire, even if it is doubtless no more than one of its phases. Let us just say that, as far as the man who is talking to you is concerned, it is there that one finds the revelation of the decisive and original character of the place where human desire is situated in the relationship of man to the signifier. Should this relationship be destroyed?

I take it that you might have heard in the report we had on the contribution of one of Freud's disciples – an open-minded and cultured man, but not exactly a genius – that it is in that direction that the question of the meaning of the death drive lies. It is insofar as this question is tied to history that the problem is raised. It is a question of the here and now, and not ad aeternum. It is because the movement of desire is in the process of crossing the line of a kind of unveiling that the advent of the Freudian notion of the death drive is meaningful for us. The question is raised at the level of the relationship of the human being to the signifier as such, to the extent that at the level of the signifier every cycle of being may be called into question, including life in its movement of loss and return.

And it is this that gives a no less tragic meaning to something that we analysts are the bearers of. In its own cycle the unconscious now appears to us as the field of a non-knowledge, even though it is locatable as such. Yet in this field where we have to function everyday, we cannot fail to recognize the following fact that every child could understand.

The desire of the man of good will is to do good, to do the right thing, and he who comes to seek you out, does so in order to feel good, to be in agreement with himself, to identify with or be in conformity with some norm. Now you all know what we nevertheless find in the margin, but also perhaps at the limit of that which occurs on the level of the dialectic and progress of the knowledge of the unconscious. In the irreducible margin as well as at the limit of his own good, the subject reveals himself to the never entirely resolved mystery of the nature of his desire.

The reference the subject makes to some other seems quite absurd, when we see him continually refer to the other – and we certainly see more than a few of these others – as if he were someone who lives harmoniously and who in any case is happier than the analysand, doesn't ask any questions, and sleeps soundly in his bed. We don't need to see this other come and lie down on our couch, however solid and together he may be, to know that this mirage, this reference of the dialectic of the good to a beyond that, by way of illustration, I will call "the good that musn't be touched," is the very text of our experience.

I would even add that this register of a jouissance as that which is only accessible to the other is the only dimension in which we can locate the strange malaise that, if I'm not mistaken, only the German language has managed to point to – along with other psychological nuances concerning the gap in man – with the word Lebensneid.

Lebensneid is not an ordinary jealousy, it is the jealousy born in a subject in his relation to an other, insofar as this other is held to enjoy a certain form of jouissance or superabundant vitality, that the subject perceives as something that he cannot apprehend by means of even the most elementary of affective movements. Isn't it strange, very odd, that a being admits to being jealous of something in the other to the point of hatred and the need to destroy, jealous of something that he is incapable of apprehending in any way, by any intuitive path? The identification of this other virtually in the form of a concept may in itself suffice to provoke the movement of malaise concerned; and I don't think one has to be an analyst to see such disturbing undulations passing through subjects' behaviors.

Now we have reached the frontier. What will enable us to cross it?

3

One finds at this frontier another crossing point, which enables us to locate precisely an element of the field of the beyond-the-good principle. That element, as I have said, is the beautiful.

I just want to introduce you to the problematic today. I will limit myself to two articulations.

Freud was extremely prudent in this connection. On the nature of the creation that is manifested in the beautiful, the analyst has by his own admission nothing to say. In the sphere that calculates the value of the work of art, we find ourselves reduced to a position that isn't even that of schoolchildren, but of pickers up of crumbs. Moreover, that's not all, and Freud's text is very weak on the topic. The definition he gives of sublimation at work in artistic creation only manages to show us the reaction or repercussions of the effects of what happens at the level of the sublimation of the drive, when the result or the work of the creator of the beautiful reenters the field of goods, that is to say, when they have become commodities. One must recognize that the summary Freud gives of the artist's career is practically grotesque. The artist, he says, gives a beautiful form to the forbidden object in order that everyone, by buying his little artistic product, rewards and sanctions his daring. That is a way of shortcircuiting the problem. And Freud is perfectly aware of the limits he imposes on himself in a way that is perfectly obvious when the problem of creation – which he leaves aside as outside the range of our experience – is added to it.

We are thus brought back again to all the pedantic thoughts that in the course of centuries have been expressed about the beautiful.

Everyone knows that in every field those who have something to say – that is in this case the creators of beauty – are understandably the most dissatisfied by pedantic formulas. Yet something that has been expressed by almost all of them, especially by the best but also at the level of common experience, does make the rounds, namely, that there is a certain relationship between beauty and desire.

This relationship is strange and ambiguous. On the one hand, it seems that the horizon of desire may be eliminated from the register of the beautiful. Yet, on the other hand, it has been no less apparent – from the thought of antiquity down to Saint Thomas who has some valuable things to say on the question – that the beautiful has the effect, I would say, of suspending, lowering, disarming desire. The appearance of beauty intimidates and stops desire.

That is not to say that on certain occasions beauty cannot be joined to desire, but in a mysterious way, and in a form that I can do no better than refer to by the term that bears within it the structure of the crossing of some invisible line, i.e., outrage. Moreover, it seems that it is in the nature of the beautiful to remain, as they say, insensitive to outrage, and that is by no means one of the least significant elements of its structure.

I will show it to you then in the detail of analytical experience, show it to you with pointers that will enable you to be alert to it when it occurs in an analytical session. With the precision of a Geiger counter, you can pick it up by means of references to the aesthetic register that the subject will give you in his associations, in his broken, disconnected monologue, either in the form of quotations or of memories from his schooldays. You don't, of course, always deal with creators, but you do deal with people who have had a relationship to the conventional sphere of beauty. You can be sure that the more these references become strangely sporadic and peremptory with relation to the text of the discourse, the more they are correlative of something that makes its presence felt at that moment, and that belongs to the register of a destructive drive. It is at the very moment when a thought is clearly about to appear in a subject, as in the narration of a dream for example, a thought that one recognizes as aggressive relative to one of the fundamental terms of his subjective constellation, that, depending on his nationality, he will make some reference to a passage from the Bible, to an author, whether a classic or not, or to some piece of music. I mention this today to show that we are not far from the very text of our experience.

The beautiful in its strange function with relation to desire doesn't take us in, as opposed to the function of the good. It keeps us awake and perhaps helps us adjust to desire insofar as it is itself linked to the structure of the lure.

You can see this place illustrated by the fantasm. If there is "a good that mustn't be touched," as I was saying earlier, the fantasm is "a beauty that musn't be touched," in the structure of this enigmatic field.

The first side of this field is known to us, it is the side that along with the pleasure principle prevents us from entering it, the side of pain.

We must ask ourselves what it is that constitutes that field. The death drive, says Freud, primary masochism. But isn't that to take too big a leap? Is the pain that denies access to the side the whole content of the field? Are all those who express demands for this field masochists after all? And I can tell you right off, I don't think so.

Masochism is a marginal phenomenon and it possesses something almost caricatural that moral inquiry at the end of the nineteenth century has pretty much laid bare. The economy of masochistic pain ends up looking like the economy of goods. One wants to share pain as one shares heaps of other things that are left over; and one even comes close to fighting over it.

But isn't there something there that involves a panicky return to the dialectic of goods? In truth, the whole behavior of the masochist – and I mean by that the perverse masochist – points to the fact that it is a question of a structural feature in his behavior. Read Mr. Sacher-Masoch. He's an enlightening writer, although he doesn't have the stature of Sade, and you will see that in the end the point aimed at by the position of the perverse masochist is the desire to reduce himself to this nothing that is the good, to this thing that is treated like an object, to this slave whom one trades back and forth and whom one shares.

But one shouldn't after all proceed too quickly to break inventive homonymy, and the fact the masochism has been called by this name for so long by psychoanalysis is not without reason. The unity that emerges from all the fields which analytical thought has labeled masochism has to do with the fact that in all these fields pain shares the character of a good.

We will continue our inquiry next time with relation to a document.

It's not exactly a new document. Down through the centuries longwinded commentators have cut their teeth and sharpened their nails on it. This text appeared in the field where the morality of happiness was theorized and it gives us its underlying structure. It is there that its underlying structure is the most visible, there where it appears on the surface. That which over the centuries has caused the greatest problems, from Aristotle down to Hegel and Goethe, is a tragedy, one that Hegel considered the most perfect, but for the wrong reason, namely, Antigone.

Antigone's position relates to a criminal good. One would have to have a character that was deeply out of touch with the cruelties of our time to attack the subject, if I may say so, by focusing on the tyrant.

We will, therefore, take up the text of Antigone together, since it will enable us to point to a fundamental moment, to reach an essential reference point in our investigation of what it is man wants and what he defends himself against. We will see what an absolute choice means, a choice that is motivated by no good.

May 18, 1960

THE ESSENCE OF TRAGEDY

A commentary on Sophocles's Antigone

XIX

The splendor of Antigone

THE MEANING OF CATHARSIS
HEGEL'S WEAKNESS
THE FUNCTION OF THE CHORUS
GOETHE'S WISH

I told you that I would talk about Antigone today.

I am not the one who has decreed that Antigone is to be a turning point in the field that interests us, namely, ethics. People have been aware of that for a long time. And even those who haven't realized this are not unaware of the fact that there are scholarly debates on the topic. Is there anyone who doesn't evoke Antigone whenever there is a question of a law that causes conflict in us even though it is acknowledged by the community to be a just law?

And what is one to think of the scholars' contribution to the discussion of Antigone? What is one to think of it when one has, like me, gone over the ground for one's own interest and for the interest of those one is speaking to?

Well now, while I have tried to omit nothing that seemed important in all that has been said on the question, so as not to deprive either you or me of the help that I might derive from this lengthy historical survey, I have nevertheless often had the impression that I was lost in quite extraordinary byways. One learns that the opinions formulated by the pens of our great thinkers over the centuries are strange indeed.

1

Antigone is a tragedy, and tragedy is in the forefront of our experiences as analysts – something that is confirmed by the references Freud found in Oedipus Rex as well as in other tragedies. He was attracted by his need of the material he found in their mythical content. And if he himself didn't expressly discuss Antigone as tragedy, that doesn't mean to say it cannot be done at this crossroads to which I have brought you. It seems to me to be what it was for Hegel, although in a different way, namely, the Sophoclean tragedy that is of special significance.

In an even more fundamental way than through the connection to the Oedipus complex, tragedy is at the root of our experience, as the key word "catharsis" implies.

For you the word is no doubt more or less closely associated with the term "abreaction," which presupposes that the problem outlined by Freud in his first work with Breuer, namely, that of discharge, has already been broached – discharge in an act, indeed motor discharge, of something that is not so simple to define, and that we still have to say remains a problem for us, the discharge of an emotion that remains unresolved. For that is what is involved here: an emotion or a traumatic experience may, as far as the subject is concerned, leave something unresolved, and this may continue as long as a resolution is not found. The notion of unfulfillment suffices to fill the role of comprehensibility which is required here.

Read over Freud and Breuer's opening pages and, in the light of what I have attempted to focus on for your benefit in our experience, you will see how difficult it now is to be content with the word "fulfillment" that is employed in this context, and to state simply, as Freud does, that the action may be discharged in the words that articulate it.

That catharsis which in this text is linked to the problem of abreaction, and which is already specifically invoked in the background, has its origins in the thought of classical antiquity. It is centered on Aristotle's formula at the beginning of Chapter VI of his Poetics: Aristotle there explains at length, in a classification of the genres, what must be present for a work to be defined as a tragedy.

The passage is a long one and we will return to it later. One finds there a description of the distinguishing characteristics of tragedy, of its composition, and of what, for example, distinguishes it from epic discourse. I simply put on the blackboard the end point or final words of this passage, what in logical causality is known as its τέλος. It is formulated by Aristotle as δι' ἐλέου καὶ φόβου περαίνουσα τὴν τῶν τοιούτων παθημάτων κάθαρσιν. That is to say, a means of accomplishing the purgation of the emotions by a pity and fear similar to this.

These words which seem so simple have over the centuries produced a flood – indeed a whole world – of commentaries, whose history I can't even begin to trace here.

The references I will make to this history are highly selective and to the point. We usually translate the word "catharsis" by something like "purgation." And thus, all of us here, especially if we are doctors, are, from the school desks of our so-called secondary schools on, more or less familiar with the term "purgation," which has a certain Moliéresque meaning. And this is the case because the Moliéresque element here merely echoes an ancient medical concept, namely, in Molière's own words, the one which involves the elimination of "peccant humors."

Moreover, that is not very far from what the term still, in fact, evokes. But it also has a different resonance. And to make you sense it right away, I can simply point out what in the course of our work here I recently expounded for you with reference to the name of the Cathars.

What are the Cathars? They are the pure. Καθαρός is a pure person. And the word in its original sense doesn't mean illumination or discharge, but purification.

Doubtless in classical antiquity, too, the term "catharsis" was already used in a medical context, in Hippocrates, for example, with a specifically medical meaning; it is linked to forms of elimination, to discharge, to a return to normality. But, on the other hand, in other contexts it is linked to purification and especially to ritual purification. Hence the ambiguity which we, as you might suspect, are far from the first to discover.

So as to refer to a specific individual, I will mention the name of Denis Lambin, who reinterprets Aristotle in order to emphasize the ritual function of tragedy and the ceremonial sense of purification. It's not a matter of affirming that he is more or less right than someone else, but of simply identifying the sphere in which the question is raised.

We shouldn't, in fact, forget that the term catharsis is strangely isolated in the context of the Poetics. It's not that it isn't developed and commented on there, but we will learn very little about it until some new papyrus is discovered. I assume you know that what we have of the Poetics is only a part, roughly half, in fact. And in the half that we have there is only the passage referred to which discusses catharsis. We know that there was more because at the beginning of Book VIII, in the numbering of Didot's classic edition of the Politics, Aristotle speaks of "that catharsis which I discussed elsewhere in the Poetics." In Book VIII his subject is catharsis in connection with music, and as things turned out, it is there that we learn much more about catharsis.

In this text catharsis has to do with the calming effect associated with a certain kind of music, from which Aristotle doesn't expect a given ethical effect, nor even a practical effect, but one that is related to excitement. The music concerned is the most disturbing kind, the kind that turned their stomachs over, that made them forget themselves, in the same way that hot jazz (le hot) or rock 'n' roll does for us; it was the kind of music that in classical antiquity gave rise to the question of whether or not it should be prohibited.

Well now, says Aristotle, once they have experienced the state of exaltation, the Dionysian frenzy stimulated by such music, they become calm. That's what catharsis means as it is evoked in Book VIII of the Politics.

Yet not everyone enters into such states of excitement, even if everyone is in the position of being at least slightly susceptible. There are the παθητικοί as opposed to the ἐνθουσιαστικοί. The former are in the position of being prey to other passions, namely, fear and pity. Well, it turns out that a form of catharsis or calming effect will be granted them by a certain music also, by the music, one may assume, that has a role in tragedy. And this comes about through pleasure, Aristotle tells us, leaving us once again to reflect on what might be meant by pleasure and at what level and why it is invoked on this occasion. What is this pleasure to which one returns after a crisis that occurs in another dimension, a crisis that sometimes threatens pleasure, for we all know to what extremes a certain kind of ecstatic music may lead? It is at this point that the topology we have defined – the topology of pleasure as the law of that which functions previous to that apparatus where desire's formidable center sucks us in – perhaps allows us to understand Aristotle's intuition better than has been the case heretofore.

In any case, before I go on to define the beyond of the apparatus referred to as the central point of that gravitational pull, I want to emphasize that element in modern literature which has given rise to the use of the term catharsis in its medical sense.

The medical notion of Aristotelian catharsis is, in effect, more or less current in a sphere that goes far beyond the realm of our colleagues, the writers, critics, and literary theoreticians. But if one seeks to determine the culminating moment of this conception of catharsis, one reaches a point of origin beyond which the concept is much broader and where it is far from obvious that the word catharsis has only the medical connotation.

The triumph of the latter conception of its meaning has a source to which it is worth making an erudite reference here. The paper in question is by Jakob Bernays and it appeared in a review in Breslau. I couldn't tell you why Breslau is involved, since I wasn't able to consult enough biographical material on this Jakob Bernays. If I am to believe Jones's book on Freud, the latter, as you will probably have realized, belongs to the same family from which Freud took his wife, namely, a distinguished Jewish bourgeois family, that had long since acquired a form of nobility in the sphere of German culture. Jones refers to Michael Bernays as a professor in Munich, who was condemned by his family as a political apostate, as someone who changed his political allegiance for the sake of his career. As for Jakob Bernays, if I am to believe the person who looked into this for me, he is simply mentioned as someone who had a distinguished career as a Latinist and a Hellenist. Nothing further is said except that he didn't achieve his academic success at the same cost as Michael.

What I have here is an 1880 version of two papers by Jakob Bernays, reprinted in Berlin, on the subject of Aristotle's theory of drama. They are excellent. It is rare to find such a satisfying work by an academic in general, and even more so by a German academic. It is as clear as crystal. And it is no accident if the virtual universal adoption of the medical notion of catharsis occurs at that time.

It is a pity that Jones, who was himself so knowledgeable, didn't believe it appropriate to place a greater emphasis on the personality and the work of Jakob Bernays; little attention has been paid to him. It is nevertheless difficult to imagine that Freud, who was by no means indifferent to the reputation of the Bernays' family, wasn't aware of him. It would have been a way of referring Freud's original use of the word catharsis to its best source.

Having said that, I will now return to what most concerns us in this commentary on Antigone, namely, the essence of tragedy.

2

Tragedy – we are told in a definition that we can hardly avoid paying attention to, since it appeared scarcely a century after the time of the birth of tragedy – has as its aim catharsis, the purgation of the τιαθήματα, of the emotions of fear and pity.

How is one to understand that formula? We will approach the problem from the perspective imposed on us by what we have articulated on the subject of the proper place of desire in the economy of the Freudian Thing. Will this allow us to take the additional step required by this historical revelation?

If the Aristotelian formulation appears at first sight to be so closed, it is due to the loss of a part of Aristotle's work as well as to a certain conditioning within the very possibilities of thought. Yet is it so closed to us after all as a consequence of the progress made in our discussions of ethics here over the past two years? What in particular has been said about desire enables us to bring a new element to the understanding of the meaning of tragedy, above all by means of the exemplary approach suggested by the function of catharsis – there are no doubt more direct approaches.

In effect, Antigone reveals to us the line of sight that defines desire.

This line of sight focuses on an image that possesses a mystery which up till now has never been articulated, since it forces you to close your eyes at the very moment you look at it. Yet that image is at the center of tragedy, since it is the fascinating image of Antigone herself. We know very well that over and beyond the dialogue, over and beyond the question of family and country, over and beyond the moralizing arguments, it is Antigone herself who fascinates us, Antigone in her unbearable splendor. She has a quality that both attracts us and startles us, in the sense of intimidates us; this terrible, self-willed victim disturbs us.

It is in connection with this power of attraction that we should look for the true sense, the true mystery, the true significance of tragedy – in connection with the excitement involved, in connection with the emotions and, in particular, with the singular emotions that are fear and pity, since it is through their intervention, δι' ἐλέου καὶ φόβου, through the intervention of pity and fear, that we are purged, purified of everything of that order. And that order, we can now immediately recognize, is properly speaking the order of the imaginary. And we are purged of it through the intervention of one image among others.

And it is here that a question arises. How do we explain the dissipatory power of this central image relative to all the others that suddenly seem to descend upon it and disappear? The articulation of the tragic action is illuminating on the subject. It has to do with Antigone's beauty. And this is not something I invented; I will show you the passage in the song of the Chorus where that beauty is evoked, and I will prove that it is the pivotal passage. It has to do with Antigone's beauty and with the place it occupies as intermediary between two fields that are symbolically differentiated. It is doubtless from this place that her splendor derives, a splendor that all those who have spoken worthily of beauty have never omitted from its definition.

Moreover, as you know, this is the place that I am attempting to define. I have already come close to it in previous lectures, and I attempted to grasp it the first time by means of the second death imagined by Sade's heroes – death insofar as it is regarded as the point at which the very cycles of the transformations of nature are annihilated. This is the point where the false metaphors of being (l'étant) can be distinguished from the position of Being (l'être) itself, and we find its place articulated as such, as a limit, throughout the text of Antigone, in the mouths of all the characters and of Tiresias. But how can one also not fail to see this position in the action itself? Given that the middle of the play is constituted of a time of lamentation, commentary, discussions, and appeals relative to an Antigone condemned to a cruel punishment. Which punishment? That of being buried alive in a tomb.

The central third of the text is composed of a detailed series of vowel gradations, which informs us about the meaning of the situation or fate of a life that is about to turn into certain death, a death lived by anticipation, a death that crosses over into the sphere of life, a life that moves into the realm of death.

It is surprising that dialecticians or indeed aestheticians as eminent as Hegel and Goethe haven't felt obliged to take account of this whole field in their evaluation of the effect of the play.

The dimension involved here is not unique to Antigone. I could suggest that you look in a number of places and you will find something analogous without having to search too hard. The zone defined in that way has a strange function in tragedy.

It is when passing through that zone that the beam of desire is both reflected and refracted till it ends up giving us that most strange and most profound of effects, which is the effect of beauty on desire.

It seems to split desire strangely as it continues on its way, for one cannot say that it is completely extinguished by the apprehension of beauty. It continues on its way, but now more than elsewhere, it has a sense of being taken in, and this is manifested by the splendor and magnificence of the zone that draws it on. On the other hand, since its excitement is not refracted but reflected, rejected, it knows it to be most real. But there is no longer any object.

Hence these two sides of the issue. The extinction or the tempering of desire through the effect of beauty that some thinkers, including Saint Thomas, whom I quoted last time, insist on. On the other hand, the disruption of any object, on which Kant insists in The Critique of Judgment.

I was talking to you just now of excitement. And I will take a moment to have you reflect on the inappropriate use that is made of this word in the usual translation into French of Triebregung, namely, "émoi pulsionnel," "instinctual excitement."[1] Why was this word so badly chosen? "Emoi" (excitement) has nothing to do with emotion nor with being moved. "Emoi" is a French word that is linked to a very old verb, namely, "émoyer" or "esmayer," which, to be precise, means "faire perdre à quelqu'un ses moyens," as I almost said, although it is a play on words in French, "to make someone lose" not "his head," but something closer to the middle of the body, "his means." In any case a question of power is involved. "Esmayer" is related to the old gothic word "magnan" or "mögen" in modern German. As everybody knows, a state of excitement is something that is involved in the sphere of your power relations; it is notably something that makes you lose them.

We are now in a position to be able to discuss the text of Antigone with a view to finding something other than a lesson in morality.

A thoroughly irresponsible individual wrote a short time ago that I am powerless to resist the seductions of the Hegelian dialectic. The reproach was formulated at a time when I was beginning to articulate for you the dialectic of desire in terms that I have continued to employ since. And I don't know if the reproach was deserved at the time, but no one could claim that the individual involved is especially sensitive to these things. It is in any case true that Hegel nowhere appears to me to be weaker than he is in the sphere of poetics, and this is especially true of what he has to say about Antigone.

According to Hegel, there is a conflict of discourses, it being assumed that the discourses of the spoken dialogues embody the fundamental concerns of the play, and that they, moreover, move toward some form of reconciliation. I just wonder what the reconciliation of the end of Antigone might be. Further, it is not without some astonishment that one learns that, in addition, this reconciliation is said to be subjective.

[1] There is an additional problem in English, since the equivalent for the German "Triebe" and the French "pulsion," i.e., "drive," has no adjectival form.

Let us not forget that in Sophocles's last play, Oedipus at Colonus, Oedipus's final malediction is addressed to his sons; it is the malediction that gives rise to the catastrophic series of dramas to which Antigone belongs. Oedipus at Colonus ends with Oedipus's last curse, "Never to have been born were best . . ." How can one talk of reconciliation in connection with a tone like that?

I am not tempted to regard my own indignation as particularly worthy; others have had a similar reaction before me. Goethe notably seems to have been somewhat suspicious of such a view, and so was Erwin Rohde. When I went and looked up his Psyche recently, a work that I made use of to bring together classical antiquity's different conceptions of the immortality of the soul, and that is an admirable work, which I strongly recommend, I was pleased to come across an expression of the author's astonishment at the traditional interpretation of Oedipus at Colonus.

Let us now attempt to wash our brains clean of all we have heard about Antigone and look in detail at what goes on there.

3

What does one find in Antigone? First of all, one finds Antigone.

Have you noticed that she is only ever referred to throughout the play with the Greek word ἡ παῖς, which means "the child"? I say that as a way of coming to the point and of enabling you to focus your eye on the style of the thing. And, of course, there is the action of the play.

The question of the action in tragedy is very important. I don't know why someone whom I'm not very fond of, probably because he is always being shoved under my nose, someone called La Bruyère, said that we have arrived too late in a world that is too old in which everything has already been said. It's not something I've noticed. As far as the action of tragedy is concerned, there's still a lot to be said. It's far from being resolved.

To return to Erwin Rohde, whom I complimented just now, I was astonished to find that in another chapter he explains a curious conflict between the tragic author and his subject, a conflict that is caused by the following: the laws of the genre oblige the author to choose as frame a noble action in preference to a mythic action. I suppose that is so that everyone already knows what it's all about, what's going on. The action has to be emphasized in relation to the ethos, the personalities, the characters, the problems, and so forth, of the time. If that's true, then Mr. Anouilh was right to give us his little fascist Antigone. The conflict that results from the dialogue between the poet and his subject is, according to Erwin Rohde, capable of generating conflicts between action and thought, and in this connection, echoing a great many things that have already been said before, he refers with some relevance to the figure of Hamlet.

It's entertaining, but it must be difficult for you to accept, if what I explained last year about Hamlet meant anything to you. Hamlet is by no means a drama of the importance of thought in the face of action. Why on the threshold of the modern period would Hamlet bear witness to the special weakness of future man as far as action is concerned? I am not so gloomy, and nothing apart from a cliché of decadent thought requires that we should be, although it is a cliché Freud himself falls into when he compares the different attitudes of Hamlet and Oedipus toward desire.

I don't believe that the drama of Hamlet is to be found in such a divergence between action and thought nor in the problem of the extinction of his desire. I tried to show that Hamlet's strange apathy belongs to the sphere of action itself, that it is in the myth chosen by Shakespeare that we should look for its motives; we will find its origin in a relationship to the mother's desire and to the father's knowledge of his own death. And to take a step further, I will mention here the moment at which our analysis of Hamlet is confirmed by the analysis I am leading up to on the subject of the second death.

Don't forget one of the effects in which the topology I refer to may be recognized. If Hamlet stops when he is on the point of killing Claudius, it is because he is worried about that precise point I am trying to define here: simply to kill him is not enough, he wants him to suffer hell's eternal torture. Under the pretext that we have already busied ourselves a great deal with this hell, should we see it as beneath our dignity to make a little use of it in the analysis of a text? Even if he doesn't believe in hell anymore than we do, even if he's not at all sure about it, since he does after all question the notion – "To sleep, perchance to dream . . ." – it is nevertheless true that Hamlet stops in the middle of his act because he wants Claudius to go to hell.

The reason why we are always missing the opportunity of pointing to the limits and the crossing-points of the paths we follow is because we are unwilling to come to grips with the texts, preferring to remain within the realm of what is considered acceptable or, in other words, the realm of prejudices. If I were not to have taught you anything more than an implacable method for the analysis of signifiers, then it would not have been in vain – at least I hope so. I even hope that that is all you will retain. If it is true that what I teach represents a body of thought, I will not leave behind me any of those handles which will enable you to append a suffix in the form of an "-ism." In other words, none of the terms that I have made use of here one after the other – none of which, I am glad to see from your confusion, has yet managed to impress itself on you as the essential term, whether it be the symbolic, the signifier or desire – none of the terms will in the end enable anyone of you to turn into an intellectual cricket on my account.

Next then in a tragedy, there is a Chorus. And what is a Chorus? You will be told that it's you yourselves. Or perhaps that it isn't you. But that's not the point. Means are involved here, emotional means. In my view, the Chorus is people who are moved.

Therefore, look closely before telling yourself that emotions are engaged in this purification. They are engaged, along with others, when at the end they have to be pacified by some artifice or other. But that doesn't mean to say that they are directly engaged. On the one hand, they no doubt are, and you are there in the form of a material to be made use of; on the other hand, that material is also completely indifferent. When you go to the theater in the evening, you are preoccupied by the affairs of the day, by the pen that you lost, by the check that you will have to sign the next day. You shouldn't give yourselves too much credit. Your emotions are taken charge of by the healthy order displayed on the stage. The Chorus takes care of them. The emotional commentary is done for you, The greatest chance for the survival of classical tragedy depends on that. The emotional commentary is done for you. It is just sufficiently silly; it is also not without firmness; it is more or less human.

Therefore, you don't have to worry; even if you don't feel anything, the Chorus will feel in your stead. Why after all can one not imagine that the effect on you may be achieved, at least a small dose of it, even if you didn't tremble that much? To be honest, I'm not sure if the spectator ever trembles that much. I am, however, sure that he is fascinated by the image of Antigone.

In this he is a spectator, but the question we need to ask is, What is he a spectator of? What is the image represented by Antigone? That is the question.

Let us not confuse this relationship to a special image with the spectacle as a whole. The term spectacle, which is usually used to discuss the effect of tragedy, strikes me as highly problematic if we don't delimit the field to which it refers.

On the level of what occurs in reality, an auditor rather than a spectator is involved. And I can hardly be more pleased with myself since Aristotle agrees with me; for him the whole development of the arts of theater takes place at the level of what is heard, the spectacle itself being no more than something arranged on the margin. Technique is not without significance, but it is not essential; it plays the same role as elocution in rhetoric. The spectacle here is a secondary medium. It is a point of view that puts in its place the modern concerns with mise en scène or stagecraft. The importance of mise en scène should not be underrated, and I always appreciate it both in the theater and in the cinema. But we shouldn't forget that it is only important – and I hope you will forgive the expression – if our third eye doesn't get a hard-on; it is, so to speak, jerked off a little with the mise en scène.

In this connection I have no intention of giving myself up to the morose pleasure I was denouncing earlier by affirming a supposed decline in the spectator. I don't believe in that at all. From a certain point of view, the audience must always have been at the same level. Sub specie aeternitatis everything is equal, everything is always there, although it isn't always in the same place.

But I would just mention in passing that you really have to be a student in my seminar – by which I mean someone especially alert – to find something in the spectacle of Fellini's La Dolce Vita.

I am amazed at the murmur of pleasure that that name seems to have aroused among a significant number of you here today. I am ready to believe that this effect is only due to the moment of illusion produced by the fact that the things I say are calculated to emphasize a certain mirage, which is, in effect, the only one aimed at in the series of cinematographic images referred to. But it isn't reached anywhere except at one single moment. That is to say at the moment when early in the morning among the pines on the edge of the beach, the jet-setters suddenly begin to move again after having remained motionless and almost disappearing from the vibration of the light; they begin to move toward some goal that pleased a great many of you, since you associated it with my famous Thing, which in this instance is some disgusting object that has been caught by a net in the sea. Thank goodness, that hadn't yet been seen at the moment I am referring to. Only the jet-setters start to walk, and they remain almost always as invisible, just like statues moving among trees painted by Uccello. It is a rare and unique moment. Those of you who haven't been should go and observe what I've been teaching you here. It happens right at the end, so that you can take your seats at the right moment, if there are any seats left.

Now we are ready for Antigone.

Our Antigone is on the point of entering the action of the play, and we will follow her.

4

What else can I tell you today? I am hesitating because it is late. What I want to do is lead you from one end to the other to make you appreciate its scope.

There is nevertheless one thing that you could do between now and next time, and that is read the play. I don't suppose that alerting you last time by telling you that I would be talking about Antigone was even enough to make you glance at it, given the average level of zeal you display. It would, however, not be without interest if you did so before next time.

There are a thousand ways of doing so. First of all, there's Mr. Robert Pignarre's critical edition. For those who know Greek, I recommend the interlinear translation, since a word by word rendering is amazingly instructive, and I will be able to make you see the extent to which my points of reference are perfectly articulated in the text by the signifiers, so that I don't have to search for them all over the place. If I find a word now and then which echoes what I have to say, that would be a by no means arbitrary mode of confirmation. On the contrary, I will show you that the words I use are the words that are to be found running like a single thread from one end of the play to the other, and that these words give it its structure.

There is one other thing I would like to point out.

One day Goethe in a conversation with Eckermann was in a speculative mood. A few days previously he had invented the Suez canal and the Panama canal. I must say that you have to be quite brilliant to have extremely clear views on the subject of the historical function of these two pieces of equipment in 1827. Then one day he comes across a book that had just come out and has been completely forgotten since by a certain Irish, which is a nice little commentary on Antigone, and that I know through Goethe.

I don't see how it is so different from Hegel's commentary; it's a little more simpleminded, but there are some amusing things in it. Those who sometimes criticize Hegel for the extraordinary difficulty of his statements will find their taunts ratified by Goethe's authority. Goethe certainly rectifies the Hegelian view that Creon is opposed to Antigone as one principle of the law, of discourse, to another. The conflict is thus said to be linked to structures. Goethe, on the other hand, shows that Creon is driven by his desire and manifestly deviates from the straight path; he seeks to break through a barrier in striking at his enemy Polynices beyond limits within which he has the right to strike him. He, in fact, wants to inflict on him that second death that he has no right to inflict on him. All of Creon's speeches are developed with that end in view, and he thus rushes by himself toward his own destruction.

If it's not exactly stated in those terms, it is implied, intuited, by Goethe. It is not for him a question of a right opposed to a right, but of a wrong opposed to – what? To something else that is represented by Antigone. Let me tell you that it isn't simply the defense of the sacred rights of the dead and of the family, nor is it all that we have been told about Antigone's saintliness. Antigone is borne along by a passion, and I will try to tell you which one it is.

But one thing is strange, and that is that Goethe tells us he was shocked, rattled, by one point in her speeches. When every move has been made, her capture, her defiance, her condemnation, and even her lamentations, and she stands on the edge of the celebrated tomb with the martyrdom that we have witnessed already behind her, Antigone stops to justify herself. When she has already seemed to have been moved to a kind of "Father, why hast thou forsaken me?", she steps back and says, "Understand this: I would not have defied the law of the city for a husband or a child to whom a tomb had been denied, because after all," she says, "if I had lost a husband in this way, I could have taken another, and even if I had lost a child with my husband, I could have made another child with another husband. But it concerned my brother αὐτάδελφος, born of the same father and the same mother." The Greek term that expresses the joining of oneself to a brother or sister recurs throughout the play, and it appears right away in the first line when Antigone is speaking to Ismene. Now that Antigone's mother and father are hidden away in Hades, there is no possibility of another brother ever being born:

μητρὸς δ'ἐν Ἅιδου καὶ πατρὸς κεκευθότοιν
οὐκ ἔστ' ἀδελφὸς ὅστις ἄν βλάστοι ποτέ

The sage from Weimar finds that all that is a bit strange. He's not the only one. Over the centuries the reasoning found in that extraordinary justification has always left people uncertain. It's important that some madness always strike the wisest of discourses, and Goethe cannot help emitting a wish. "I wish," he says, "that one day some scholar will reveal to us that this passage is a later addition."

This is the truth of a prudent man, one who knows the value of a text, one who always takes care not to formulate ideas prematurely – for isn't that how one exposes oneself to all kinds of risks? – and naturally when one makes such a wish, one can always hope that it will be realized. But there were at least four or five nineteenth-century scholars who said that such a position is untenable.

A story just like it is said to be in Herodotus, in the third book. In truth, there isn't too great a relationship apart from the fact that it is a question of life and death and of a brother, father, husband and child. It concerns a woman who as a result of her lamentations is offered the possibility of choosing one person in her family to be pardoned, the whole family having been condemned, as was possible at the Persian court. The woman explains why she chooses her brother over her husband.

On the other hand, just because two passages resemble each other doesn't mean to say that one is copied from the other. Why, in any case, would the copied lines have been inserted there? In other words, this passage is so little apocryphal that these two lines are quoted roughly ninety years later by Aristotle in the third book of his Rhetoric in a passage that explains how one should explain one's acts. It is difficult to believe the someone who was living ninety years after Sophocles would have quoted these lines as a literary example, if they carried with them the odor of a scandal. That seems to render the thesis of a latter addition highly doubtful.

In the end, precisely because it carries with it the suggestion of a scandal, this passage is of interest to us. You can already see why; it is only there so as to furnish additional evidence to something that next time I will try to define as the aim of Antigone.

May 25, 1960

XX

The articulations of the play

I would like to try today to talk about Antigone, the play written by Sophocles in 441 B.C., and in particular about the economy of the play.

With the category of the beautiful, Kant says that only the example – which doesn't mean the object – is capable of assuring its transmission insofar as this is both possible and demanded. Now, from every point of view, this text deserves to play such a role for us.

As you in any case know, I am reopening the question of the function of the beautiful in relation to that which we have been considering as the aim of desire. In a word, it may be that something new on the subject of the function of desire may come to light here. That is the point we have reached.

It is only a single point on our path. Don't be astonished at how long that path is, Plato says somewhere in the Phaedrus, which is itself a dialogue on the beautiful: Don't be astonished if the detour is such a long one, for it is a necessary detour.

Today we need to make progress in our commentary on Antigone.

Read this truly admirable text. It is an unimaginable highpoint, a work of overwhelming rigor, whose only equivalent in Sophocles's work is his final work, Oedipus at Colonus, which was written in 401.

I will now attempt to analyze this text with you so as to make you appreciate its extraordinary stature.

1

As I said last time then, we have Antigone, we have something going on, we have the Chorus.

On the other hand, as far as the nature of tragedy is concerned, I quoted the end of Aristotle's sentence on pity and fear effecting the catharsis of the emotions, that famous catharsis the true meaning of which we will try to grasp at the end. Strangely enough, Goethe saw the function of this fear and pity in the action itself. That is, the action would provide us with a model of the balance between fear and pity. That is certainly not what Aristotle says; what he says is as inaccessible to us as a closed road on account of the curious fate that has left us with so little material to confirm what he says in his text, because so much of it has been lost down through the centuries.

I will tell you one thing right away. Please note, and this is my first point, that at first glance, of the two protagonists, Creon and Antigone, neither one seems to feel fear or pity. If you doubt that, it is because you haven't read Antigone, and since we are going to read the play together, I hope to point it out to you in the text.

My second point is that it is not "seems," but it is "certain" that at least one of the protagonists right through to the end feels neither fear nor pity, and that is Antigone. That is why, among other things, she is the real hero. Creon, on the other hand, is moved by fear toward the end, and if it isn't the cause of his ruin, it is certainly the sign of it.

Let us now take up the question from the beginning.

It's not even that Creon says the play's opening words. As composed by Sophocles, the play begins by introducing us to Antigone in her dialogue with Ismene; and she affirms her position and her reasons from the opening lines. Creon isn't even there as a foil. He only appears later. He is nevertheless essential for our demonstration.

Creon exists to illustrate a function that we have shown is inherent in the structure of the ethic of tragedy, which is also that of psychoanalysis; he seeks the good. Something that after all is his role. The leader is he who leads the community. He exists to promote the good of all.

What does his fault consist of? Aristotle tells us, using a term that he affirms falls directly within the province of tragic action, ἁμαρτία. We have some trouble translating that word. "Error," we say, and in order to relate it to ethics, we interpret it as "error of judgment." But perhaps it isn't as simple as that.

As I told you last time, almost a century separates the period of the creation of great tragedies from their interpretation by philosophical thought. Minerva, as Hegel has already said, takes flight at twilight. I'm not too sure, but I think we should remember this formula, which has been so often evoked, to recall that there is after all some distance between the teachings embodied in tragic rites as such and their subsequent interpretation in the form of an ethics, which with Aristotle is a science of happiness.

Nevertheless, it is true that we do note the following. And I would not have any difficulty finding ἁμαρτία in others of Sophocles's tragedies: it exists, it is affirmed. The terms ἁμαρτάνειν and ἁμαρτήματα are to be found in Creon's own speeches, when at the end he succumbs to the blows of fate. But ἁμαρτία does not appear at the level of the true hero, but at the level of Creon.

His error of judgment (and we come closer to it here than that thought which is fond of wisdom ever has) is to want to promote the good of all – and I don't mean the Supreme Good, for let us not forget that 441 B.C. is very early, and our friend Plato hadn't yet created the mirage of that Supreme Good – to promote the good of all as the law without limits, the sovereign law, the law that goes beyond or crosses the limit. He doesn't even notice that he has crossed that famous limit about which one assumes enough has been said when one says that Antigone defends it and that it takes the form of the unwritten laws of the Δίκη. One thinks one has said enough when one interprets it as the Justice or the Doctrine of the gods, but one hasn't, in fact, said very much. And there is no doubt that Creon in his innocence crosses over into another sphere.

Note that his language is in perfect conformity with that which Kant calls the Begriff or concept of the good. It is the language of practical reason. His refusal to allow a sepulcre for Polynices, who is an enemy and a traitor to his country, is founded on the fact that one cannot at the same time honor those who have defended their country and those who have attacked it. From a Kantian point of view, it is a maxim that can be given as a rule of reason with a universal validity. Thus, before the ethical progression that from Aristotle to Kant leads us to make clear the identity of law and reason, doesn't the spectacle of tragedy reveal to us in anticipation the first objection? The good cannot reign over all without an excess emerging whose fatal consequences are revealed to us in tragedy.

What then is this famous sphere that we must not cross into? We are told that it is the place where the unwritten laws, the will or, better yet, the Δίκη of the gods rules. But we no longer have any idea what the gods are. Let us not forget that we have lived for a long time under Christian law, and in order to recall what the gods are, we have to engage in a little ethnography. If you read the Phaedrus I was talking about just now, which is a reflection on the nature of love, you will see that we have changed the very axis of the words that designate it.

What is this love? Is it that which, as a result of the fluctuations of the whole Christian adventure, we have come to call sublime love? Is it, in effect, very close, although it was reached by other paths? Is it desire? Is it that which some people believe I identify with a certain central sphere, namely, some natural evil in man? Is it that which Creon somewhere calls anarchy? In any case, you will see that the way in which the lovers in the Phaedrus act in relation to love varies according to the "epopteia" in which they have participated. "Epopteia" here means initiation in the sense that the term has in antiquity; it designates very detailed ceremonies in the course of which certain phenomena occur. One comes upon these down through the centuries – and down to the present time, if one is willing to go to other regions of the globe – in the form of trances or phenomena of possession in which a divine being manifests itself through the mouth of someone who is, so to speak, willing to cooperate.

Thus Plato tells us that those who have undergone an initiation to Zeus do not react in love in the same way as those who were initiated to Ares. Just replace those names with those who in a given province of Brazil stand for a spirit of the earth or war or of a sovereign being. It is not our intention to engage in exoticism here, but that is what is involved.

In other words, this whole sphere is only really accessible to us from the outside, from the point of view of science and of objectification. For us Christians, who have been educated by Christianity, it doesn't belong to the text in which the question is raised. We Christians have erased the whole sphere of the gods. And we are, in fact, interested here in that which we have replaced it with as illuminated by psychoanalysis. In this sphere, where is the limit? A limit that has no doubt been there from the beginning, but which doubtless remains isolated and leaves its skeleton in this sphere that we Christians have abandoned. That is the question I am asking here.

The limit involved, the limit that it is essential to situate if a certain phenomenon is to emerge through reflection, is something I have called the phenomenon of the beautiful, it is something I have begun to define as the limit of the second death.

I first brought this to your attention in connection with Sade as something that sought to pursue nature to the very principle of its creative power, which regulates the alternation of corruption and generation. Beyond that order, which it is no longer easy for us to think of and assume in the form of knowledge – and that is taken to be a reference point in the development of Christian thought – Sade tells us that there is something else, that a form of transgression is possible, and he calls it "crime."

As I indicated, the form of the crime may only be a ridiculous fantasm, but what is in question is that which the thought points to. The crime is said to be that which doesn't respect the natural order. And Sade's thought goes as far as forging the strangely extravagant notion that through crime man is given the power to liberate nature from its own laws. For its own laws are chains. What one has to sweep aside in order to force nature to start again from zero, so to speak, is the reproduction of forms against which nature's both harmonious and contradictory possibilities are stifled in an impasse of conflicting forces. That is the aim of Sadean crime. It isn't for nothing that crime is one boundary of our exploration of desire or that it is on the basis of a crime that Freud attempted to reconstruct the genealogy of the law. The frontiers represented by "starting from zero," ex nihilo, is, as I indicated at the beginning of my comments this year, the place where a strictly atheist thought necessarily situates itself. A strictly atheist thought adopts no other perspective than that of "creationism."

Moreover, nothing demonstrates better that Sadean thought is situated at that limit than the fundamental fantasm one finds in Sade, a fantasm that is illustrated in a thousand or more exhausting images that he gives us of the manifestations of human desire. The fantasm involved is that of eternal suffering.

In the typical Sadean scenario, suffering doesn't lead the victim to the point where he is dismembered and destroyed. It seems rather that the object of all the torture is to retain the capacity of being an indestructible support. Analysis shows clearly that the subject separates out a double of himself who is made inaccessible to destruction, so as to make it support what, borrowing a term from the realm of aesthetics, one cannot help calling the play of pain. For the space in question is the same as that in which aesthetic phenomena disport themselves, a space of freedom. And the conjunction between the play of pain and the phenomena of beauty is to be found there, though it is never emphasized, for it is as if some taboo or other prevented it, as if some prohibition were there, which is related to the difficulty we are familiar with in our patients of admitting something that properly speaking belongs to the realm of fantasm.

I will point it out to you in Sade's texts, where it is so obvious that one fails to see it. The victims are always adorned not only with all kinds of beauty, but also with grace, which is beauty's finest flower. How does one explain this necessity, if not by the fact that we need to find it hidden, though imminent, however we approach the phenomenon, in the moving presentation of the victim or also in every form of beauty that is too obvious, too present, so that it leaves man speechless at the prospect of the image that is silhouetted behind it and threatens it. But what precisely is the threat, since it isn't the threat of destruction?

The whole question is so crucial that I intend to have you go over the passages of Kant's Critique of Judgment that are concerned with the nature of beauty; they are extraordinarily precise. I will leave them aside for the moment except to note the following: the forms that are at work in knowledge, Kant tells us, are interested in the phenomenon of beauty, though the object itself is not involved. I take it you see the analogy with the Sadean fantasm, since the object there is no more than the power to support a form of suffering, which is in itself nothing else but the signifier of a limit. Suffering is conceived of as a stasis which affirms that that which is cannot return to the void from which it emerged.

Here one encounters the limit that Christianity has erected in the place of all the other gods, a limit that takes the form of the exemplary image which attracts to itself all the threads of our desire, the image of the crucifixion. If we dare, not so much look it in the face – given that mystics have been staring at it for centuries, we can only hope that it has been observed closely – but speak about it directly, which is much more difficult, shall we say that what is involved there is something that we might call the apotheosis of sadism? And by that I mean the divinization of everything that remains in this sphere, namely, of the limit in which a being remains in a state of suffering, otherwise he can only do so by means of a concept that moreover represents the disqualification of all concepts, that is, the concept of ex nihilo.

Suffice it for me to remind you of what you as analysts encounter directly, in other words the extent to which the fantasm that guides feminine desire – from the reveries of pure young virgins to the couplings fantasized by middle-aged matrons—may be literally poisoned by the favored image of Christ on the cross. Need I go further and add that in connection with that image Christianity has been crucifying man in holiness for centuries? In holiness.

For some time now we have discovered that administrators are saints. Can't one turn that around and say that saints are administrators, administrators of the access to desire, for Christianity's influence over man takes place at the level of the collectivity? Those gods who are dead in Christian hearts are pursued throughout the world by Christian missionaries. The central image of Christian divinity absorbs all other images of desire in man with significant consequences. From an historical point of view, we have perhaps reached the edge of this. It is what in the language of administration is referred to as the cultural problems of underdeveloped countries.

I am not as a result going to promise you a surprise here, whether it be a good one or a bad one. You will come upon it, as Antigone says, soon enough.

Let us go back to Antigone.

2

Antigone is the heroine. She's the one who shows the way of the gods. She's the one, according to the Greek, who is made for love rather than for hate. In short, she is a really tender and charming little thing, if one is to believe the bidet-water commentary that is typical of the style used by those virtuous writers who write about her.

By way of introduction, I would just like to make a few remarks. And I will come right to the point in stating the term that is at the center of Antigone's whole drama, a term that is repeated twenty times, and that given the shortness of the text, sounds like forty – which, of course, does not prevent its not being read – ἄτη.

It is an irreplaceable word. It designates the limit that human life can only briefly cross. The text of the Chorus is significant and insistent – ἐκτος ἄτας. Beyond this Atè, one can only spend a brief period of time, and that's where Antigone wants to go. It's not a moving little journey at all. One learns from Antigone's own mouth testimony on the point she has reached: she literally cannot stand it anymore. Her life is not worth living. She lives with the memory of the intolerable drama of the one whose descendence has just been destroyed in the figures of her two brothers. She lives in the house of Creon; she is subject to his law; and that is something she cannot bear.

She cannot bear, you tell yourselves, to live with someone whom she abhors. But why not after all? She is fed and housed, and in Sophocles, she isn't married off like Giraudoux's Electra. Don't imagine by the way that Giraudoux invented that. It was Euripides, but in his play she isn't married off to the gardener. So that's the situation: Antigone cannot bear it, and it weighs down on her in such a way as to explain the resolution, which is affirmed from the beginning in her dialogue with Ismene.

This dialogue is of an exceptional harshness. Ismene points out that "Really, given our situation, we don't have much room to maneuver, so let's not make things worse." Antigone jumps on her right away, saying, "Especially now, don't ever say that again, for even if you wanted to, I won't have anything to do with you." And the term ἔχθρα, emnity, is used in connection with her relationship with her sister and what she will find in the other life when she finds her dead brother again. She who later on will say, "I am made for love rather than hate," is immediately introduced with the word emnity.

In the course of events, when her sister comes back to her to share her fate, and even though she hasn't committed the forbidden deed, Antigone will reject her also with a cruelty and a scorn that are consciously calculated. She says to Ismene, "Go back to your Creon, since you love him so."

This then is how the enigma of Antigone is presented to us: she is inhuman. But we shouldn't situate her at the level of the monstrous, for what would that mean from our point of view? That's all right for the Chorus, which is present throughout the whole story, and which at a certain moment after one of those breath-taking lines that are typical of Antigone, cries out, "She is ὠμός." We translate that as best we can by "inflexible." It literally means something uncivilized, something raw. And the word "raw" comes closest, when it refers to eaters of raw flesh. That's the Chorus's point of view. It doesn't understand anything. She is as ὠμός as her father – that's what the Chorus says.

What does it mean to us if Antigone goes beyond the limits of the human? What does it mean if not that her desire aims at the following – the beyond of Atè?

That same word Atè is to be found in "atrocious." That's what is involved here, and that's what the Chorus repeats at a given moment in its speech with an emphasis that is technical. One does or does not approach Atè, and when one approaches it, it is because of something that is linked to a beginning and a chain of events, namely, that of the misfortune of the Labdacides family. As one starts to come close to it, things come together in a great hurry, and what one finds at the bottom of everything that goes on at every level in this family, the text tells us, is a μέριμνα, which is almost the same word as μνήμη, with an emphasis on "resentment." But it is very wrong to translate it thus, for "resentment" is a psychological notion, whereas μέριμνα is one of those ambiguous words that are between the subjective and the objective, and that properly speaking give us the terms of signifying speech. The μέριμνα of the Labdacides is that which drives Antigone to the border of Atè.

One can no doubt translate Atè by "misfortune," but it doesn't have anything to do with misfortune. It is this meaning that is assigned by doubtless implacable gods, as she might say, which renders her pitiless and fearless. It is also this that, so as to have her appear in the course of carrying out her act, causes the poet to create the following fascinating image, namely, that first occasion when during the night she goes and covers her brother's body with a fine layer of dust, so that it is disguised enough to be hidden from view. One cannot, of course, expose to the eyes of the world that carrion flesh visited by dogs and birds, who come to tear off strips and carry them away, as the text says, only to leave them on the altars in town centers where they promote horror and pestilence.

Thus Antigone carries out the deed the first time. But what goes beyond a given limit must not be seen. The messenger goes and tells Creon what has happened, assuring him that no trace has been found, that there is no way of knowing who did it. The order is given to scatter the dust once again. But this time Antigone is caught in the act. Upon his return the messenger describes what happened in the following terms: first, they removed the dust that was covering the body, and then, they placed themselves up-wind so as to avoid the awful smells, because it stank. But a strong wind began to blow, and the dust started to fill the air and even, the text tells us, the heavens themselves. And at the very moment when everyone tries to escape, to cover their heads with their arms, and to go to earth at the spectacle of the change in nature, little Antigone appears at the height of the total darkness, of the cataclysmic moment. She appears once more beside the corpse, emitting moans, the text says, like a bird that has just lost its young.

It's a very strange image. And it is even stranger that it should be taken up and repeated by other authors. I found in Euripides' Phoenissae four lines where she is also compared to the lonely mother of a lost brood, who emits pathetic cries. That proves what the image of a bird always symbolizes in classical poetry. Let us not forget how close pagan myth is to ideas of metamorphosis – remember the transformation of Philomen and Baucis. It is the nightingale that appears in Euripides as the image of that which a human being is transformed into through his plaintive cries. The limit we have reached here is the one where the possibility of metamorphosis is located – metamorphosis that has come down through the centuries hidden in the works of Ovid and that regains its former vitality, its energy, during that turning point of European sensibility, the renaissance, and bursts forth in the theater of Shakespeare. That's what Antigone is.

The movement of the play toward its climax will from now on be obvious to you.

I must clear the ground further, but it's impossible not to point in passing to a few lines spoken by Antigone. Lines 48, 70, and 73, where Antigone expresses a kind of idiocy that is apparent at the end of a sentence in the word μετά.

Μετά means "with" or "after." Prepositions don't have the same function in Greek as they do in French, in the same way that particles play a different role in English from what we know in French. Μετά is, properly speaking, that which implies a break. In response to Creon's edict, she says, "But it has nothing to do with my concerns." At another moment, she says to her sister, "If you wanted to come with me now and to carry out the sacred task, I would no longer accept you." She says to her brother, "I will lie down, my loving friend, my almost lover, here with you." Μετά is placed each time at the end of the line in an inverse position, for normally this preposition like the word "with" is placed in front of the noun. This feature implies in a signifying form the kind of fierce presence Antigone represents.

I will skip the details of her dialogue with Ismene. The commentary could go on and on; it could take at least a year. I am sorry that I cannot contain the extraordinary substance of the style and metre involved in the framework of a seminar. I will pass on. After this opening, which demonstrates that the die is already cast, we have the Chorus. This alternation between action and the Chorus is something that, I believe, recurs five times.

But be careful. It is said that tragedy is an action. Is it ἄγειν? Is it πράττειν? The signifier introduces two orders in the world, that of truth and that of the event. But if one wants to retain it at the level of man's relations to the dimension of truth, one cannot also at the same time make it serve to punctuate the event. In tragedy in general there is no kind of true event. The hero and that which is around him are situated with relation to the goal of desire. What occurs concerns subsidence, the piling up of different layers of the presence of the hero in time. That's what remains undetermined: in the collapse of the house of cards represented by tragedy, one thing may subside before another, and what one finds at the end when one turns the whole thing around may appear in different ways.

An illustration of that is the following: after having broadcast the fact that he will never yield an inch in his responsibilities as ruler, Creon starts to lose his nerve once old Tiresias has finished giving him a piece of his mind. He then says to the Chorus, "Shouldn't I perhaps, after all . . . perhaps yield?" He says it in terms that, from the point of view of what I am arguing here, are extraordinarily precise, for Atè is used there again with a special appositeness. At that moment it is clear that if he had been to the grave before finally and belatedly granting the corpse its funeral honors, something that does after all take a little time, the worst might have been avoided.

Only there it is, it is probably not for nothing that he begins with the corpse; he wants, as they say, to come to terms with his conscience. Believe me, that is always the element that leads everyone astray whenever reparations are to be made. I have only given you a little illustration, for at every moment in the unfolding of the drama the question of temporality, of the way in which the threads in place are joined together, remains decisive, essential. But it is no more comparable to an action than what I referred to earlier as subsidence, as a collapse back onto its premises.

Thus, after the first dialogue between Antigone and Ismene, the music, the Chorus, the song of liberation, Thebes is beyond the power of those whom one might well call the barbarians. The style of the poem, which is that of the Chorus, represents Polynices's soldiers and his shadow strangely enough as a huge bird hovering above the houses. The image of our modern wars as something that glides overhead was already made concrete in 441 B.C.

Once this first musical entrance is finished – and one cannot help feeling that there is some irony involved on the part of the author – it's over or, in other words, things are about to begin.

3

Creon arrives and makes a long speech justifying his actions. But in reality there is only a docile Chorus there to hear him, a collection of yes-men. There follows a dialogue between Creon and the Chorus. The Chorus itself hasn't altogether given up the idea that there is something excessive in Creon's statements, but at the very moment when it is about to express the thought, that is when the messenger arrives and narrates what has happened, it gets told off in no uncertain terms.

The character of the messenger in this tragedy is a formidable one. He turns up shuffling and mumbling, and he says, "You can't imagine how much I have been thinking things over on my way here, and how many times I came close to taking off in a hurry. That's how a short trip turns into a long one." He's an impressive talker. He even goes so far as to say, "I am sorry to see that you are of the opinion that it is your opinion that you believe in lies."

In short, I am suspected of being suspicious. That style of δοκεῖ Ψευδῆ δοκεῖν resonates with the discourse of the Sophists, since Creon answers him right away, "You are in the process of making points on the subject of the δόξα." In brief, throughout a whole ridiculous scene the messenger engages in idle speculations about what has happened, and in particular speculations about their safety, in the course of which the guards are in a state of panic, in which they nearly come to blows before they draw lots in order to decide which one of them will be chosen to go as messenger. After having got it all out, he is the object of a stream of threats from Creon, who is the person in power and who on this occasion is excessively limited; Creon lets him know that they can all expect the worst if the guilty person is not found in a hurry. "I've come out of this in quite good shape," the messenger comments, "since I haven't been strung up right away to the end of a branch. They won't see me again in a hurry."

This scene is a bit like the entrance of the clowns. But the messenger is quite subtle; he is very clever when he says to Creon, "What is offended just now? Is it your heart or your ears?" He makes Creon turn around in circles; Creon is forced to face the situation in spite of himself. The messenger then explains, "If it is your heart, then it is the one who did the deed that offends it; I only offend your ears." We have already reached the height of cruelty but we're having fun.

And what happens immediately afterwards? A hymn of praise to mankind. The Chorus sets out to praise mankind. I am constrained by the time, so I can't go on, but I will take up this praise of mankind next time.

Then right after the extraordinary tall tale that is this hymn of praise to man, we see Antigone's guard turn up without any concern for verisimilitude, temporal verisimilitude at least. The guard is delighted. He's had a rare piece of luck; his responsibility in the case has been absolved once he has laid hands on the guilty party. Then the Chorus sings its song on mankind's relation to Atè. I'll come back to that, too, another time.

Next comes Hemon, who is Creon's son and Antigone's fiancé. He begins a dialogue with his father. The only confrontation between the father and son causes the dimension to appear that I began to discuss concerning the relations of man to his good; there is a moment of doubt, a hesitation. This point is extremely important if we want to be clear about Creon's stature. We will see later what he is, that is, like all executioners and tyrants at bottom, a human character. Only the martyrs know neither pity nor fear. Believe me, the day when the martyrs are victorious will be the day of universal conflagration. The play is calculated to demonstrate that fact.

Creon doesn't lose his nerve, far from it; his son leaves to the sound of the most terrible threats. And what bursts forth again at that very moment? The Chorus once more, and what does it have to say? Ἔρως ἀνίκατε μάχαν, "Invincible love of combat." I suppose that even those who do not know Greek have heard at one time or other those three words that have come down through the centuries with a number of melodies in their wake.

That song bursts forth at the very moment when Creon decrees the punishment Antigone will be made to undergo: she will be placed alive in a tomb – something that doesn't suggest too tender an imagination. Let me remind you that in Sade it is number seven or eight on the list of ordeals to which the hero is submitted – the reference is a useful one for you to realize the significance of what is involved here. It is precisely at this moment that the Chorus says in so many words: "This story is driving us mad; we are losing our grip; we are going out of our minds; as far as this child is concerned we are moved to . . . ," what the text, using a term whose appositeness I ask you to remember, calls ἵμερος ἐναργής.

Ἵμερος is the same term that in the Phaedrus points to what I am trying to grasp here as the reflection of desire of the kind by which even the gods are bound. It is the term used by Jupiter to designate his relations with Ganymede. Ἵμερος ἐναργής is literally desire made visible. This is what appears at the moment when the long scene that leads up to the punishment takes place.

After Antigone's speech, in which is to be found the passage discussed by Goethe that I talked about the other day, the Chorus starts up again with a mythological song in which at three different moments it evokes three especially dramatic destinies that are all on the boundary between life and death, the boundary of the still living corpse. Antigone herself even refers to the image of Niobe, who is imprisoned in the narrow cavity of a rock and will be exposed forever to the assault of rain and weather. It is around this image of the limit that the whole play turns.

At the moment when it is moving more and more toward a kind of explosive climax of divine delirium, the blind Tiresias appears. He doesn't simply announce the future, however, because the revelation of his prophecy has a role to play in the preparation of that future. In his dialogue with Creon he withholds what he has to say until the latter – in whose rigid mind everything is political or, in other words, a question of interest – is foolish enough to say a sufficient number of insulting things for Tiresias to come out with his prophecy. The value attributed to the words of a seer is, as in all circumstances where tradition counts, decisive enough for Creon to give in and resign himself to countermanding his own orders, which, of course, proves catastrophic.

The situation is heightened even further. In its penultimate appearance the Chorus breaks out in a hymn to the most hidden and supreme god, Dionysos. The spectators imagine that this is once again a hymn of liberation, that everyone is comforted, everything will work out all right. Those, on the other hand, who knew what Dionysos and his savage followers represent realize that the hymn breaks out because the limits of the field of the conflagration have been breached.

After that there is hardly room for the final twist of the action, the one in which the deluded Creon goes and knocks in desperation at the doors of the tomb within which Antigone has hanged herself. Hemon kisses her and emits a few final groans, but we do not know what happened in the sepulcre any more than we know what goes on when Hamlet goes down into the sepulcre. Antigone was after áll walled in at the limit of Atè, and one is justified in wondering at which moment Hemon entered the tomb. As when the actors turn their faces away from the spot where Oedipus disappears, we don't know what happened in Antigone's tomb.

In any case, when Hemon emerges, he is possessed by divine μανία. He shows all the signs of someone who has lost his reason. He attacks his father, misses him, and kills himself. And when Creon returns to the palace where a messenger has already preceded him, he discovers his wife is dead.

At that point the text shows us, in terms that are calculated to remind us where the limit is situated, a Creon who is out of his mind demanding that he be carried off – "Drag me out by my feet." And the Coryphaeus manages to find the strength to engage in a play of words in saying, "You're right to say that: the pain that one feels in one's feet is the best kind of pain; unlike other kinds, it doesn't last long."

Sophocles is no pedantic schoolmaster, but unfortunately he has been translated by pedants. In any case, that's how the corrida ends. Have the arena raked over, the bull removed, and cut off his you-know-what, if there is any left. That's the style in which he has been rendered. May he go off to the bright sound of little bells.

It is more or less in these terms that the play of Antigone has been translated. Next time I will take a little time to point out a few essential points that will enable you to link my interpretation directly to the very terms used by Sophocles.

I hope that that will take no more than half of my time, and that I will be able to speak afterwards about what Kant has to say on the subject of the beautiful.

June 1, 1960

XXI

Antigone between two deaths

THE-RACE-IS-RUN
SOPHOCLES'S ANTI-HUMANISM
THE LAW OF EX NIHILO
THE DEATH DRIVE ILLUSTRATED COMPLEMENT

I did recommend an interlinear edition of Antigone to those of you who know enough Greek to get by, but it's not available. Use the Garnier translation instead, since it's not bad at all.[1]

The following lines of the Greek text are the ones that concern us: 4–7, 323–325, 332–333, 360–375, 450–470, 559–560, 581–584, 611–614, 620–625, 648–650, 780–805, 839–841, 852–862, 875, 916–924, 1259–1260.

Lines 559–560 give us Antigone's attitude toward life. She tells us that her soul died long ago and that she is destined to give help, ὠφελῆν, to the dead – we spoke about the same word in connection with Ophelia.

Lines 611–614 and 620–625 have to do with the Chorus's statements on the limit that is Atè, and it is around this that what Antigone wants is played out.

I already pointed out last time the importance of the term that ends both of these passages, ἐκτὸς ἅτας. Ἐκτός signifies an outside or what happens once the limit of Atè has been crossed. When, for example, the guard comes and tells of the event that challenges Creon's authority, he says at the end that he is ἐκτὸς ἐλπίδος, outside or beyond all hope; he no longer hopes to be saved. Ἐκτὸς ἅτας has the meaning of going beyond a limit in the text. And it is around this notion that the Chorus's song is developed at that moment, in the same way that it says that man goes toward πρὸς ἅταν, that is, toward Atè. In this business the whole prepositional system of the Greeks is so vital and suggestive. It is because man mistakes evil for the good, because something beyond the limits of Atè has become Antigone's good, namely, a good that is different from everyone else's, that she goes toward, πρὸς ἅταν.

So as to take up the problem in a way that allows me to bring my comments together, I must return to a simple, clean, unencumbered view of the tragic hero, and in particular of the one who concerns us, Antigone.

[1] The best equivalent in English is, of course, the Loeb bilingual edition.

1

One thing has struck a commentator on Sophocles – commentator in the singular, for I have been surprised to find that it is only in a relatively recent book on Sophocles by Karl Reinhardt that something important has been brought out, namely, the special solitude of Sophoclean heroes, μονούμενοι, which is a nice term used by Sophocles, along with ἄφιλοι and φρενὸς οἰοβῶται, that is to say, those who lead their thoughts to graze far off. But it is nevertheless certain that it is not this that is involved here, for in the end tragic heroes are always isolated, they are always beyond established limits, always in an exposed position and, as a result, separated in one way or another from the structure.

It is strange that something very obvious has been overlooked. Let us examine the seven plays of Sophocles that are extant of the twenty-five which he is said to have produced during a life of ninety years, sixty of which he devoted to tragedy. They are Ajax, Antigone, Electra, Oedipus Rex, The Trachiniae, Philoctetes, and Oedipus at Colonus.

A certain number of these plays remain familiar to us, but you are not perhaps aware that Ajax is a very odd piece of work. It begins with the massacre of the Greeks' flock by Ajax. Because Athena doesn't wish him well, he goes crazy. He imagines he is massacring the Greek army, but it is their flock instead. Afterwards he awakens from his craziness, is overcome with shame, and goes and kills himself in a corner. There is absolutely nothing else in the play but that, which is, after all, rather peculiar. As I was saying the other day, there isn't even the suggestion of a perepetia. Everything is there from the beginning; the trajectories that are set in motion have only to come crashing down one on top of the other as best they can.

We will leave Antigone aside for one moment, since we are discussing it.

Electra, τόο, is an odd play of Sophocles. In Aeschylus we find the Choephoroe and the Eumenides, where the death of Agamemnon gives rise to all kinds of things. And once his murder has been avenged, Orestes then has to deal with the avenging divinities who protect the maternal blood. There is nothing comparable in Sophocles. Electra is in certain ways the very double of Antigone – "Dead in life," she says, "I am already dead to everything." Moreover, at that climactic moment when Orestes is making Aegisthus jump for it, he says to him, "Do you realize you are talking to people who are just like the dead? You are not talking to the living." It is an extremely odd note and the whole thing ends abruptly just like that. There isn't the least trace of anything superfluous. Everything ends abruptly. The end of Electra involves an execution in the proper sense of the word.

We can leave aside Oedipus Rex, given the perspective I am adopting here.

In any case, I am not claiming to promulgate a general law, since we know nothing of the greater part of Sophocles's work.

The Trachiniae has to do with the end of Hercules. Hercules has come to the end of his labors, and he knows it. He is told he will be able to go and rest, that his work is over. Unfortunately, he mixed up the last of his labors with the desire for a female captive, and because she loves him, his wife sends him the delightful tunic that she has been keeping since the beginning in case of need, as a kind of weapon to be reserved for the right moment. She sends it to him and you know what happens. The whole end of the play is taken up with Hercules's groans and roars of pain as he is consumed by the burning cloth.

Then there is Philoctetes. Philoctetes is a character who has been exiled on an island. He has been rotting away there for ten years, and then he is asked to render the community a service. All kinds of things happen, including the moving struggle with his conscience of the young Neoptolemes, who is dispatched to serve as bait in an attempt to deceive the hero.

Finally, there is Oedipus at Colonus.

You have no doubt noted the following. If there is a distinguishing characteristic to everything we ascribe to Sophocles, with the exception of Oedipus Rex, it is that for all his heroes the race is run. They are at a limit that is not accounted for by their solitude relative to others. There is something more; they are characters who find themselves right away in a limit zone, find themselves between life and death. The theme of between-life-and-death is moreover formulated as such in the text, but it is also manifest in the situations themselves.

One could even fit Oedipus Rex into this context. The hero has a characteristic that is both unique to him and paradoxical in relation to others. At the beginning of the drama he has attained the height of happiness. Yet Sophocles represents him as driven to bring about his own ruin through his obstinacy in wanting to solve an enigma, to know the truth. Everyone tries to prevent him, including especially Jocasta, who is always saying, "That's enough; we already know enough." Still he wants to know and in the end he does know. Yet I do grant that Oedipus Rex is an exception; it doesn't fit the general formula of the Sophoclean hero, who is marked by a stance of the-race-is-run.

Let us now return to Antigone, whose race is run in the most obvious of ways.

On one occasion I showed you an anamorphosis; it was the finest I could find for our purpose, and it is indeed exemplary, far beyond anything one could have hoped for. Do you remember the cylinder from which this strange phenomenon rises up? It cannot properly speaking be said that from an optical point of view there is an image as such. Without going into the optical definition of the phenomenon, one can say that it is because an infinitesimal fragment of image is produced on each surface of the cylinder that we see a series of screens superimposed; and it is as a result of these that a marvelous illusion in the form of a beautiful image of the passion appears beyond the mirror, whereas something decomposed and disgusting spreads out around it.

That's the kind of thing that is involved here.What is the surface that allows the image of Antigone to rise up as an image of passion? The other day I evoked in connection with her the phrase, "Father, why hast thou abandoned me?" which is literally expressed in one line. Tragedy is that which spreads itself out in front so that that image may be produced. When analyzing it, we follow an inverse procedure; we study how the image had to be constructed in order to produce the desired effect. So let's begin.

I have already emphasized the implacable side of Antigone; the side that shows neither fear nor pity is apparent at every point. Somewhere in order to deplore this, the Chorus calls her, line 875, αὐτόγνωτος. That should be heard alongside the γνῶθι σεαυτόν of the Delphic oracle. One cannot ignore the meaning of the kind of self-knowledge attributed to her.

I have already indicated her extreme harshness when she tells Ismene of her purpose at the beginning. "Do you realize what is happening?" she asks. Creon has just promulgated what is called a κήρυγμα – a term that plays an important role in modern protestant theology as a dimension of the revelation. Her manner is as follows: "Here's the situation then. This is what he has proclaimed for you and me." Then she adds in the lively style of the text: "I speak for me." And she goes on to affirm that she will bury her brother.

We will see what that means.

2

From then on things move fast. The guard comes and announces that the brother has been buried. At this point I am going to draw your attention to something that reveals the importance of Sophocles's work for us.

Some people have said, and I seem to remember that it is the name of one of the many works that I consulted, that Sophocles is a humanist. He is found to be human since he gives the idea of a properly human measure between a rootedness in archaic ideals represented by Aeschylus and a move toward bathos, sentimentality, criticism, and sophistry that Aristotle had already reproached Euripides with.

I don't disagree with the notion that Sophocles is in that median position, but as far as finding in him some relationship to humanism is concerned, that would be to give a wholly new meaning to the word. As for us, we consider ourselves to be at the end of the vein of humanist thought. From our point of view man is in the process of splitting apart, as if as a result of a spectral analysis, an example of which I have engaged in here in moving along the joint between the imaginary and the symbolic in which we seek out the relationship of man to the signifier, and the "splitting" it gives rise to in him. Claude Lévi-Strauss is looking for something similar when he attempts to formalize the move from nature to culture or more exactly the gap between nature and culture.

It is curious to note that on the edge of humanism it is also in this analysis, in this gap of analysis, of limits, in this attitude that the race is run, that the images rise up that turn out to be the most fascinating of that whole period of history which can be dubbed humanist.

I find for example the point in the text that you have in your hands, lines 360–375, very striking; it concerns the moment when the Chorus bursts forth just after the departure of the messenger whose comic responses and shuffling movements, when he comes to announce the news that may cost him dearly, I referred to earlier. It is really terrible, the Chorus says, to see someone so obstinate about believing he believes. Believing he believes what? Something that no one for the moment has the right to imagine, that is the play of δοκεῖ δοκεῖν. That's the element I sought to emphasize in that line along with the other response: "You're playing the fool with your stories about the δόξα." That's an obvious allusion to the philosophical games of the time that focused on a theme. The scene itself is quite ridiculous, for we are not really interested in whether the guard will be skinned alive or not on account of the bad news he bears, and he in any case gets out of it with a flourish.

Immediately afterwards in line 332 the Chorus breaks out in the chant that I said the other day was a celebration of mankind. It begins as follows:

πολλὰ τὰ δεινὰ κ' οὐδὲν ἀνθρώπου δεινότερον πέλει·

The lines mean literally: "There are a lot of wonders in the world, but there is nothing more wonderful than man."

As far as Lévi-Strauss is concerned, what the Chorus says about man here is really the definition of culture as opposed to nature: man cultivates speech and the sublime sciences; he knows how to protect his dwelling place from winter frosts and from the blasts of a storm; he knows how to avoid getting wet. Yet there is a slippage here; there is, it seems to me, an undeniable irony in what follows, in the famous phrase παντοπόρος ἄπορος, which has given rise to a debate on the subject of its punctuation. The accepted punctuation seems to be the following: παντοπόρος, ἄπορος ἐπ' οὐδὲν ἔρχεται τὸ μέλλον.

Παντοπόρος means "he who knows all kinds of tricks" – man knows a lot of tricks. Ἄπορος is the opposite; it means when one has no resources or defenses against something. You are, I suppose, familiar with the term aporia. Ἄπορος means one that is "screwed." As the proverb from the Vaud region has it, "Nothing is impossible for man; what he can't do, he ignores." That's the tone of the text.

Next we have – ἐπ' οὐδὲν ἔρχεται τὸ μέλλον.

Ἔρχεται means "he advances." Ἐπ' οὐδὲν means "toward nothing." Τὸ μέλλον can be translated quite innocently as "the future"; it also means "that which must happen," but at other moments it signifies μέλλειν, "to delay." As a result, τὸ μέλλον opens up a semantic field that isn't easy to identify precisely with a corresponding French term. The problem is usually solved by saying, "Since he is highly resourceful, he will never be without resources whatever he has to face." The thought strikes me as a little petty bourgeois. It's not clear that it was the poet's intention to emit such a platitude.

In the first place, it is difficult to disconnect the two terms that are joined at the beginning of the sentence, παντοπόρος ἄπορος. I also note that later on in line 370 we find another conjunction, ὑφίπολις ἄπολις, that is to say "he who is both above and outside the city." And this is the definition of a character generally identified, as I will explain later, with Creon, with his deformation. At the same time I am not sure that ἄπορος ἐπ' οὐδὲν ἔρχεται can be translated as "because he doesn't approach anything without resources." It isn't at all in conformity with the genius of the Greek language in this case. Ἔρχεται requires that ἐπ'οὐδὲν be attached to it. Ἐπ' agrees with ἔρχεται, not with ἄπορος. We are the ones who find there someone who is ready for everything, whereas it is literally a question of the following: "He advances toward nothing that is likely to happen, he advances and he is παντοπόρος, "artful," but he is ἄπορος, always "screwed." He knows what he's doing. He always manages to cause things to come crashing down on his head.

You should respond to this turning point as to something in the style of Prévert. And I will confirm that such is the case. Just afterwards one finds the line Ἅιδα μόνου φεῦζιν οὐκ ἐπάζεται, which means that there is only one thing he can't come to terms with and that has to do with Hades. Dying is something he doesn't know how to come to terms with. The important point occurs in what follows, – νόσων δ'ἀμηχάνων φυγὰς. Having said that there is one thing that man hasn't managed to come to terms with, and that is death, the Chorus says that he has come up with an absolutely marvelous gimmick, namely, translated literally, "an escape into impossible sicknesses." There is no way of ascribing another meaning to that phrase than the one I ascribe. The translations usually attempt to say that man even manages to come to deal with sickness, but that's not what it means at all. He hasn't managed to come to terms with death but he invents marvelous gimmicks in the form of sicknesses he himself fabricates. There is something extraordinary about finding that notion expressed in 441 B.C. as one of mankind's essential dimensions. It wouldn't make any sense to translate that as "an escape from sicknesses." Sickness is involved here μηχανόεν. That's quite a gimmick he has invented; make of it what you will.

In any case, the text repeats that man has failed relative to Hades, and we enter immediately afterwards into μηχανόεν. There is something related to σοφόν in that, a term that isn't so simple. I would just remind you of the analysis of the Heraclitean sense of σοφόν, "wise," and ὁμολογεῖν, "to say the same thing," that is to be found in the Heidegger text I translated for the first issue of La Psychanalyse. That σοφόν still has all of its primitive vigor. There is something of sophos in the mechanism, μηχανόεν. There is something ὑπὲρ ἐλπίδ'ἔχων, which transcends all hope and which ἕρπει. It's this that directs him sometimes toward evil and sometimes toward the good. That is to say that this power or mandate, as I translated the word sophos in the article I was talking about, which is laid upon him by this good, is an eminently ambiguous one.

Right afterwards we find the passage beginning νόμους παρείρων, etc., upon which the whole of the play is going to turn. For παρείρων means undeniably "to arrange the laws wrongly, to weave them together wrongly, to get them all mixed up." Χθονός is "the earth," and Θεῶν τ'ἔνορκον δίκαν is "that which is formulated or told in the law." That's the thing we appeal to in the silence of the analysand. We don't say "Speak." We don't say "Enunciate" or "Recount," but "Tell." But that's exactly what we shouldn't do. That Δίκη is essential and constitutes the dimension of enunciation or ἔνορκον, confirmed by an oath of the gods.

There are two obvious dimensions that may be distinguished without difficulty: on the one hand, the laws of the earth and, on the other, the commandments of the gods. But they may be confused. They don't belong to the same order, and if one mixes them up, there will be trouble. There will be so much trouble that the Chorus, which in spite of its vacillations does cleave to a fixed line, affirms, "In any case, we don't want to be associated with so and so." The point is to proceed in that direction is properly speaking τὸ μὴ καλόν or something that isn't "beautiful," and not, as it is translated, because of the very audacity of the idea, something that isn't "good." Thus the Chorus doesn't want the character in question as its παρέδρος, that is as its companion or immediate neighbor. The Chorus doesn't want to be with him in the same central point we are talking about. It doesn't want to have close relations with him, nor does it want to ἴσον φρονῶν, to have the same desire. It separates its own desire from the desire of the other. And I don't think I am forcing the issue when I find here an echo of certain formulas that I have given you.

Does Creon confuse νόμους χθονός with the Δίκη of the gods? The classical interpretation is clear: Creon represents the laws of the city and identifies them with the decrees of the gods. But it's not as obvious as that, for it cannot be denied that Antigone is after all concerned with the chthonic laws, the laws of the earth. I haven't stopped emphasizing the fact that it is for the sake of her brother who has descended into the subterranean world that she opposes κήρυγμα, that she resists Creon's order; it is in the name of the most radically chthonian of relations that are blood relations. In brief, she is in a position to place the Δίκη of the gods on her side. In any case the ambiguity is obvious. And this is something that we will shortly see confirmed.

I have already pointed out how, after the condemnation of Antigone, the Chorus emphasizes the fact that she went in search of her Atè. In a similar vein, Electra says, "Why do you always plunge yourself into the Atè of your house, why do you persist in referring to the fatal murder in front of Aegisthus and your mother? Aren't you the one who brings down all kinds of evil on your head as a result?" To which the other responds, "I agree but I can't help it."

It is because she goes toward Atè here, because it is even a question of going ἐκτὸς ἅτας, of going beyond the limit of Atè, that Antigone interests the Chorus. It says that she's the one who violates the limits of Atè through her desire. The lines I referred to above concern this and especially those that end with the formula ἐκτὸς ἅτας, to go beyond the limit of Atè. Atè is not ἁμαρτία, that is to say a mistake or error; it's got nothing to do with doing something stupid.

When at the end Creon returns bearing something in his arms, lines 1259–1260, and, as the Chorus tells us, it seems to be nothing other than the body of his son who has committed suicide, the Chorus then says, "If we may say so, it is not a misfortune that is external to him; it is αὐτὸς ἁμαρτών, his own mistake. He's the one who made the mistake of getting himself into the mess." Ἁμαρτία is the word used, that is "mistake" or "blunder."

That's the meaning Aristotle insists on, and to my mind he's wrong, for that is not the quality which leads the tragic hero to his death. It's only true for Creon the counter- or secondary hero, who is indeed ἁμαρτών. At the moment when Eurydice commits suicide, the messenger uses the word ἁμαρτάνειν. He hopes, we are told, that she isn't going to do something stupid. And naturally he and the Coryphaeus stiffen in anticipation because no noise is heard. The Coryphaeus says, "That's a bad sign." The mortal fruit that Creon harvests through his obstinacy and his insane orders is the dead son he carries in his arms. He has been ἁμαρτών; he has made a mistake. It's not a question here of ἀλλοτρία ἄτη. Atè concerns the Other, the field of the Other, and it doesn't belong to Creon. It is, on the other hand, the place where Antigone is situated.

3

And it is to Antigone that we must now turn.

Is she, as the classic interpretation would have it, the servant of a sacred order, of respect for living matter? Is hers the image of charity? Perhaps, but only if we confer on the word charity a savage dimension. Yet the path from Antigone's passion to her elevation is a long one.

When she explains to Creon what she has done, Antigone affirms the advent of the absolute individual with the phrase "That's how it is because that's how it is." But in the name of what? And to begin with on the basis of what? I must quote the text.

She says clearly, "You made the laws." But once again the sense is missed. Translated word for word, it means, "For Zeus is by no means the one who proclaimed those things to me." Naturally, she is understood to have said – and I have always told you that it is important not to understand for the sake of understanding – "It's not Zeus who gives you the right to say that." But she doesn't, in fact, say that. She denies that it is Zeus who ordered her to do it. Nor is it Δίκη, which is the companion or collaborator of the gods below. She pointedly distinguishes herself from Δίκη. "You have got that all mixed up," she, in effect, says. "It may even be that you are wrong in the way you avoid the Δίκη. But I'm not going to get mixed up in it; I'm not concerned with all these gods below who have imposed laws on men." ὥρισαν, ὁρίξω, ὅρος means precisely the image of an horizon, of a limit. Moreover, the limit in question is one on which she establishes herself, a place where she feels herself to be unassailable, a place where it is impossible for a mortal being to ὑπερδραμεῖν, to go beyond νόμιμα, the laws. These are no longer laws, νόμος, but a certain legality which is a consequence of the laws of the gods that are said to be ἄγραπτα, which is translated as "unwritten," because that is in effect what it means. Involved here is an invocation of something that is, in effect, of the order of law, but which is not developed in any signifying chain or in anything else.

Involved is an horizon determined by a structural relation; it only exists on the basis of the language of words, but it reveals their unsurpassable consequence. The point is from the moment when words and language and the signifier enter into play, something may be said, and it is said in the following way: "My brother may be whatever you say he is, a criminal. He wanted to destroy the walls of his city, lead his compatriots away in slavery. He led our enemies on to the territory of our city, but he is nevertheless what he is, and he must be granted his funeral rites. He doubtless doesn't have the same rights as the other. You can, in fact, tell me whatever you want, tell me that one is a hero and a friend, that the other is an enemy. But I answer that it is of no significance that the latter doesn't have the same value below. As far as I am concerned, the order that you dare refer me to doesn't mean anything, for from my point of view, my brother is my brother."

That's the paradox encountered by Goethe's thought and he vacillates. My brother is what he is, and it's because he is what he is and only he can be what he is, that I move forward toward the fatal limit. If it were anyone else with whom I might enter into a human relationship, my husband or my children for example, they are replaceable; I have relations with them. But this brother who is ἄθαπτος, who has in common with me the fact of having been born in the same womb – the etymology of the word ἀδελφός embodies an allusion to the womb – and having been related to the same father – that criminal father the consequences of whose crimes Antigone is still suffering from – this brother is something unique. And it is this alone which motivates me to oppose your edicts.

Antigone invokes no other right than that one, a right that emerges in the language of the ineffaceable character of what is – ineffaceable, that is, from the moment when the emergent signifier freezes it like a fixed object in spite of the flood of possible transformations. What is, is, and it is to this, to this surface, that the unshakeable, unyielding position of Antigone is fixed.

She rejects everything else. The stance of the-race-is-run is nowhere better illustrated than here. And whatever else one relates it to, is only a way of causing uncertainty or disguising the absolutely radical character of the position of the problem in the text.

The fact that it is man who invented the sepulchre is evoked discretely. One cannot finish off someone who is a man as if he were a dog. One cannot be finished with his remains simply by forgetting that the register of being of someone who was identified by a name has to be preserved by funeral rites.

No doubt all kinds of things may be added to that. All the clouds of the imaginary come to be accumulated around it as well as the influences that are released by the ghosts who multiply in the vicinity of death. But at bottom the affair concerns the refusal to grant Polynices a funeral. Because he is abandoned to the dogs and the birds and will end his appearance on earth in impurity, with his scattered limbs an offense to heaven and earth, it can be seen that Antigone's position represents the radical limit that affirms the unique value of his being without reference to any content, to whatever good or evil Polynices may have done, or to whatever he may be subjected to.

The unique value involved is essentially that of language. Outside of language it is inconceivable, and the being of him who has lived cannot be detached from all he bears with him in the nature of good and evil, of destiny, of consequences for others, or of feelings for himself. That purity, that separation of being from the characteristics of the historical drama he has lived through, is precisely the limit or the ex nihilo to which Antigone is attached. It is nothing more than the break that the very presence of language inaugurates in the life of man.

That break is manifested at every moment in the fact that language punctuates everything that occurs in the movement of life. Αὐτόνομος is the word the Chorus uses to situate Antigone; it tells her, "You are going off toward death without knowing your own law." Antigone knows what she is condemned to, that is, to take part, so to speak, in a game whose outcome is known in advance. It is, in effect, posited as a game by Creon. She is condemned to the sealed chamber of the tomb in which she will be put to the test, namely, that of knowing if the gods below will come to her aid. It is at this point in her ordeal that Creon pronounces his condemnation, when he says, "We'll see how useful your loyalty to the gods below will be. You will have the food that is always placed next to the dead by way of an offering, and we'll see just how long you last with that."

It is at that moment that the tragedy is illuminated with a new light, in the form of Antigone's κομμός, her complaint or lamentation. And it is significant that certain commentators have been scandalized by it.

4

When does this complaint begin? From the moment when she crosses the entrance to the zone between life and death, that is to say, when what she has already affirmed herself to be takes on an outward form. She has been telling us for a long time that she is in the kingdom of the dead, but at this point the idea is consecrated. Her punishment will consist in her being shut up or suspended in the zone between life and death. Although she is not yet dead, she is eliminated from the world of the living. And it is from that moment on that her complaint begins, her lamentation on life.

Antigone will lament that she is departing ἄταφος, without a tomb, even though she is to be shut up in a tomb, without a dwelling place, mourned by no friend. Thus her separation is lived as a regret or lamentation for everything in life that is refused her. She even evokes the fact that she will never know a conjugal bed, the bond of marriage, that she will never have any children. The speech is a long one.

It has occurred to some commentators to cast doubt on this side of the tragedy in the name of the so-called unity of the character represented as the cold and inflexible Antigone. The term ψυχρόν is that of coldness and frigidity. Creon calls her "a cold object to caress," line 650, in a dialogue with his son, so as to let him know that he's not losing very much. Antigone's character is contrasted with her complaint so as to bring out the lack of verisimilitude in an outburst that, it is held, should not be attributed to the poet.

It's an absurd misinterpretation, for from Antigone's point of view life can only be approached, can only be lived or thought about, from the place of that limit where her life is already lost, where she is already on the other side. But from that place she can see it and live it in the form of something already lost.

And it is from the same place that the image of Antigone appears before us as something that causes the Chorus to lose its head, as it tells us itself, makes the just appear unjust, and makes the Chorus transgress all limits, including casting aside any respect it might have for the edicts of the city. Nothing is more moving than that ἵμερος ἐναργής, than the desire that visibly emanates from the eyelids of this admirable girl.

The violent illumination, the glow of beauty, coincides with the moment of transgression or of realization of Antigone's Atè, which is the characteristic that I have chiefly insisted on and which introduced us to the exemplary function of Antigone's problem in allowing us to determine the function of certain effects. It is in that direction that a certain relationship to a beyond of the central field is established for us, but it is also that which prevents us from seeing its true nature, that which dazzles us and separates us from its true function. The moving side of beauty causes all critical judgment to vacillate, stops analysis, and plunges the different forms involved into a certain confusion or, rather, an essential blindness.

The beauty effect is a blindness effect. Something else is going on on the other side that cannot be observed. In effect, Antigone herself has been declaring from the beginning: "I am dead and I desire death." When Antigone depicts herself as Niobe becoming petrified, what is she identifying herself with, if it isn't that inanimate condition in which Freud taught us to recognize the form in which the death instinct is manifested? An illustration of the death instinct is what we find here.

It is at the moment when Antigone evokes Niobe that the Coryphaeus sings her praise, line 840: "You then are half-goddess." Then Antigone's response bursts forth, and she is far from being a half-goddess: "This is absurd; you are making fun of me." And the word she uses means "outrage," which, as I have already indicated, is manifestly correlated to the moment of crossing over. The Greek word is used here in its proper sense, which is directly related to the term meaning to cross over – "outrage" is to go "out" or beyond (c'est aller outre), go beyond the right one has to make light of what happens at the greatest of costs. Ὑβρίζεις is the term Antigone confronts the Chorus with: "You do not realize what you are saying. You outrage me." But her stature is far from diminished as a result, and her complaint, the κομμός, her long complaint, follows immediately.

The Chorus then goes on to make an enigmatic reference to three quite disparate episodes from the history of mythology. The first concerns Danae, who was shut up in a bronze chamber. The second is to Lycurgus, the son of Dryas, King of the Edonians, who was mad enough to persecute the servants of Dionysos, to pursue and terrify them, and even to rape their women and to make divine Dionysos jump into the sea. This is the first mention we have of the Dionysiac. In Book II of the Iliad we find Dionysos in a death-like state, and he goes on to revenge himself by transforming Lycurgus into a madman. There are a number of different forms of the myth – perhaps he was imprisoned; blinded by Dionysos's madness he even killed his own sons whom he mistook for vine shoots, and he hacked off his own limbs. But that's not important because the text only refers to the vengeance of Dionysos the God. The third example, which is even more obscure, concerns the hero Phineas, who is at the center of a whole bundle of legends that are full of contradictions and extremely difficult to reconcile. He is found on a cup as the object of a conflict between the Harpies, who torment him, and the Boreads, the two sons of Boreas who protect him, and on the horizon there passes, strangely enough, the wedding procession of Dionysos and Ariadne.

There is certainly a lot to be gained in the interpretation of these myths, if it turns out to be possible. Their disparate character and the apparent lack of relevance to the issues at hand is certainly one of the burdens that the tragic texts impose on their commentators. I don't pretend to be able to solve the problem, but it was by bringing to the attention of my friend Lévi-Strauss the difficulty of this passage, that I recently managed to interest him in Antigone.

There is nevertheless something that one can point to in this rash of tragic episodes evoked by the Chorus at the moment when Antigone is at the limit. They all concern the relationship of mortals to the gods. Danae is entombed because of the love of a god; Lycurgus is punished because he attempted to commit violence on a god, and it is also because she is of divine descent that Cleopatra the Boread and rejected companion of Phineas is implicated in the story – she is referred to as ἄμιππος, that is to say, as swift as a horse, and it is said that she also moves faster across solid ice than any steed; she's a skater. Now the striking thing about Antigone is that she undergoes a misfortune that is equal to that of all those who are caught up in the cruel sport of the gods. Seen from the outside by us as ατραγωδόι, she appears as the victim at the center of the anamorphic cylinder of the tragedy. She is there in spite of herself as victim and holocaust.

Antigone appears as αὐτόνομος, as a pure and simple relationship of the human being to that of which he miraculously happens to be the bearer, namely, the signifying cut that confers on him the indomitable power of being what he is in the face of everything that may oppose him.

Anything at all may be invoked in connection with this, and that's what the Chorus does in the fifth act when it evokes the god that saves.

Dionysos is this god; otherwise why would he appear there? There is nothing Dionysiac about the act and the countenance of Antigone. Yet she pushes to the limit the realization of something that might be called the pure and simple desire of death as such. She incarnates that desire.

Think about it. What happens to her desire? Shouldn't it be the desire of the Other and be linked to the desire of the mother? The text alludes to the fact that the desire of the mother is the origin of everything. The desire of the mother is the founding desire of the whole structure, the one that brought into the world the unique offspring that are Eteocles, Polynices, Antigone and Ismene; but it is also a criminal desire. Thus at the origin of tragedy and of humanism we find once again an impasse that is the same as Hamlet's, except strangely enough it is even more radical.

No mediation is possible here except that of this desire with its radically destructive character. The fruit of the incestuous union has split into two brothers, one of whom represents power and the other crime. There is no one to assume the crime and the validity of crime apart from Antigone.

Between the two of them, Antigone chooses to be purely and simply the guardian of the being of the criminal as such. No doubt things could have been resolved if the social body had been willing to pardon, to forget and cover over everything with the same funeral rites. It is because the community refuses this that Antigone is required to sacrifice her own being in order to maintain that essential being which is the family Atè, and that is the theme or true axis on which the whole tragedy turns.

Antigone perpetuates, eternalizes, immortalizes that Atè.

June 8, 1960

SUPPLEMENTARY NOTE

I would like now to focus on the meaning I give to such an exploration of the tragedy of Antigone.

It may have seemed demanding to some of you. For some time now I have used the metaphor of the rabbit and the hat in connection with a certain way of making something appear from analytical discourse that isn't there. I might almost say that on this occasion I have put you to the test of eating raw rabbits. You can relax now. Take a lesson from the boa constrictor. Have a little nap and the whole thing will pass through. You will even notice on waking that you have digested something after all.

It is on account of the procedure I have adopted – and it's no doubt quite a demanding one obviously, quite a tough one – of requiring you to accompany me in breaking the stones along the road of the text that it will enter your body. You will see in retrospect that even if you are not aware of it, the latent, fundamental image of Antigone forms part of your morality, whether you like it or not. That's why it is important to analyze its meaning, and it's not the watered-down meaning in the light of which its lesson is usually transmitted.

Involved here is nothing more nor less than the reinterpretation of the Sophoclean message. You can certainly resist this resharpening of the text's high points, but if you decide to reread Sophocles, you will perceive the distance we have traveled. Even if I am challenged on a given point – for I don't exclude the possibility that I, too, on occasion may misinterpret something – I believe I have dissipated the all-encompassing nonsense in which Sophocles is carefully preserved by a certain tradition.

While I was discussing that with some of you who were countering my views with memories they had of reading Oedipus at Colonus – memories that were obviously influenced by the scholarly interpretation – I remembered a little footnote. There are people here who like footnotes. So I will read one that is to be found in a work that psychoanalysts ought to have read at least once, namely, Erwin Rohde's Psyche, of which there exists an excellent French translation.

On the whole, you will find more there, and more that is certain, concerning that which Greek civilization has handed down to us than in any work originally written in French. The most brilliant people on earth don't have all the arrows in their quiver. As it is, we are unfortunate enough to have a romantic movement that didn't rise much above the level of a certain idiocy, and we by no means possess all the advantages when it comes to erudition.

On page 463 of the French translation of Erwin Rohde's book, you will find a little footnote on Oedipus at Colonus, which I have already discussed with you in terms that are directly related to what I am concerned with today. Rohde writes: "One only has to read the play with an open mind to realize that this savage, angry, pitiless old man who calls down horrible curses on his sons" – Rohde is perfectly correct, for twenty minutes before the end of the play, Oedipus is still crushing Polynices beneath the weight of his curses – "and who as a man thirsty for revenge looks forward passionately to the misfortunes that are about to descend on his native town, has none of that profound peace of the gods, of that transfiguration associated with the penitent, which traditional exegesis is pleased to observe in him. The poet does not make a habit of disguising life's realities, and here he shows himself to be fully aware that destitution and misfortune do not usually have the effect of transfiguring man; they depress him rather and strip him of his nobility. His Oedipus is pious. He was from the beginning in Oedipus Rex, but in his distress he turns savage."

That is the testimony of a reader who is not especially concerned with the problems of tragedy, since his work is an historical account of the different concepts that the Greeks had of the soul.

As far as we are concerned, I have tried to show you that at a time that preceded the ethical formulations of Socrates, Plato and Aristotle, Sophocles presents us with man and questions him along the paths of his solitude; he situates the hero in a sphere where death encroaches on life, in his relationship, that is, to what I have been calling the second death here. This relationship to being suspends everything that has to do with transformation, with the cycle of generation and decay or with history itself, and it places us on a level that is more extreme than any other insofar as it is directly attached to language as such.

To put it in the terms of Lévi-Strauss – and I am certain that I am not mistaken in invoking him here, since I was instrumental in having had him reread Antigone and he expressed himself to me in such terms – Antigone with relation to Creon finds herself in the place of synchrony in opposition to diachrony.

I have stopped half-way in what I might have said about the text. We are not in a position to exhaust its significance this year, if only for reasons of time, but it is clear that the question raised at the end concerns what I shall call the divine use of Antigone.

In this connection one might make a number of comparisons. Antigone hanging in her tomb evokes something very different from an act of suicide, since there are all kinds of myths of hanged heroines, including girls, such as that of Erigone, who is linked to the advent of the cult of Dionysos. Dionysos has given wine to her father, but because he doesn't know its properties, he violates her and dies. She then hangs herself on his tomb. It is an explanatory myth of a whole rite in which we see more or less simplified and symbolic images of girls hanging from trees. In short, one finds there a whole ritual and mythical background, which may be brought back to resituate in its religious harmony all that is produced on the stage. It is nevertheless true that from a Sophoclean perspective the hero has nothing to do with that kind of use. Antigone is someone who has already set her sights on death. The invocation that is wrapped around this stem is something else; it doesn't have to do with human defiance here.

That's as far as I will go today. Involved in what I had to say to you about catharsis is the beauty effect. The beauty effect derives from the relationship of the hero to the limit, which is defined on this occasion by a certain Atè. And on that subject I will now, so to speak, pass the word to someone else (passer la parole), conscious of the fact that I am using the very definitions of the structure of the seminar.

In effect, I don't want to be the one who, like some jack-of-all trades, takes upon himself alone the task of poking about in all those more-or-less heterogeneous fields that offer the traditional formulations of these things.

At a certain level within you, I mean all of you individually at a certain point in your thinking, there is a form of resistance to the things I am trying to express, and it consists of making sympathetic comments that are more-or-less ambiguous in kind on what has come to be known as my learning or, as is also said, my cultural background. It's something I don't like. It also has a negative side; one wonders where I find the time to assemble all that. But you will recognize that my existence began a little before yours. I may not have had two hundred years of mowing like an English lawn, but I am getting there. In any case, I am closer than you are, and I've had time to forget several times over the things I discuss with you.

I would, therefore, like today to ask someone to speak about the beautiful who seems to me to be particularly well-equipped to discuss it in relation to something that I take to be essential for the continuation of my argument; that something is the definition of the beautiful and the sublime as articulated by Kant.

Involved there is a form of category analysis that is of the highest significance in any effort to connect up with the topological structuration that I am pursuing with you here. It seems to me essential to take the time to recall Kant's insights, if you have already read The Critique of Judgment, or to hear what they are, if you haven't yet had the opportunity to read that work. That is why I have asked Mr. Kaufmann to speak to us now.

You will see afterwards the use that we might make of the work he will be presenting for your benefit today. [Mr. Kaufmann's presentation followed.]

You were certainly right to state that infinitesimal calculus is evoked behind the experience of the sublime. One should note that in Kant's time infinitesimal calculus still harbored a kind of mystery of the signifier that has totally disappeared since that time.

The 1764 passage you quoted from Kant should really be communicated to Claude Lévi-Strauss, as the inaugural speech he gave on being appointed to his Chair at the Collège de France is already implied there. I don't mean by that antedated, but anticipated precisely in a way that is not emphasized at all in Rousseau. Kant already founds the ethics of ethnography there.

The work you presented today suggested to the audience here, which is heterogeneous in its educational background, the idea of structures around which Kant both regroups and dissociates the idea of the beautiful. We might have placed in the background the idea of pleasure in Aristotle and have quoted the nice little definition he gives of it in the Rhetoric.

We will use that as a fulcrum – something that is in traditional philosophy – when we take up again where we left off the question of the effect of tragedy. Although we think we always have to defer to Aristotle, that effect concerned cannot be fully explained in terms of moral catharsis.

June 15, 1960

THE TRAGIC DIMENSION OF PSYCHOANALYTIC EXPERIENCE

XXII

The demand for happiness and the promise of analysis

DESIRE AND THE LAST JUDGMENT
THE SECOND DEATH
THE FABLE OF THE CLODHOPPERS HADES AND DIONYSOS
THE ANALYST'S DESIRE

The report I gave two years ago at Royaumont on "The Direction of the Cure" is to appear in the next issue of our review. The text is somewhat thrown together because I wrote it between two seminars I was giving here. I shall keep its improvised form, although I will try to fill out and rectify certain things to be found there.

1

I said somewhere that an analyst has to pay something if he is to play his role.

He pays in words, in his interpretations. He pays with his person to the extent that through the transference he is literally dispossessed. The whole current development of analysis involves the misrecognition of the analyst, but whatever he thinks of that and whatever panic reaction the analyst engages in through "the countertransference," he has no choice but to go through it. He's not the only one there with the person to whom he has made a commitment.

Finally, he has to pay with a judgment on his action. That's the minimum demanded. Analysis is a judgment. It's required everywhere else, but if it seems scandalous to affirm it here, there is probably a reason. It is because, from a certain point of view, the analyst is fully aware that he cannot know what he is doing in psychoanalysis. Part of this action remains hidden even to him.

And it is this that justifies the direction I have been taking you in this year, the point to which I have suggested you follow me, namely, there where the question of exploring the general ethical consequences involved in Freud's opening up of the relationship to the unconscious is raised.

I grant that there was the appearance of a detour, but it was necessary so as to bring you closer to our ethics as analysts. A few reminders were necessary before I could bring you closer to the practice of analysis and its technical problems. In the present state of affairs, they can hardly be resolved through such reminders.

In the first place, is it the end of analysis that is demanded of us? What is demanded can be expressed in a simple word, bonheur or "happiness," as they say in English. I'm not saying anything new in that; a demand for happiness is doubtless involved here.

In the report I referred to earlier – which, now that I see it in print, seems a little too aphoristic, which explains why I will attempt here to lubricate its hinges a little – I allude to the question without explaining it further. The business is not helped by the fact that happiness has become a political matter. I won't go any further into this, but it is the reason why I ended the lecture called "Dialectical Psychoanalysis" – a lecture in which I brought to an end a certain period of activity in a group that we have broken with since – with the words, "There is no satisfaction for the individual outside of the satisfaction of all."

To refocus analysis on the dialectic makes evident the fact that the goal is indefinitely postponed. It's not the fault of analysis if the question of happiness cannot be articulated in any other way at the present time. I would say that it is because, as Saint-Just says, happiness has become a political matter. It is because happiness has entered the political realm that the question of happiness is not susceptible to an Aristotelian solution, that the prerequisite is situated at the level of the needs of all men. Whereas Aristotle chooses between the different forms of the good that he offers the master, and tells him that only certain of these are worthy of his devotion – namely, contemplation – the dialectic of the master has, I insist, been discredited in our eyes for historical reasons that have to do with the period of history in which we find ourselves. Those reasons are expressed in politics by the following formula: "There is no satisfaction for the individual outside of the satisfaction of all."

It is in such a context that analysis appears to be – without our being able to explain why precisely it is the case in this context – and the analyst sets himself up to receive, a demand for happiness.

I have set out to show you this year the distance traveled since Aristotle, say, by choosing among some of the most crucial concepts. I wanted to make you feel the extent to which we approach these things differently, how far we are from any formulation of a discipline of happiness.

There is in Aristotle a discipline of happiness. He shows the paths along which he intends to lead anyone who is willing to follow him in his problematic, paths which in different spheres of potential human activity lead to the realization of one of the functions of virtue. Such virtue is achieved through μεσότης, something that is far from being a simple golden mean or a process linked to the avoidance of excess; instead it is supposed to enable man to choose that which might reasonably allow him to realize himself in his own good.

Please note that one finds nothing similar in psychoanalysis. Along paths that would appear surprising to someone straight out of high school, we claim to allow the subject to put himself in a position such that things mysteriously and almost miraculously work themselves out right, provided he grasp them at the right end. Goodness only knows how obscure such a pretension as the achievement of genital objecthood (l'objectalité genitale) remains, along with what is so imprudently linked to it, namely, adjustment to reality.

One thing only alludes to the possibility of the happy satisfaction of the instinct, and that is the notion of sublimation. But it is clear that if one looks at the most esoteric formulation of the concept in Freud, in the context of his representing it as realized preeminently in the activity of the artist, it literally means that man has the possibility of making his desires tradeable or salable in the form of products. The frankness and even cynicism of such a formulation has in my eyes a great merit, although it is far from exhausting the fundamental question, and that is, How is it possible?

The other formulation consists of informing us that sublimation is the satisfaction of the drive with a change of object, that is, without repression. This definition is a profounder one, but it would also open up an even knottier problematic, if it weren't for the fact that my teaching allows you to spot where the rabbit is hidden.

In effect, the rabbit to be conjured from the hat is already to be found in the instinct. This rabbit is not a new object; it is a change of object in itself. If the drive allows the change of object, it is because it is already deeply marked by the articulation of the signifier. In the graph of desire that I gave you, the instinct is situated at the level of the unconscious articulation of a signifying series and is for this reason constituted as fundamental alienation. That is why, on the other hand, each of the signifiers composing this series is joined by a common element.

In the definition of sublimation as satisfaction without repression, whether implicitly or explicitly, there is a passage from not-knowing to knowing, a recognition of the fact that desire is nothing more than the metonymy of the discourse of demand. It is change as such. I emphasize the following: the properly metonymic relation between one signifier and another that we call desire is not a new object or a previous object, but the change of object in itself.

Let me cite as an example something that occurred to me when I was preparing these comments for you, so that I could give an image of what I mean by sublimation. Think of the shift from a verb to what in grammar is called its complement or, in a more philosophical grammar, its determinative. Think of the most radical of verbs in the development of the phases of the drive, the verb "to eat." There is "eating." That is how the verb, the action, appears head-first in many languages, before there is any determination as to who is involved. Thus one sees here the secondary character of the subject, since we don't even have the subject, the something that is there to be eaten.

There is eating – the eating of what? Of the book.

When in the Apocalypse we read this powerful image, "eat the book," what does it mean? – if it isn't that the book itself acquires the value of an incorporation, the incorporation of the signifier itself, the support of the properly apocalyptic creation. The signifier in this instance becomes God, the object of the incorporation itself.

In daring to formulate a satisfaction that isn't rewarded with a repression, the theme that is central or preeminent is, What is desire? And in this connection I can only remind you of what I have articulated in the past: realizing one's desire is necessarily always raised from the point of view of an absolute condition. It is precisely to the extent that the demand always under- or overshoots itself that, because it articulates itself through the signifier, it always demands something else; that in every satisfaction of a need, it insists on something else; that the satisfaction formulated spreads out and conforms to this gap; that desire is formed as something supporting this metonymy, namely, as something the demand means beyond whatever it is able to formulate. And that is why the question of the realization of desire is necessarily formulated from the point of view of a Last Judgment.

Try to imagine what "to have realized one's desire" might mean, if it is not to have realized it, so to speak, in the end. It is this trespassing of death on life that gives its dynamism to any question that attempts to find a formulation for the subject of the realization of desire. To illustrate what I am saying, if we pose directly the question of desire on the basis of that Parminedean absolutism, which eliminates everything that is not being, then we will say, nothing is from that which is not born, and all that exists lives only in the lack of being.

2

Does life have anything to do with death? Can one say that the relationship to death supports or subtends, as the string does the bow, the curve of the rise and fall of life? It is enough for us to take up again the question that Freud himself thought he could raise on the basis of his experience – everything points to the fact that it is effectively raised by our experience.

In what I was saying a moment ago, I wasn't talking about that death. I am interested in the second death, the one that you can still set your sights on once death has occurred, as I showed you with concrete examples in Sade's texts.

After all, the human tradition has never ceased to keep this second death in mind by locating the end of our sufferings there; in the same way it has never ceased to imagine a second form of suffering, a suffering beyond death that is indefinitely sustained by the impossibility of crossing the limit of the second death. And that is why the tradition of hell in different forms has always remained alive, and it is still present in Sade in the idea he has of making the sufferings inflicted on a victim go on indefinitely. This refinement is attributed to one of the heroes of his novels, a Sadist who tries to assure himself of the damnation of the person he sends out of life into death.

Whatever the significance of the metapsychological imagining of Freud's that is the death instinct, whether or not he was justified in forging it, the question it raises is articulated in the following form by virtue of the mere fact that it has been raised: How can man, that is to say a living being, have access to knowledge of the death instinct, to his own relationship to death?

The answer is, by virtue of the signifier in its most radical form. It is in the signifier and insofar as the subject articulates a signifying chain that he comes up against the fact that he may disappear from the chain of what he is.

In truth, it's as dumb as can be. Not to recognize it, not to promote it as the essential articulation of non-knowledge as a dynamic value, not to recognize that the discovery of the unconscious is literally there in the form of this last word, simply means that they don't know what they are doing. Not remembering this fundamental principle causes the proliferation that one can observe in analytical theory, a whole jungle, a veritable downpour of references – "It's coming down in handfuls," as they say in Charente – and one cannot help noticing the note of disorientation with which it resonates.

I read no doubt a little hastily the translation of Bergler's last work. He always has something scathing and interesting to say, except that one has the impression of a wild stream of unmastered notions.

I wanted to show you how the function of the signifier in permitting the subject's access to his relationship to death might be made more concrete than is possible through a connotation. That is why I have tried to have you recognize it in our recent meetings in an aesthetic form, namely, that of the beautiful – it being precisely the function of the beautiful to reveal to us the site of man's relationship to his own death, and to reveal it to us only in a blinding flash.

Since I asked Mr. Kaufmann to remind you last time of the terms according to which, right at the beginning of the period of man's relation to happiness that we are still living in, Kant thought it necessary to define the relation to the beautiful, I have subsequently heard the complaint that the thing wasn't made vivid enough for you by means of an example. Well, let me try to give you one.

Remember the four moments of the beautiful as they were articulated for you. I will try by means of a graduated process to illustrate that for you. For the first step I will draw on an element of my daily experience.

My experience is not that vast, and I have often said to myself that I haven't had sufficient taste for it – things don't always seem to me to be that much fun. Nevertheless, something always turns up to enable one to find an image for that path of the in-between where I am attempting to lead you.

Let us just say that, unlike Mr. Teste, if stupidity is not my strong point, I'm not particularly proud of the fact.[1]

I'm just going to tell you a little incident.

I was in London once in what they call a kind of "Home," where I was being welcomed as a guest of an institution which disseminates French culture. It was in one of those charming little areas of London at some distance from the center, toward the end of October when the weather is often delightful. I was the recipient of a form of hospitality that was marked by a kind of Victorian monasticism in a charming little building. The style of the establishment was marked by the delicious smell of toast and the menace of those inedible gelatine desserts that they are in the habit of consuming over there.

I wasn't alone but was with someone who has agreed to accompany me through life, one of whose characteristics is an extreme sense of uniqueness. In the morning this person, that is to say my wife, suddenly says out of the blue: "Professor D . . . is here." He is or was one of my mentors at the Ecole des Langues Orientales. It was very early in the morning. "How do you know?" I asked her, since I assure you Professor D . . . is not a close friend of mine. I was told: "I've seen his shoes."

I must say that I couldn't help feeling startled by that answer; I was also skeptical. To read the highly personal traits of an individuality into a pair of clodhoppers sitting outside a door didn't seem to me to be sufficiently convincing evidence, and there was nothing else that allowed me to believe that Professor D . . . might be in London. I found the thing quite funny and didn't attach any importance to it.

I made my way at that early hour along the corridors without thinking anything more about it. And it was then that to my astonishment I saw Professor D . . . in person slipping out of his bedroom in his dressing gown, exposing as he went a pair of long and highly academic drawers.

I find that experience highly instructive, and it is on that basis that I intend to suggest to you the notion of the beautiful.

Nothing less was required than an experience in which the universality belonging to the shoes of an academic was intimately joined to whatever it was that was absolutely specific to Professor D . . . , for me to invite you quite simply to think of Van Gogh's old shoes – on the basis of which Heidegger has given us a dazzling image of what a work of beauty is.

[1] The reference is to Paul Valéry's short work of fiction, Monsieur Teste.

You must imagine Professor D . . .'s clodhoppers ohne Begriff, with no thought of the academic, without any connection to his endearing personality, if you are to begin to see Van Gogh's own clodhoppers come alive with their own incommensurable quality of beauty.

They are simply there; they communicate a sign of understanding that is situated precisely at equal distance from the power of the imagination and that of the signifier. This signifier is not even a signifier of walking, of fatigue, or of anything else, such as passion or human warmth. It is just a signifier of that which is signified by a pair of abandoned clodhoppers, namely, both a presence and a pure absence – something that is, if one likes, inert, available to everyone, but something that seen from certain sides, in spite of its dumbness, speaks. It is an impression that appears as a function of the organic or, in a word, of waste, since it evokes the beginning of spontaneous generation.

That factor which magically transforms these clodhoppers into a kind of reverse side and analogue of two buds proves that it is not a question of imitation – something that has always taken in those who have written on the topic – but of the capture, by virtue of their situation in a certain temporal relationship, of that quality through which they are themselves the visible manifestation of beauty.

If you don't find this example convincing, find others. What I am, in effect, attempting to show here is that the beautiful has nothing to do with what is called ideal beauty. It is only on the basis of the apprehension of the beautiful at the very point of the transition between life and death that we can try to reinstate ideal beauty or, in other words, the function of that which sometimes reveals itself to us as the ideal form of beauty, and in the first place the famous human form.

If you read that work of Lessing's which is so rich in all kinds of insights, the Laocoon, you will find that he is absorbed from the beginning in the conception of the dignity of the object. Not that it is as the result of historical progress that the dignity of the object has finally been abandoned, thank God, since everything seems to indicate that it always was. Greek artists didn't restrict themselves to producing images of the gods; as we learn from Aristophanes's writings, paintings of onions cost a lot of money. It is thus not just with the Dutch painters that people began to realize that any object may be the signifier by means of which that reflection, mirage, or more or less unbearable brilliance we call the beautiful starts to vibrate.

But since I have just referred to the Dutch, take the example of the still life. You will find there moving in the opposite direction from that of the clodhoppers discussed above, as they began to bud, the same crossing of the line. As Claudel showed so admirably in his study of Dutch painting, it is to the extent that the still life both reveals and hides that within it which constitutes a threat, denouement, unfolding, or decomposition, that it manifests the beautiful for us as a function of a temporal relation.

Moreover, insofar as it engages the ideal, the question of the beautiful can only be found at this level as operating at the limit. Even in Kant's time it is the form of the human body that is presented to us as the limit of the possibilities of the beautiful, as ideal Erscheinen. It once was, though it no longer is, a divine form. It is the cloak of all possible fantasms of human desire. The flowers of desire are contained in this vase whose contours we attempt to define.

And it is this that leads me to posit the form of the body, and especially its image, as I have previously articulated it in the function of narcissism, as that which from a certain point of view represents the relationship of man to his second death, the signifier of his desire, his visible desire.

The central mirage is to be found in Ἵμερος ἐναργής, which both indicates the site of desire insofar as it is desire of nothing, the relationship of man to his lack of being, and prevents that site from being seen.

3

Here we can take the question even further. Is it the same shadow that is represented by the human body; is it this same image that constitutes a barrier to the Other-thing that lies beyond?

That which lies beyond is not simply the relationship to the second death or, in other words, to man to the extent that language demands of him that he realize the following, namely, that he is not. There is also the libido, that is to say, that which at fleeting moments carries us beyond the encounter that makes us forget it. And Freud was the first to articulate boldly and powerfully the idea that the only moment of jouissance that man knows occurs at the site where fantasms are produced, fantasms that represent for us the same barrier as far as access to jouissance is concerned, the barrier where everything is forgotten.

I should like to introduce here, as a parallel to the function of the beautiful, another function. I have named it on a number of occasions without emphasizing it particularly, but it seems to me essential to refer to it here. It is with your permission what I shall call Αἰδώς or, in other words, a sense of shame. The omission of this barrier, which prevents the direct experience of that which is to be found at the center of sexual union, seems to me to be at the origin of all kinds of questions that cannot be answered, including notably the matter of feminine sexuality, which is a subject that is on the agenda of our research activities – though I am not responsible for that.

The end of Antigone offers us the substitution of some bloody image of sacrifice that is realized in the mystical suicide. Clearly, beyond a certain point we do not know what goes on in Antigone's tomb. Everything points to the fact that what occurs there takes place as a crisis of μανία – Antigone attains the same level as that at which both Ajax and Hercules perish. I won't take up the question of Oedipus's end.

In this connection I have found no better a source than the Heraclitean aphorisms that we owe to the denunciatory references of Saint Clement of Alexandria – he found in them the sign of pagan abominations. I have retained a small fragment that says, εἰ μὴ γὰρ Διονύσωι Πομπὴν ἐποιοῦντο καὶ ὕμνεον αἰσμα, "clearly, if they did not organize processions and feasts to Dionysos accompanied by the singing of hymns" – and it is here that the ambiguity begins—αἰδοίοισιν ἀναιδέστατα Εἰργασίάν – what would they perform? the most disrespectful of homages to something shameful." That is in a sense one way of reading it. And, Heraclites goes on, Hades and Dionysos are the same thing to the extent that both of them μαίνονται, they enter a state of delirium and start to perform like hyenas. The reference is to bacchic processions that are linked to the appearance of all manner of forms of trance.

You should realize that Heraclites didn't at all like extreme religious ceremonies and had no sympathy for ecstacy – a lack of sympathy that is very different from that of a Christian or a rationalist. And he leads us up to the point where he says that if it weren't a reference to Hades or a ceremony of ecstacy, it would be nothing more than an odious phallic ceremony, an object of disgust.

Yet it isn't clear that one should rely on this translation. There is an obvious play on words between αἰδοίοσιν ἀναιδέστατα and Ἄιδης, which means invisible. Αἰδοῖα means the shameful parts, but it can also mean something respectable and venerable. The term song isn't missing. In the end, in singing their praises with great pomp to Dionysos, the members of his sect do not really know what they are doing. Aren't Hades and Dionysos one and the same thing?

It's a question that is also raised for us. Do the fantasm of the phallus and the beauty of the human image find their legitimate place at the same level? Or is there, on the contrary, an imperceptible distinction, an irreducible difference, between them? The whole Freudian enterprise has come up against that issue. At the end of one of his final papers, "Analysis Terminable and Interminable," Freud tells us that in the end the aspiration of the patient collapses into an ineradicable nostalgia for the fact that there is no way he can be the phallus, and that since he cannot be it, he can only have it in the condition of the Penisneid in a woman or of castration in a man.

That's something to remember whenever the analyst finds himself in the position of responding to anyone who asks him for happiness. The question of the Sovereign Good is one that man has asked himself since time immemorial, but the analyst knows that it is a question that is closed. Not only doesn't he have that Sovereign Good that is asked of him, but he also knows there isn't any. To have carried an analysis through to its end is no more nor less than to have encountered that limit in which the problematic of desire is raised.

That this problematic is central for access to any realization of oneself whatsoever constitutes the novelty of the analysis. There is no doubt that in the course of this process the subject will encounter much that is good for him, all the good he can do for himself, in fact, but let us not forget what we know so well because we say it everyday of our lives in the clearest of terms: he will only encounter that good if at every moment he eliminates from his wishes the false goods, if he exhausts not only the vanity of his demands, given that they are all no more than regressive demands, but also the vanity of his gifts.

Psychoanalysis makes the whole achievement of happiness turn on the genital act. It is, therefore, necessary to draw the proper consequences from this. It is doubtless possible to achieve for a single moment in this act something which enables one human being to be for another in the place that is both living and dead of the Thing. In this act and only at this moment, he may simulate with his flesh the consummation of what he is not under any circumstances. But even if the possibility of this consummation is polarizing and central, it cannot be considered timely.

What the subject achieves in analysis is not just that access, even if it is repeated and always available, but something else that through the transference gives everything living its form – the subject, so to speak, counts the vote relative to his own law. This law is in the first place always the acceptance of something that began to be articulated before him in previous generations, and which is strictly speaking Atè. Although this Atè does not always reach the tragic level of Antigone's Atè, it is nevertheless closely related to misfortune.

What the analyst has to give, unlike the partner in the act of love, is something that even the most beautiful bride in the world cannot outmatch, that is to say, what he has. And what he has is nothing other than his desire, like that of the analysand, with the difference that it is an experienced desire.

What can a desire of this kind, the desire of the analyst, be? We can say right away what it cannot be. It cannot desire the impossible.

I will give you an example of that in a compact definition, which an author managed to come up with before he disappeared, of a function that seemed to him to be essential in the dual relationship with the analyst, a relationship that exists to the extent that we respond to the demand of happiness, but that does not exhaust the analysis. This function, which is namely that of distance, is defined in the following terms: the gap between the way in which the subject expresses his instinctual "drives"[2] and the way in which he would be able to express them if the process of arranging and organizing them weren't available.

In the light of my teaching, the truly aberrant and contradictory character of such a formulation is apparent. If the instinct is the effect of the mark of the signifier on needs, their transformation as an effect of the signifier into something fragmented and panic-stricken that we call the drive, what can such a definition of distance mean?

In the same way, if the analyst's desire is an experienced desire, it is impossible for the analyst to agree to remain in the trap that is the desire to reduce such a distance to nothing. The function of the analyst would essentially be that of a "joiner" (un rappocher), as the same theoretician expresses it. The same fantasm is involved here, namely, that of the incorporation or ingestion of the phallic image to the extent that it is actualized in a relationship that is entirely governed by the imaginary. In that direction the subject can achieve nothing but some form of psychosis or perversion, however mild its character, for the term "joiner" that is placed by the author concerned at the center of the analytical dialectic does no more than reflect a desire of the analyst, whose nature the latter misperceives as a result of an inadequate theory of his position; it is the desire to draw closer to the point of being joined to the one who is in his charge.

One can only say of such an aspiration that it is pathetic in its naiveté. And one is only surprised that it could have been formulated other than as a dead-end to be dismissed.

That, then, is what I wanted to remind you of today, so as to indicate to you the direction taken by our research on the subject of the beautiful and, I would add, the sublime. We haven't yet extracted from the Kantian definitions of the sublime all the substance we might. The conjunction of this term with that of sublimation is probably not simply an accident nor simply homonymic.

We will take up the question of this satisfaction next time for our profit; the promise of analysis grants no other.

June 22, 1960

2. In English in text.

XXIII

The moral goals of psychoanalysis

THE BOURGEOIS DREAM
OEDIPUS, LEAR, AND THE SERVICE OF GOODS
THE INCORPORATION OF THE SUPEREGO
THE THREE FATHERS
UNRECONCILED OEDIPUS

At the point where I am about to bring to an end the risky topic that I chose to explore with you this year, I believe I cannot do enough to articulate the limit of the progress I wanted you to make.

I will spend next year outlining the ends and the means of analysis in relation to each other. Though that's not necessarily the title I will give the Seminar. It seems to me to be indispensable that we stop for a moment to consider something that remains obscure in what might be called the moral goals of psychoanalysis.

1

To promote in the practice of analysis a form of psychological normalization implies what might be called rationalizing moralization. Furthermore, to aim for the fulfillment of what is known as the genital stage, that is, a maturation of the drive and object, which would set the standard for a right relationship to reality, definitely embodies a certain moral implication.

Should the theoretical and practical purpose of our action be limited to the ideal of psychological harmonization? In the hope of allowing our patients to achieve the possibility of an untroubled happiness should we assume that the reduction of the antimony that Freud himself so powerfully articulated may be complete? I am referring to what he expresses in Civilization and Its Discontents when he affirms that the form in which the moral agency is concretely inscribed in man – and that is nothing less than rational according to him – the form he called the superego, operates according to an economy such that the more one sacrifices to it, the more it demands.

Are we entitled to forget that threat, that cleavage in the moral being of man, in the doctrine and practice of psychoanalysis? In truth, that is what happens; we are only too inclined to forget it, both in the promises that we believe we can make, and in those that we believe we can make to ourselves in the matter of a given outcome of our therapy. It's serious, and it's even more serious when we are in a position to give to an analysis its full significance; I mean when we are faced by the conceivable end of an analysis in its training function in the fullest sense of the term.

If we are to consider an analysis completed for someone who is subsequently to find himself in a responsible position relative to an analysis, in the sense that he becomes an analyst himself, should it ideally or by right end with the position of comfort that I categorized just now as a moralizing rationalization of the kind in which it often tends to express itself?

When in conformity with Freudian experience one has articulated the dialectic of demand, need and desire, is it fitting to reduce the success of an analysis to a situation of individual comfort linked to that well-founded and legitimate function we might call the service of goods? Private goods, family goods, domestic goods, other goods that solicit us, the goods of our trade or our profession, the goods of the city, etc.

Can we, in fact, close off that city so easily nowadays? It doesn't matter. However we regulate the situation of those who have recourse to us in our society, it is only too obvious that their aspiration to happiness will always imply a place where miracles happen, a promise, a mirage of original genius or an opening up of freedom, or if we caricature it, the possession of all women for a man and of an ideal man for a woman. To make oneself the guarantor of the possibility that a subject will in some way be able to find happiness even in analysis is a form of fraud.

There's absolutely no reason why we should make ourselves the guarantors of the bourgeois dream. A little more rigor and firmness are required in our confrontation with the human condition. That is why I reminded you last time that the service of goods or the shift of the demand for happiness onto the political stage has its consequences. The movement that the world we live in is caught up in, of wanting to establish the universal spread of the service of goods as far as conceivably possible, implies an amputation, sacrifices, indeed a kind of puritanism in the relationship to desire that has occurred historically. The establishment of the service of goods at a universal level does not in itself resolve the problem of the present relationship of each individual man to his desire in the short period of time between his birth and his death. The happiness of future generations is not at issue here.

As I believe I have shown here in the sphere I have outlined for you this year, the function of desire must remain in a fundamental relationship to death. The question I ask is this: shouldn't the true termination of an analysis – and by that I mean the kind that prepares you to become an analyst – in the end confront the one who undergoes it with the reality of the human condition? It is precisely this, that in connection with anguish, Freud designated as the level at which its signal is produced, namely, Hilflosigkeit or distress, the state in which man is in that relationship to himself which is his own death – in the sense I have taught you to isolate it this year – and can expect help from no one.

At the end of a training analysis the subject should reach and should know the domain and the level of the experience of absolute disarray. It is a level at which anguish is already a protection, not so much Abwarten as Erwartung. Anguish develops by letting a danger appear, whereas there is no danger at the level of the final experience of Hilflosigkeit.

I have already told you how the limit of this region is expressed for man; it touches the end of what he is and what he is not. That is why the myth of Oedipus acquires its full significance here.

2

Today I will once again bring you back to the passage through that intermediary region, and I remind you that in the Oedipus story one must not overlook the time that passes between the moment when Oedipus is blinded and the moment when he dies. And it is, moreover, a special, unique death that, as I have already said, constitutes a genuine enigma in Sophocles.

One shouldn't forget that in a sense Oedipus did not suffer from the Oedipus complex, and he punished himself for a sin he did not commit. He simply killed a man whom he didn't know was his father, a man whom, according to the realistically motivated form in which the myth is presented, he met on the road along which he was fleeing because he had got wind of something quite unpleasant concerning him with relation to his father. He flees those whom he thinks are his parents, and commits a crime in trying to avoid it.

He doesn't know that in achieving happiness, both conjugal happiness and that of his job as king, of being the guide to the happiness of the state, he is sleeping with his mother. One might therefore ask what the treatment he inflicts on himself means. Which treatment? He gives up the very thing that captivated him. In fact, he has been duped, tricked by reason of the fact that he achieved happiness. Beyond the sphere of the service of goods and in spite of the complete success of this service, he enters into the zone in which he pursues his desire.

Note carefully the dispositions he makes; at the moment of death, he remains unmoved. The irony of the French expression for hale and hearty, bon pied bon oeil,[1] should not mean too much in his case, since the man whose feet are swollen has also lost the sight of his eyes. But that doesn't prevent him from demanding everything or, in other words, all the honors due his rank. The memory of the legend allows us to perceive something that is emphasized by modern ethnography, because after the sacrifice he was sent the victim's thigh instead of its shoulder – it might be the other way round – and he sees in this lapse an intolerable insult and breaks with his sons to whom he had handed over power. Then in the end his curse on his sons bursts forth, and it is absolute.

[1] It means literally "good foot good eye."

It is important to explore what is contained in that moment when, although he has renounced the service of goods, nothing of the preeminence of his dignity in relation to these same goods is ever abandoned; it is the same moment when in his tragic liberty he has to deal with the consequence of that desire that led him to go beyond the limit, namely, the desire to know. He has learned and still wants to learn something more.

In order to make myself understood, I should perhaps evoke another tragic figure, one who is no doubt closer to us – King Lear.

I cannot give a detailed analysis of the significance of the play here. I just wanted to make you understand what Oedipus's crossing over means on the basis of King Lear, where we find that crossing over in a derisory form.

King Lear, too, gives up the service of goods, gives up his royal duties; the old fool believes he is lovable and, therefore, hands over the service of goods to his daughters. But you must not assume that he gives up anything. It's supposed to be the beginning of freedom, a life of festivities with his fifty knights, lots of fun, during which time he stays in turn with each of those two shrews whom he thought he could entrust with the duties of power.

In the meantime, there he is with no other warrant than that of loyalty, of an agreement founded on honor, since he conceded the power he had of his own free will. Shakespeare's formidable irony mobilizes a whole swarm of destinies that devour each other, for it isn't just Lear but all the good people in the play whom we see condemned to suffering without remission for having trusted to simple loyalty and to agreements founded on honor. I don't have to emphasize the fact; just read the play again.

Lear as well as Oedipus shows us that he who enters that space, whether it be by the derisory path of Lear or the tragic one of Oedipus, finds himself alone and betrayed.

Oedipus's last word is, as you know, that phrase μὴ φύναι which I have repeated here any number of times, since it embodies a whole exegesis on negation. I indicated to you how the French language raises it in that little pleonastic "ne" which no one knows what to do with, since it dangles there in an expression such as "je crains qu'il ne vienne" ("I'm afraid he is coming"), which would be just as pleased if it weren't there like a particle oscillating between a coming and fear of it.[2] It has no raison d'être except for that of the subject itself. In French it is the remains of that which means μὴ in Greek, a word that does not signify a negation. I could show it to you in any text.

[2] See note 2 on p. 64 on the pleonastic "ne."

Other texts give expression to it, such as Antigone, for example, in the passage where the guard, in speaking about the person whom he does not yet know to be Antigone, says: "He left without leaving a trace." And the guard adds in the lesson chosen by the editor: "ἔφευγε μὴ εἰδέναι." In principle that means he avoided its being known that it was him – τό μὴ εἰδέναι – as a variant suggests. But if one took the first version with its two negations literally, one would have to say he avoided its not being known that it was him. The μὴ is there to indicate the Spaltung between the enunciation and the enunciated that I have already explained. Μή φύναι means "rather not to be."

That's the choice with which a human existence such as Oedipus's has to end. It ends so perfectly that he doesn't die like everybody else, that is to say accidentally; he dies from a true death in which he erases his own being. The malediction is freely accepted on the basis of the true subsistence of a human being, the subsistence of the subtraction of himself from the order of the world. It's a beautiful attitude, and as the madrigal says, it's twice as beautiful on account of its beauty.

Oedipus shows us where the inner limit zone in the relationship to desire ends. In every human experience that zone is always relegated to a point beyond death, since the ordinary human being conducts himself in the light of what needs to be done so as not to risk the other death, the death that simply involves kicking the bucket. Primum vivere – questions relating to being are always postponed to later, which does not, of course, mean that they aren't there on the horizon.

Here then are the topological notions without which it is our experience that it is impossible to find one's way or to say anything that is not simply confusing and a going round in circles – and that's true of even the most eminent of authors. Take, for example, the article by Jones that is remarkable in all kinds of ways, "Hatred, Culpability and Fear," in which he shows the circularity of these terms, though it's not an absolute one. I beg you to study it pen in hand, for we will be dealing with it next year. You will see how many things would be illuminated if the principles we are articulating were applied.

Let us take up those principles again in connection with the common man who concerns us here; let us try to see what they imply. Jones, for example, has perhaps expressed better than others the moral alibi that he called moralisches Entgegenkommen, that is, a kind of consent to the moral demand. In effect, he shows that very often there is nothing more in the duties man imposes on himself than the fear of the risks involved in failing to impose those duties. One should call things by their name, and it's not because one hangs up a triple analytical veil that it doesn't mean what it says: psychoanalysis teaches that in the end it is easier to accept interdiction than to run the risk of castration.

Let's try to practice a little brain-washing on ourselves. Before going into the question further, which is often a way of avoiding it, what does it mean to say, as Freud does, that the superego appears at the moment of the decline of the Oedipus complex? Of course, we have in the meantime made a little progress by demonstrating that one was born before, in reaction to sadistic drives, according to Melanie Klein, although no one has been able to prove that the same superego is involved. But let's limit ourselves to the Oedipal superego. The fact that it is born at the moment of the decline of the Oedipus complex means that the subject incorporates its authority into himself.

That ought to put you on the right track. In a famous article called "Mourning and Melancholia," Freud also says that the work of mourning is applied to an incorporated object, to an object which for one reason or another one is not particularly fond of. As far as the loved object that we make such a fuss about in our mourning is concerned, we do not, in fact, simply sing its praises, if only because of the lousy trick it played on us by leaving us. Thus, if we are sufficiently cruel to ourselves to incorporate the father, it is perhaps because we have a lot to reproach this father with.

It is here that the distinctions I presented to you last year may prove useful. Castration, frustration, and privation are not the same thing. If frustration properly belongs to the symbolic mother, he who is responsible for castration, according to Freud, is the real father, and as far as privation is concerned, it's the imaginary father. Let us try to understand the function of each of these elements at the moment of decline of the Oedipus complex and of the formation of the superego. Perhaps that will shed a little light, and we won't have the impression of reading two different lines at the same time when we take account of the castrating father, on the one hand, and the father as origin of the superego, on the other. This distinction is basic to everything Freud articulated, and in particular to the question of castration once he began to spell it out – the phenomenon is indeed a stupefying one since it is a notion that had never even been broached before him.

The real father, Freud tells us, is a castrating father. In what way? Through his presence as real father who effectively occupies that person with whom the child is in a state of rivalry, namely, the mother. Whether or not that is the case in experience, in theory there is no doubt about it: the real father is elevated to the rank of Great Fucker – though not, believe me, in the face of the Eternal, which isn't even around to count the number of times. Yet doesn't this real and mythical father fade at the moment of the decline of the Oedipus complex into the one whom the child may easily have already discovered at the relatively advanced age of five years old, namely, the imaginary father, the father who has fucked the kid up.

Isn't that what the theoreticians of analytical experience say as they mumble away? And doesn't one find the point of difference there? Isn't it in connection with the experience of privation the small child undergoes – not because he is small but because he is human – in connection with what the child experiences as privation, that the mourning for the imaginary father is forged? – that is a mourning for someone who would really be someone. The perpetual reproach that is born at that moment, in a way that is more or less definitive and well-formed depending on the individual case, remains fundamental in the structure of the subject. It is this imaginary father and not the real one which is the basis of the providential image of God. And the function of the superego in the end, from its final point of view, is hatred for God, the reproach that God has handled things so badly.

I believe that that is the true structure of the articulation of the Oedipus complex. If you break it down in that way, you will find that the detours, hesitations, and gropings of different authors in their attempts to explain various difficulties and details will be much clearer. In particular, you will also be able to see, in a way that is otherwise impossible, what Jones really means when he speaks of the relationship between hate, fear, and guilt in connection with the genesis of the superego.

3

To pick up the thread, let us say, would to God that the drama took place at the bloody level of castration and that the poor little man flooded the whole world with his blood like Kronos Uranus!

Everyone knows that castration is there on the horizon and that it never, of course, occurs. What does happen relates to the fact that the little man is rather a paltry support for that organ, for that signifier, and that he seems rather to be deprived of it. And here one can see that his fate is common to that of the little girl, who also can be explained much more clearly from this angle of vision.

What is in question is the moment when the subject quite simply perceives that his father is an idiot or a thief, as the case may be, or quite simply a weakling or, routinely, an old fogey, as in Freud's case. He was if you like an agreeable and kind old fogey, but he must, like all fathers, have communicated in spite of himself the series of shocks we call the contradictions of capitalism; he left Freiberg where there was nothing to do anymore in order to move to Vienna, and it is the kind of thing that doesn't go unnoticed in the mind of a child, even if he is only three years old. And it was because Freud loved his father that he felt obliged to restore his stature to the point of attributing to him the gigantic proportions of the father of the primitive horde.

But that's not what resolves the fundamental questions; that's not the essential question, as the story of Oedipus tells us. If Oedipus is a whole man, if Oedipus doesn't have an Oedipus complex, it is because in his case there is no father at all. The person who served as father was his adoptive father. And, my good friends, that's the case with all of us, because as the Latin has it, pater is est quem justae nuptiae demonstrant, that is to say, the father is he who acknowledges us. We are at bottom in the same boat as Oedipus, even if we don't know it. As far as the father that Oedipus knew is concerned, he only becomes the father, as Freud's myth indicates, once he is dead.

It is thus there, as I've said a hundred times, that one finds the paternal function. In our theory the sole function of the father is to be a myth, to be always only the Name-of-the-Father, or in other words nothing more than the dead father, as Freud explains in Totem and Taboo. But for this to be developed fully, of course, the human adventure has to be carried through to its end, if only in outline; that zone Oedipus enters after having scratched out his eyes has to be explored.

It is always through some beneficial crossing of the limit that man experiences his desire. Others have expressed the idea before me. The whole meaning Jones discovers in connection with aphanisis is related to this; it is linked to the important risk, which is quite simply the loss of desire. Oedipus's desire is the desire to know the last word on desire.

When I tell you that the desire of man is the desire of the Other, I am reminded of something in a poem by Paul Eluard that says "the difficult desire to endure" (le dur désir de durer). That is nothing more than the desire to desire.

For the ordinary man, given that Oedipus's mourning is at the origin of the superego, the double limit – from the real death risked to the preferred or the assumed death, to the being-for-death – only appears as veiled. It is a veil that Jones calls hate. You can grasp in this the reason why any alert author locates the final term of the psychic reality we deal with in the ambivalence between love and hate.

The external limit that keeps man in the service of the good is the primum vivere. It is fear, we are told, but you can see how superficial its influence is.

Between the two for the ordinary man lies the exercise of his guilt, which is a reflection of his hatred for the creator, whoever he may be – for man is creationist – who made him such a weak and inadequate creature.

All this nonsense is meaningless for the hero, for the one who has entered that zone, for Oedipus who goes as far as the μὴφῦναι of true being-for-death, goes as far as a malediction he acquiesces in or an engagement with annihilation that is taken to be the realization of his wish. There is nothing else here except the true and indivisible disappearance that is his. Entry into that zone for him is constituted of a renunciation of goods and of power that is supposed to be a punishment, but is not, in fact, one. If he tears himself free from the world through the act of blinding himself, it is because only he who escapes from appearances can achieve truth. This was known in antiquity; the great Homer was blind and so was Tiresias.

For Oedipus the absolute reign of his desire is played out between the two, something that is sufficiently brought out by the fact that he is shown to be unyielding right to the end, demanding everything, giving up nothing, absolutely unreconciled.

I showed you the reverse and derisory side of this topology, which is the topology of tragedy, in connection with poor Lear, who doesn't understand a thing and who makes the ocean and the earth echo because he tried to enter the same region in a salutary way with everyone agreeing. He appears in the end as still not having understood a thing and holding dead in his arms the object of his love, who is, of course, misrecognized by him.

Thus defined, that region enables us to posit the limits that illuminate a certain number of problems that are raised by our theory and our experience. We have never stopped repeating that the interiorization of the Law has nothing to do with the Law. Although we still need to know why. It is possible that the superego serves as a support for the moral conscience, but everyone knows that it has nothing to do with the moral conscience as far as its most obligatory demands are concerned. What the superego demands has nothing to do with that which we would be right in making the universal rule of our actions; such is the ABC of psychoanalytic truth. But it is not enough to affirm the fact; it must be justified.

I believe that the schema I have proposed to you is capable of doing that, and that if you stick with it you will find a way of not getting lost in that labyrinth.

Next time, I will start out on the path that all this has been leading to – a more precise grasp of catharsis and of the consequences of man's relationship to desire.

June 29, 1960

XXIV

The paradoxes of ethics or Have you acted in conformity with your desire?

THE COMIC DIMENSION
THE FABLE OF THE CASH REGISTER DESIRE AND GUILT GIVING GROUND RELATIVE TO ONE'S DESIRE RELIGION, SCIENCE AND DESIRE

We come now to our final talk.

By way of conclusion I propose to make a certain number of comments, some of which are conclusive and others experiential or suggestive. You will not be surprised, for we haven't brought our discussion to a close, and it's not easy to find a medium when one has to conclude on a subject that is by its very nature excentric. Let's say that today I am proposing "a mixed grill."[1]

1

Since one should always start up again with a definition, let's say that an ethics essentially consists in a judgment of our action, with the proviso that it is only significant if the action implied by it also contains within it, or is supposed to contain, a judgment, even if it is only implicit. The presence of judgment on both sides is essential to the structure.

If there is an ethics of psychoanalysis – the question is an open one – it is to the extent that analysis in some way or other, no matter how minimally, offers something that is presented as a measure of our action – or it at least claims to. At first sight the idea may occur to someone that it offers a return to our instincts as the measure of our action. Such seems to belong to a time long past, but there are perhaps those here and there whom that prospect frightens. I have even had someone raising objections of that kind to me in a philosophical society, objections that I thought had disappeared over forty years ago. But it is true to say that by now everyone has been sufficiently reassured on that topic; nobody seems to fear a moral cleansing of that kind as the result of an analysis.

[1] In English in the original.

I have often shown you that in, so to speak, constructing the instincts, in making them the natural law of the realization of harmony, psychoanalysis takes on the guise of a rather disturbing alibi, of a moralizing hustle or a bluff, whose dangers cannot be exaggerated. That's a commonplace as far as you are concerned, and I won't pursue it.

To limit ourselves to something that can be said right off, that everyone has known for a long time now, and that is one of the most modest features of our practice, let us say that analysis progresses by means of a return to the meaning of an action. That alone justifies the fact that we are interested in the moral dimension. Freud's hypothesis relative to the unconscious presupposes that, whether it be healthy or sick, normal or morbid, human action has a hidden meaning that one can have access to. In such a context the notion of a catharsis that is a purification, a decantation or isolation of levels, is immediately conceivable.

That hardly seems to me to qualify as a discovery; rather, it is the minimal position that is fortunately not too obscured in the common notion of psychoanalysis: in what goes on at the level of lived experience there is a deeper meaning that guides that experience, and one can have access to it. Moreover, things cannot be the same when the two layers are separated.

That doesn't take us very far. It is the embryonic form of a very old γνῶθι σεαυτόν, though it obviously has its own particular emphasis, which is related to an excessively general form of all that goes under the name of inner progess. But it is already enough to situate the sharp difference I have emphasized this year that is introduced, if not by analytical experience, then at least by Freudian thought.

What does this difference consist of? It may be measured in the response given to the question that ordinary people ask themselves, a question that we answer more or less directly. The question is, once it is over, once the return to the meaning of an action has been accomplished, once the deep meaning has been liberated – that is to say, separated out through a catharsis in the sense of decantation – will everything work out all right by itself? Or, to be precise, will there be nothing but goodness?

That takes us back to a very old question. A certain Mencius, as he was called by the Jesuits, tells us that it can be judged in the following way. In the beginning, goodness was natural to man; it was like a mountain covered with trees. Only the inhabitants of the surrounding area started to cut the trees down. The blessing of the night was that it gave rise to a fresh growth of suckers, but in the morning the herds returned to eat them and in the end the mountain was denuded, so that nothing grew on it.

You see that the problem is not a new one, then. The goodness in question is so far from being confirmed in our experience that we start out from what is modestly called the negative therapeutic reaction, something that at the more remarkable level of literary generality I last time called a malediction assumed or agreed to in the μή φύναι of Oedipus. Not that the problem doesn't remain whole; that is decided beyond the return to sense.

I asked you this year to enter into a mental experiment, an experimentum mentis as Galileo called it – contrary to what you may think he was much better acquainted with mental experiments than with those of the laboratory, and without it in any case he would certainly not have taken the decisive step. The experimentum mentis that I have been proposing to you throughout the year is directly connected to something that our experience points to whenever we try to articulate it in its own topology, in its own structure, instead of reducing it to a common denominator or common standard, instead of making it fit into preexisting pigeon-holes. The experiment consisted in adopting what I called the point of view of the Last Judgment. And I mean by that choosing as the standard of that reconsideration of ethics to which psychoanalysis leads us, the relationship between action and the desire that inhabits it.

To make you understand this relationship, I had recourse to tragedy, that is to a reference one cannot avoid, as is proved by the fact that Freud was obliged to make use of it from the beginning. The ethics of psychoanalysis has nothing to do with speculation about prescriptions for, or the regulation of, what I have called the service of goods. Properly speaking, that ethics implies the dimension that is expressed in what we call the tragic sense of life.

Actions are inscribed in the space of tragedy, and it is with relation to this space, too, that we are led to take our bearings in the sphere of values. Moreover, this is also true of the space of comedy, and when I started to talk to you about the formations of the unconscious, it was, as you know, the comic that I had in mind.

Let us say by way of a preliminary sounding that the relationship between action and the desire which inhabits it in the space of tragedy functions in the direction of a triumph of death. And I taught you to rectify the notion as a triumph of being-for-death that is formulated in Oedipus's μή φὺναι, a phrase in which one finds that μή, the negation that is identical to the entrance of the subject supported by the signifier. There lies the fundamental character of all tragic action.

A preliminary sounding of the space of comedy shows it is less a question of a triumph than of a futile or derisory play of vision. However little time I have thus far devoted to the comic here, you have been able to see that there, too, it is a question of the relationship between action and desire, and of the former's fundamental failure to catch up with the latter.

The sphere of comedy is created by the presence at its center of a hidden signifier, but that in the Old Comedy is there in person, namely, the phallus. Who cares if it is subsequently whisked away? One must simply remember that the element in comedy that satisfies us, the element that makes us laugh, that makes us appreciate it in its full human dimension, not excluding the unconscious, is not so much the triumph of life as its flight, the fact that life slips away, runs off, escapes all those barriers that oppose it, including precisely those that are the most essential, those that are constituted by the agency of the signifier.

The phallus is nothing more than a signifier, the signifier of this flight. Life goes by, life triumphs, whatever happens. If the comic hero trips up and lands in the soup, the little fellow nevertheless survives.

The pathetic side of this dimension is, you see, exactly the opposite, the counterpart of tragedy. They are not incompatible, since tragi-comedy exists. That is where the experience of human action resides. And it is because we know better than those who went before how to recognize the nature of desire, which is at the heart of this experience, that a reconsideration of ethics is possible, that a form of ethical judgment is possible, of a kind that gives this question the force of a Last Judgment: Have you acted in conformity with the desire that is in you?

This is not an easy question to sustain. I, in fact, claim that it has never been posed with that purity elsewhere, and that it can only be posed in the analytical context.

Opposed to this pole of desire is traditional ethics – not completely, of course, for nothing is new, or everything is new, in human thought. That's something I wanted to make you feel by choosing the example of the antithesis of the tragic hero in a tragedy, an antithesis who nevertheless embodies a certain heroic quality, and that is Creon. With reference to this example, I spoke to you of the service of goods that is the position of traditional ethics. The cleaning up of desire, modesty, temperateness, that is to say, the middle path we see articulated so remarkably in Aristotle; we need to know what it takes the measure of and whether its measure is founded on something.

An attentive examination shows that its measure is always marked with a deep ambiguity. In the end the order of things on which it claims to be founded is the order of power, of a human – far too human – power. We are not the ones to say so, but it is obvious that it can hardly take two steps in expressing itself without sketching in the ramparts that surround the place where, as far as we are concerned, the signifiers are unleashed or where, for Aristotle, the arbitrary rule of the gods holds sway – insofar as at this level gods and beasts join together to signify the world of the unthinkable.

The gods? We don't mean by that the prime mover, but mythological gods. We, of course, know how to contain the unleashing of the signifiers, but it is not because we have staked almost everything on the No/Name-of-the-Father that the question is simplified. If you go and take a close look at it – and it's worth the trouble – you will see that Aristotle's morality is wholly founded on an order that is no doubt a tidied-up, ideal order. But it is nevertheless one that corresponds to the politics of his time, to the organization of the city. His morality is the morality of the master, created for the virtues of the master and linked to the order of powers. One shouldn't be contemptuous of the order of powers – these are not the comments of an anarchist – one simply needs to know their limit with relation to our field of inquiry.

As far as that which is of interest to us, namely, that which has to do with desire, to its array and disarray, so to speak, the position of power of any kind in all circumstances and in every case, whether historical or not, has always been the same.

What is Alexander's proclamation when he arrived in Persepolis or Hitler's when he arrived in Paris? The preamble isn't important: "I have come to liberate you from this or that." The essential point is "Carry on working. Work must go on." Which, of course, means: "Let it be clear to everyone that this is on no account the moment to express the least surge of desire."

The morality of power, of the service of goods, is as follows: "As far as desires are concerned, come back later. Make them wait."

2

It is worth recalling here the line of demarcation with reference to which the question of ethics is raised for us. It is also a line that marks an essential end in the development of philosophy.

Kant is the person I have in mind because he renders us the greatest service by introducing the topological milestone that distinguishes the moral phenomenon. And by that I mean the field that is of interest to moral judgment as such. It is a limited categorical opposition no doubt, purely ideal, but it was essential that someone someday articulate it by purifying it – catharsis – of all interest, which does not mean of the interests linked to mental pathology, to the pathologisches, but simply to sensible, vital human interests. For it to be valorized as the properly ethical field, none of our interests must be in any way involved.

A decisive step is taken there. Traditional morality concerned itself with what one was supposed to do "insofar as it is possible," as we say, and as we are forced to say. What needs to be unmasked here is the point on which that morality turns. And that is nothing less than the impossibility in which we recognize the topology of our desire. The breakthrough is achieved by Kant when he posits that the moral imperative is not concerned with what may or may not be done. To the extent that it imposes the necessity of a practical reason, obligation affirms an unconditional "Thou shalt." The importance of this field derives from the void that the strict application of the Kantian definition leaves there.

Now we analysts are able to recognize that place as the place occupied by desire. Our experience gives rise to a reversal that locates in the center an incommensurable measure, an infinite measure, that is called desire. I showed you how one can easily substitute for Kant's "Thou shalt" the Sadean fantasm of jouissance elevated to the level of an imperative – it is, of course, a pure and almost derisory fantasm, but it doesn't exclude the possibility of its being elevated to a universal law.

Let us stop here and look at the prospects on the horizon. If Kant had only designated this crucial point for us, everything would be fine, but one also sees that which the horizon of practical reason opens onto: to the respect and the admiration that the starry heavens above and the moral law within inspires in him. One may wonder why. Respect and admiration suggest a personal relationship. That is where everything subsists in Kant, though in a demystified form. And that is where my comments on the basis furnished by analytical experience relative to the dimension of the subject in the signifier are essential. Let me illustrate this briefly.

Kant claims to find a new proof of the immortality of the soul in the fact that nothing on earth satisfies the demands of moral action. It is because the soul remains hungry for something more that it needs an afterlife, so that the unrealized harmony may be achieved somewhere or other.

What does that mean? That respect and that admiration for the starry skies had already grown fragile at that moment in history. Did they still exist in Kant's time? As far as we are concerned, when we look at the vast universe, doesn't it seem to us that we are in the middle of a huge construction site surrounded by various nebulae with one funny little corner, the one we live in, that has always been compared to a watch that someone forgot? Apart from that, it is easy to see if there is no one there, if, that is, we give a meaning to what might be construed as a presence. And there is no other articulatable meaning to give this divine presence except that which functions for us as a criterion of the subject, namely, the dimension of the signifier.

The philosophers can speculate all they want on the Being in whom act and knowledge are one, the religious tradition is not misled: only that which can be articulated by means of a revelation has the right to be recognized as one or more divine persons. As for us, only one thing could convince us that the heavens are inhabited by a transcendent person and that is a signal. What signal? Not the one that defines the theory of communication, which spends its time telling us that one can interpret the warning rays that traverse space in terms of signs. Distance creates mirages. Because these things come from far off, people believe that they are messages we are receiving from stars three hundred light-years away. But they are no more messages than when we look in a bottle. It would only be a message if some explosion of a star at these immense distances corresponded to something that was written down somewhere in the Great Book – in other words, something that would make a reality of what was happening.

Some of you recently saw a film that didn't exactly excite me, but since then I have revised my impression, for there are some interesting details. It's Jules Dassin's film, Never on Sunday. The character who is presented to us as marvelously at one with the immediacy of his supposedly primitive feelings, in a small bar in Piraeus, starts to beat up those who are sitting around because they haven't been speaking properly, that is to say in conformity with moral norms. On other occasions, in order to express his immense excitement and his happiness, he picks up a glass and shatters it on the ground. And every time a glass is shattered, we see the cash register vibrate frenetically. I see that as a beautiful touch, a stroke of genius. That cash register defines very clearly the structure that concerns us.

The reason why there is human desire, that the field can exist, depends on the assumption that everything real that happens may be accounted for somewhere. Kant managed to reduce the essence of the moral field to something pure; nevertheless, there remains at its center the need for a space where accounts are kept. It is this that is signified by the horizon represented by his immortality of the soul. As if we hadn't been plagued enough by desire on earth, part of eternity is to be given over to keeping accounts. In these fantasms one finds projected nothing but the structural relationship that I attempted to indicate on the graph with the line of the signifier. It is insofar as the subject is situated and is constituted with relation to the signifier that the break, splitting or ambivalence is produced in him at the point where the tension of desire is located.

The film I just referred to, in which I learned afterwards the director, Dassin, plays the role of the American, presents us with a nice and curious model of something that can be expressed as follows from a structural point of view. The character who plays the satirical role, the role that is offered for our derision, namely, Dassin as the American, finds himself to be as the producer and creator of the film in a position that is more American than those whom he makes fun of, that is, the Americans.

Don't misunderstand me. He is there in order to undertake the reeducation of a good-hearted whore. And the irony of the screenwriter is to be found in the fact that in carrying out this pious mission he is in the pay of the one whom we might call the Grand Master of the brothel. The deeper meaning is signaled to us by the placing before our eyes of an enormous pair of black glasses – he is someone whose face is for good reason never shown. Naturally, when the whore learns that it is the character who is her sworn enemy who is paying the piper, she eviscerates the beautiful soul of the American in question, and he who has conceived such great hopes is made to look very foolish.

If there is a dimension of social criticism in this symbolism – that it to say that what one finds hidden behind the brothel are the forces of order, so to speak – it is somewhat naive to make us hope at the end of the screenplay that all that is needed to solve the problem of the relations between virtue and desire is to close down the brothel. There runs constantly throughout the film that old fin de siècle ambiguity, which involves identifying classical antiquity with the sphere of liberated desire. It is not to have gone beyond Pierre Louÿs to believe that it is somewhere outside her own situation that the good Athenian prostitute can focus all the light of the mirages she is at the center of. In a word, Dassin didn't have to confuse what flows from the sight of this attractive figure with a return to Aristotelian morality, which he fortunately doesn't spell out in detail.

Let's get back on track. This shows us that on the far edge of guilt, insofar as it occupies the field of desire, there are the bonds of a permanent book-keeping, and this is so independently of any particular articulation that may be given of it.

Part of the world has resolutely turned in the direction of the service of goods, thereby rejecting everything that has to do with the relationship of man to desire – it is what is known as the postrevolutionary perspective. The only thing to be said is that people don't seem to have realized that, by formulating things in this way, one is simply perpetuating the eternal tradition of power, namely, "Let's keep on working, and as far as desire is concerned, come back later." But what does it matter? In this tradition the communist future is only different from Creon's, from that of the city, in assuming – and it's not negligible – that the sphere of goods to which we must all devote ourselves may at some point embrace the whole universe.

In other words, this operation is only justified insofar as the universal State is on the horizon. Yet nothing indicates that even at that limit the problem will disappear, since it will persist in the consciousness of those who live with that view of things. Either they imply that the properly statest values of the State will disappear, that is organization and policing, or they introduce a term such as the universal concrete State, which means no more than supposing things will change on a molecular level, at the level of the relationship that constitutes the position of man in the face of various goods, to the extent that up till now his desire was not there.

Whatever happens to that point of view, nothing is structurally changed. The sign of this is, first, that, although the divine presence of an orthodox kind is absent, the keeping of accounts certainly is not and, second, that for the inexhaustible dimension that necessitates the immortality of the soul for Kant, there is substituted the notion of objective guilt, which is precisely articulated as such. From a structural point of view in any case, nothing is resolved.

I think I have now sufficiently outlined the opposition between the desiring center and the service of goods. We can now come to the heart of the matter.

3

It is in an experimental form that I advance the following propositions here. Let's formulate them as paradoxes. Let's see what they sound like to analysts' ears.

I propose then that, from an analytical point of view, the only thing of which one can be guilty is of having given ground relative to one's desire.

Whether it is admissible or not in a given ethics, that proposition expresses quite well something that we observe in our experience. In the last analysis, what a subject really feels guilty about when he manifests guilt at bottom always has to do with – whether or not it is admissible for a director of conscience – the extent to which he has given ground relative to his desire.

Let's take this further. He has often given ground relative to his desire for a good motive or even for the best of motives. And this shouldn't astonish us. For guilt has existed for a very long time, and it was noticed long ago that the question of a good motive, of a good intention, although it constitutes certain zones of historical experience and was at the forefront of discussions of moral theology in, say, the time of Abelard, hasn't enlightened people very much. The question that keeps reappearing in the distance is always the same. And that is why Christians in their most routine observances are never at peace. For if one has to do things for the good, in practice one is always faced with the question: for the good of whom? From that point on, things are no longer obvious.

Doing things in the name of the good, and even more in the name of the good of the other, is something that is far from protecting us not only from guilt but also from all kinds of inner catastrophes. To be precise, it doesn't protect us from neurosis and its consequences. If analysis has a meaning, desire is nothing other than that which supports an unconscious theme, the very articulation of that which roots us in a particular destiny, and that destiny demands insistently that the debt be paid, and desire keeps coming back, keeps returning, and situates us once again in a given track, the track of something that is specifically our business.

Last time I opposed the hero to the ordinary man, and someone was upset by that. I do not distinguish between them as if they were two different human species. In each of us the path of the hero is traced, and it is precisely as an ordinary man that one follows it to the end.

The fields that I sketched out last time – the inner circle to which I gave the name being-for-death, in the midst of desires, renouncing entry into the external circle – are not in opposition to the triple field of hatred, guilt and fear as the ordinary man is in opposition to the hero. That's not the point at all. That general form is definitely traced by the structure in and for the ordinary man. And it is precisely to the extent that the hero guides himself correctly there that he experiences all the passions in which the ordinary man is entangled, except that in his case they are pure and he succeeds in supporting himself there fully.

Someone among you has baptized the topology that I have sketched out for you this year with the apt and somewhat humorous phrase, the zone between-two-deaths. Your vacation will give you the time to consider whether its rigor seems to you to be especially effective. I ask you to think it over.

In Sophocles you will encounter again the dance between Creon and Antigone. It is obvious that to the extent that his presence in the zone indicates that something is defined and liberated, the hero bears his partner into that zone along with him. At the end of Antigone Creon henceforth speaks loudly and clearly of himself as someone who is dead among the living, and this is because he has literally lost all other goods as a result of the affair. As a consequence of the tragic act, the hero frees his adversary too.

There is no reason to limit the exploration of this field simply to Antigone. Take the example of Philoctetes, where you will learn other aspects of the question, that is to say, that a hero doesn't have to be heroic to be a hero. Philoctetes isn't much of a man. He went off all excited and full of enthusiasm to die for his country on the shores of Troy, and he wasn't even wanted for that. He was dumped on an island because he smelled so bad. He spent ten years there consumed with hatred. The first fellow who comes looking for him, a nice young man called Neoptelemes, cons him like a baby, and in the end he nevertheless goes off to the shores of Troy because Hercules appears as a deux ex machina to offer a solution to all his sufferings. This deus ex machina isn't nothing, but everybody has known for a long time that he simply serves as a frame and limit to tragedy, that we don't have to take any more account of it than we do of the supports that define the area of the stage.

What makes Philoctetes a hero? Nothing more than the fact that he remains fiercely committed to his hate right to the end, when the deus ex machina appears like the curtain falling. This reveals to us not only that he has been betrayed and he is aware that he has been betrayed, but also that he has been betrayed with impunity. This is emphasized in the play by the fact that Neoptelemes, who is full of remorse because he betrayed the hero and thereby demonstrates his noble soul, comes to make proper amends and gives him back the bow that plays such an essential role in the tragic space of the play – because it operates there like a subject that is spoken about and addressed. It is the space of the hero and for good reason.

What I call "giving ground relative to one's desire" is always accompanied in the destiny of the subject by some betrayal – you will observe it in every case and should note its importance. Either the subject betrays his own way, betrays himself, and the result is significant for him, or, more simply, he tolerates the fact that someone with whom he has more or less vowed to do something betrays his hope and doesn't do for him what their pact entailed – whatever that pact may be, fated or ill-fated, risky, shortsighted, or indeed a matter of rebellion or flight, it doesn't matter.

Something is played out in betrayal if one tolerates it, if driven by the idea of the good – and by that I mean the good of the one who has just committed the act of betrayal – one gives ground to the point of giving up one's own claims and says to oneself, "Well, if that's how things are, we should abandon our position; neither of us is worth that much, and especially me, so we should just return to the common path." You can be sure that what you find there is the structure of giving ground relative to one's desire.

Once one has crossed that boundary where I combined in a single term contempt for the other and for oneself, there is no way back. It might be possible to do some repair work, but not to undo it. Isn't that a fact of experience that demonstrates how psychoanalysis is capable of supplying a useful compass in the field of ethical guidance?

I have, therefore, articulated three propositions.

First, the only thing one can be guilty of is giving ground relative to one's desire.

Second, the definition of a hero: someone who may be betrayed with impunity.

Third, this is something that not everyone can achieve; it constitutes the difference between an ordinary man and a hero, and it is, therefore, more mysterious than one might think. For the ordinary man the betrayal that almost always occurs sends him back to the service of goods, but with the proviso that he will never again find that factor which restores a sense of direction to that service.

We come finally to the field of the service of goods; it exists, of course, and there is no question of denying that. But turning things around, I propose the following, and this is my fourth proposition: There is no other good than that which may serve to pay the price for access to desire – given that desire is understood here, as we have defined it elsewhere, as the metonymy of our being. The channel in which desire is located is not simply that of the modulation of the signifying chain, but that which flows beneath it as well; that is, properly speaking, what we are as well as what we are not, our being and our non-being – that which is signified in an act passes from one signifier of the chain to another beneath all the significations.

I explained this last time with the metonymy of "eating the book" that no doubt just came to me, but if you examine it a little more closely, you will see that it is the most extreme of metonymies – something that shouldn't surprise us on the part of Saint John, the man who placed the Word at the beginning. It really is a writer's idea, and he was an incomparable one. But eating the book is, after all, something that confronts what Freud imprudently told us is not susceptible to substitution and displacement, namely, hunger, with something that isn't really made to be eaten, a book. In eating the book we come into contact with what Freud means when he speaks of sublimation as a change of aim and not of object. That's not immediately clear.

The hunger in question, sublimated hunger, falls in the space between the two, because it isn't the book that fills our stomach. When I ate the book, I didn't thereby become book any more than the book became flesh. The book became me so to speak. But in order for this operation to take place – and it takes place everyday – I definitely have to pay a price. Freud weighs this difference in a corner of Civilization and Its Discontents. Sublimate as much as you like; you have to pay for it with something. And this something is called jouissance. I have to pay for that mystical operation with a pound of flesh.

That's the object, the good, that one pays for the satisfaction of one's desire. And that's the point I wanted to lead you up to, so as to shed a little light on something that is essential and that isn't seen enough.

It is, in effect, there that the religious operation lies, something that is always interesting for us to consider. That good which is sacrificed for desire – and you will note that that means the same thing as that desire which is lost for the good – that pound of flesh is precisely the thing that religion undertakes to recuperate. That's the single trait which is common to all religions; it is coextensive with all religion, with the whole meaning of religion.

I can't develop this further, but I will give you two applications that are as expressive as they are brief. In a religious service the flesh that is offered to God on the altar, the animal sacrifice or whatever, is consumed by the people of the religious community and usually simply by the priest; they are the ones who stuff themselves with it. The form is an exemplary one; but it is just as true of the saint, whose goal is, in effect, access to sublime desire and not at all his own desire, for the saint lives and pays for others. The essential element in saintliness resides in the fact that the saint consumes the price paid in the form of suffering at two extreme points: the classic point of the worst ironies relative to religious mystification, such as the priests' little feast behind the altar, and the point of the last frontier of religious heroism as well. There, too, we find the same phenomenon of recuperation.

It is in this respect that great religious work is distinguished from what goes on in an ethical form of catharsis, which may bring together things as apparently foreign to each other as psychoanalysis and the tragic spectacles of the Greeks. If we found our measure there, it is not without reason. Catharsis has the sense of purification of desire. Purification cannot be accomplished, as is clear if one simply reads Aristotle's sentence, unless one has at least established the crossing of its limits that we call fear and pity.

It is because the tragic epos doesn't leave the spectator in ignorance as to where the pole of desire is and shows that the access to desire necessitates crossing not only all fear but all pity, because the voice of the hero trembles before nothing, and especially not before the good of the other, because all this is experienced in the temporal unfolding of the story, that the subject learns a little more about the deepest level of himself than he knew before.

For anyone who goes to the Théâtre-Français or the Theater of Athens, it will last as long as it lasts. But if, in the end, Aristotle's formulations mean anything, it is that. One knows what it costs to go forward in a given direction, and if one doesn't go that way, one knows why. One can even sense that if, in one's accounts with one's desire, one isn't exactly in the clear, it is because one couldn't do any better, for that's not a path one can take without paying a price.

The spectator has his eyes opened to the fact that even for him who goes to the end of his desire, all is not a bed of roses. But he also has his eyes opened – and this is essential – to the value of prudence which stands in opposition to that, to the wholly relative value of beneficial reasons, attachments or pathological interests, as Mr. Kant says, that might keep him on that risky path.

I have given you there an almost prosaic interpretation of tragedy and its effects, and however vital its peaks may be, I am not happy to have reduced it to a level that might lead you to believe that what I take to be essential in catharsis is pacificatory. It may not be pacificatory for everybody. But it was the most direct way of reconciling what some have taken to be the moralizing face of tragedy with the fact that the lesson of tragedy in its essence is not at all moral in the ordinary sense of the word.

Of course, not every catharsis can be reduced to something as external as a topological demonstration. When it is a matter of the practices of those whom the Greeks called μαινόμενοι, those who go crazy through a trance, through religious experience, through passion or through anything else, the value of the catharsis presupposes that, in a way that is either more-or-less directed or wild, the subject enters into the zone described here, and that his return involves some gain that will be called possession or whatever – Plato doesn't hesitate to point this out in the cathartic procedures. There is a whole range there, a spectrum of possibilities, that it would take a whole year to catalogue.

The important thing is to know where all that is to be located in the field whose limits I have outlined for you this year.

4

And now a word in conclusion.

The field that is ours by reason of the fact that we are exploring it is going to be in one way or another the object of a science. And, you are going to ask me, will this science of desire belong to the field of the human sciences?

Before leaving you this year, I would like to make my position on the subject very clear. I do not think, given the way that field is being laid out, and I assure you it is being done carefully, that it will amount to anything else but a systematic and fundamental misunderstanding of everything that has to do with the whole affair that I have been discussing here. The fields of inquiry that are being outlined as necessarily belonging to the human sciences have in my eyes no other function than to form a branch of the service of goods, which is no doubt advantageous though of limited value. Those fields are in other words a branch of the service of those powers that are more than a little precarious. In any case, implied here is a no less systematic misunderstanding of all the violent phenomena that reveal that the path of the triumph of goods in our world is not likely to be a smooth one.

In other words, in the phrase of one of the exceptional politicians who has functioned as a leader of France, Mazarin, politics is politics, but love always remains love.

As for the kind of science that might be situated in that place I have designated the place of desire, what can it be? Well, you don't have to look very far. As far as science is concerned, the kind that is presently occupying the place of desire is quite simply what we commonly call science, the kind that you see cantering gaily along and accomplishing all kinds of so-called physical conquests.

I think that throughout this historical period the desire of man, which has been felt, anesthetized, put to sleep by moralists, domesticated by educators, betrayed by the academies, has quite simply taken refuge or been repressed in that most subtle and blindest of passions, as the story of Oedipus shows, the passion for knowledge. That's the passion that is currently going great guns and is far from having said its last word.

One of the most amusing features of the history of science is to be found in the propaganda scientists and alchemists have addressed to the powers that be at a time when they were beginning to run out of steam. It went as follows: "Give us money; you don't realize that if you gave us a little money, we would be able to put all kinds of machines, gadgets and contraptions at your service." How could the powers let themselves be taken in? The answer to the question is to be found in a certain breakdown of wisdom. It's a fact that they did let themselves be taken in, that science got its money, as a consequence of which we are left with this vengeance. It's a fascinating thing, but as far as those who are at the forefront of science are concerned, they are not without a keen consciousness of the fact that they have their backs against a wall of hate. They are themselves capsized by the turbulent swell of a heavy sense of guilt. But that isn't very important because it's not in truth an adventure that Mr. Oppenheimer's remorse can put an end to overnight. It is moreover there where the problem of desire will lie in the future.

The universal order has to deal with the problem of what it should do with that science in which something is going on whose nature escapes it. Science, which occupies the place of desire, can only be a science of desire in the form of an enormous question mark; and this is doubtless not without a structural cause. In other words, science is animated by some mysterious desire, but it doesn't know, any more than anything in the unconscious itself, what that desire means. The future will reveal it to us, and perhaps among those who by the grace of God have most recently eaten the book – I mean those who have written with their labors, indeed with their blood, the book of Western science. It, too, is an edible book.

I spoke about Mencius earlier. After having made the statements that you would be wrong to consider optimistic about the goodness of man, he explains very well that what we are most ignorant about is the laws that come to us from heaven, the same laws as Antigone's. His proof is absolutely rigorous, but it is too late for me to repeat it here. The laws of heaven in question are the laws of desire.

Of him who ate the book and the mystery within it, one can, in effect, ask the question: "Is he good, is he bad?" That question now seems unimportant. The important thing is not knowing whether man is good or bad in the beginning; the important thing is what will transpire once the book has been eaten.

July 6, 1960

ACKNOWLEDGMENTS

When Jacques Lacan died on September 9, 1981, in Paris, he had planned that the publication of a complete edition of his Seminar would continue according to the principles outlined in the notice and postscript of the first volume that appeared, The Four Fundamental Concepts (Paris: Le Seuil, 1973; New York: Norton, 1981), principles I referred to in a pamphlet, Entretien sur le Séminaire avec François Ansermet (Paris: Navarin, 1985).

This edition of Book VII has benefitted from the work of Mrs. Judith Miller on the Greek references, especially the Sophoclean references. Mr. Franz Kaltenbeck verified the German quotations, notably the Freudian ones. Professors Quackelbeen of the University of Ghent and Rey-Flaud of the University of Montpellier obtainaed for me T. H. Van de Velde's Ideal Marriage and the text of Arnaud Daniel, respectively. Mr. François Wahl of the Editions de Seuil reread the manuscript. Doctor Danièle Silvestre, Doctor Patrick Valas, Ms. Elisabeth Doisneau and Ms. Annie Staricky helped with the correction of the proofs. I thank them all as I thank in advance any reader who would like to collaborate in the revision of a text that is the object of continuing work. Comments should be forwarded c/o my publisher.

J.-A. Miller

BIBLIOGRAPHY

The following are works referred to in the body of the Seminar in English language editions where they exist.

Anouilh, Jean (1946). Antigone. Paris: La Table Ronde.

Aristotle (1968). The Nicomachean Ethics (Bilingual with an English trans. by H. Rackham). Cambridge: Harvard University Press, Loeb Classical Library.

Bataille, Georges (1986). Erotism: Death and Sensuality (Mary Dalwood, Trans.). San Francisco, CA: City Lights.

Bentham, Jeremy (1932). The Theory of Fictions. London: K. Paul, Trench, Tribner.

Bergler, Jacques (1960). Le matin des magiciens. Paris: Gallimard.

Bernfeld, Siegfried (1921). Bemerkungen über Sublimierung [Observations on Sublimation]. Imago, VIII.

Blanchot, Maurice (1963). Lautréamont et Sade. Paris: Minuit.

Breton, André (1937). L'Amour fou. Paris: Gallimard.

—— (1932). Les Vases Communicants. Paris: Cahiers Libres.

Breuer, Joseph, & Freud, Sigmund (1893–95). Studies on Hysteria. In J. Strachey (Ed. and Trans.), The Standard Edition of the Complete Psychological Works of Sigmund Freud (Vol. 2). New York: Norton.

Capellanus, Andreas (1990). Art of Courtly Love (J.J. Parry, Trans.). New York: Columbia University Press.

Claudel, Paul (1935). Introduction à la peinture hollandaise. Paris: Gallimard.

Colette (1987). Enfant et les Sortilèges. Videorecording with music by Maurice Ravel. National Video Corporation: Mass.

Corbin, Henry (1969). The Creative Imagination in the Sufism of Ibn Arabi (R. Manheim, Trans.). Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press.

Daniel, Arnaut (1981). The Poetry of Arnaut Daniel (James J. Wilhelm, Trans.). New York: Garland Publishing.

Deutsch, Helen (1944–1945). The Psychology of Women: A Psychoanalytic Interpretation. New York: Grune and Stratton.

—— (1965) Neuroses and Character Types: Clinical Psychoanalytical Studies (John D. Sutherland and M. Masud R. Kahn, Eds.). London: Hogarth Press.

Diderot, Denis (1956). Rameau's Nephew and Other Works (J. Barzun & R. Bowen, Trans.). Garden City, NY: Doubleday.

—— (1964). Supplement au Voyage de Bougainville. In Oeuvres Philosophiques (Paul Vernière, Ed.). Paris: Garnier.

Ellis, Havelock (1936). Studies in the Psychology of Sex. New York: Random House.

Eluard, Paul (1968). Capitale de la Douleur. In Oeuvres Complètes I. Paris: Gallimard, Bibliothèque de la Pléiade.

Engels, Friedrich, & Marx, Karl (1959). Basic Writings on Politics and Philosophy. Garden City, NY: Doubleday.

Erasmus, Desiderius, & Luther, Martin (1961). Discourse on Free Will (E.F. Winter, Trans.). New York: Unger.

Febvre, Lucien (1982). The Problem of Unbelief in the Sixteenth Century (B. Gottlieb, Trans.). Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press.

Fourier, Charles (1901). Selections from the Works of Fourier. London: Sommenschein.

Freud, Sigmund (1900–1901). The Interpretation of Dreams. In J. Strachey (Ed. and Trans.), The Standard Edition of the Complete Psychological Works of Sigmund Freud (Vols. 4 & 5). New York: Norton.

—— (1905). Three Essays on the Theory of Sexuality. In The Standard Edition (Vol. 7, pp. 125–245). New York: Norton.

—— (1910[1909]). Five Lectures on Psycho-Analysis. In The Standard Edition (Vol. 11, pp. 1–56). New York: Norton.

—— (1913[1912–13]). Totem and Taboo. In The Standard Edition (Vol. 13, pp. 1–162). New York: Norton.

—— (1914). On Narcissism: An Introduction. In The Standard Edition (Vol. 14, pp. 67–107). New York: Norton.

—— (1915–1917). Introductory Lectures on Psycho-Analysis. In The Standard Edition (Vols. 15 & 16). New York: Norton.

—— (1917[1918]). Mourning and Melancholia. In The Standard Edition (Vol. 14, pp. 238–260). New York: Norton.

—— (1919). Introduction to Psycho-Analysis and the War Neuroses. In The Standard Edition (Vol. 17, pp. 205–215). New York: Norton.

—— (1920). Beyond the Pleasure Principle. In The Standard Edition (Vol. 18, pp. 1–64). New York: Norton.

—— (1930[1929]). Civilization and Its Discontents. In The Standard Edition (Vol. 21, pp. 57–145). New York: Norton.

—— (1937). Analysis Terminable and Interminable. In The Standard Edition (Vol. 23, pp. 209–253). New York: Norton.

—— (1939[1934–38]). Moses and Monotheism. In The Standard Edition (Vol. 23, pp. 1–137). New York: Norton.

—— (1950[1895]). Project for a New Scientific Psychology. In The Standard Edition (Vol. 1, pp. 281–397). New York: Norton.

Freud, Sigmund, & Fliess, Wilhelm (1985). The Complete Letters of Sigmund Freud and Wilhelm Fliess, 1887–1904 (Jeffrey Mousaieff Masson, Trans. and Ed.). Cambridge: Harvard University Press.

Fromm, Erich (1959). Sigmund Freud's Mission. New York: Harper & Bros.

Glover, Edward (1931). Sublimation, Substitution and Social Anxiety. The International Journal of Psychoanalysis.

Hegel (1967). The Phenomenology of Mind (J. B. Baillie, Trans.). London: Allen & Unwin.

Heidegger, Martin (1969). Identity and Difference (J. Stambaugh, Trans.). New York: Harper & Row.

—— (1968). What Is a Thing? (W.B. Barton & V. Deutsch, Trans.). Chicago: Henry Regnery & Co.

Jones, Ernest (1948). Hatred, Culpability and Fear. In Papers on Psychoanalysis (5th ed.). London: Bailliere, Tindall & Cox.

Kant, Immanuel (1987). The Critique of Judgment (W. S. Pluhar, Trans.). Indianapolis, IN: Hackett.

—— (1956). The Critique of Practical Reason (L.W. Beck, Trans.). New York: Liberal Arts Press.

—— (1966). The Critique of Pure Reason (F.M. Muller, Trans.). Garden City, NY: Doubleday.

Klein, Melanie (1948). Contributions to Psychoanalysis: 1921–1945. London: Hogarth Press.

—— (1975). The Writings of Melanie Klein (Roger Money-Kyrle, Ed.). London: Hogarth Press & the Institute of Psychoanalysis.

Krafft-Ebing, R. (1991). Psychopathia Sexualis: Or the Antipathic Sexual Instinct. American Institute of Psychiatry.

Lacan, Jacques (1955 / 56). The Freudian Thing. In Jacques Lacan (1977), Ecrits: A Selection (A. Sheridan, Trans.) (pp. 114–145). New York: Norton.

—— (1958). The direction of the treatment and the principles of its power. In Ecrits: A Selection (pp. 226–80). New York: Norton.

Lambin, Denys (1820). Aristotelis Ethicorum Nicomacheorum. Heidelberg.

Lautréamont, Comte de (1987). Maldoror (A. Lyliard, Trans.). New York: Schocken.

Lévi-Srauss, Claude (1967). Structural Anthropology (Claire Jacobson & Brooke Grundfest Schoepf, Trans.). New York: Basic Books.

—— (1969). The Elementary Structures of Kinship (H. Bell, J.R. von Sturmer & R. Needham, Trans.). London: Eyre and Spottiswoode.

Luther, Martin (1983). Sermons (J. N. Lenker, Ed.). Grand Rapids, MI: Baker Books.

—— (1952). Table Talk. New York: World Pub. Co.

Mandeville, Bernard de (1989). The Fables of the Bees. New York: Viking Penguin.

Marx, Karl (1964). Contribution to the Critique of Hegel and The Jewish Question. In Early Writings (T.B. Bottomore, Trans.). New York: McGraw-Hill.

Miller, Henry (1965). Nexus. New York: Grove.

—— (1963). Plexus. London: Weidenfeld & Nicholson.

—— (1950). Sexus. Paris: The Obelisk Press.

Mirabeau, Gabriel-Honoré de Riqueti, comte de (1984). L'Oeuvre Libertine du Comte de Mirabeau. Sainte-Maxime: D'Aujourd'hui.

Navarre, Marguerite de (1984). The Heptameron (P.A. Chilton. Trans.). Harmondsworth, England: Penguin.

Nelli, René (1929). Oeuvre romanesque complète. Paris: A. Michel.

—— (1953). Spiritualité de l'Hérésie: Le Catharisme. AMS.

Pascal, Blaise (1963). Oeuvres Complètes. Paris: Seuil.

Piéron, Henry (1952). The Sensations: Their Functions, Processes, and Mechanisms. London: F. Miller.

Rauh, Fritz (1969). Das Sittliche Leen des Menschen im Licht des gleichenden Verhaltensforschung. Kevelaer, Rheinland: Butzen und Bercker.

Réage, Pauline (1972). Histoire d'Eau. Paris: Jean-Jacques Pauvert.
Régis, E., & Hesnard, A. (1914). La Psychoanalyse des Nevroses et des Psychoses. Paris.
Reinhardt, Karl (1979). Sophocles. Oxford: Blackwell.
Rohde, Erwin (1972). Psyche: The Cult of Souls and Belief in Immortality Among the Ancient Greeks. Freeport, NY: Books for Libraries.
Rougement, Denis de (1956). Love and the Western World. New York: Pantheon.
Sacher-Masoch, Leopold von (1989). Venus in Furs. New York: Blast Books.
Sade, Marquis de (1965). Philosophy in the Boudoir and Other Writings. New York: Grove.
—— (1968). The Story of Juliette. New York: Grove.
—— (1970). Idées sur le Roman. Bordeaux: Ducros.
Saint Augustine (1961). Confessions (R.S. Pine-Coffin, Trans.). New York: Viking Penguin.
Saint Paul (1967). Epistle to the Romans. In the Holy Bible. New York: Oxford University Press.
Sartre, Jean Paul (1976). Critique of Dialectical Reason. London: Humanities Press.
Sharpe, Ella (1950). Collected Papers on Psycho-Analysis. London: Hogarth Press.
Sophocles (1956–1961). Antigone. In Sophocles (Bilingual with an English trans. by F. Storr). Cambridge: Harvard University Press, Loeb Classical Library.
Sperber, Hans (1914). Ueber den Einfluss Sexueller Momente auf Entstehung und Entwicklung de Sprache [On the Influence of Sexual Factors on the Origin and Development of Language]. Imago, I.
Stendhal (1947). On Love. New York: Liveright.
Sterba, Richard (1930). Problematik der Sublimierungslehre. Internationale Zeitschrift für Psychoanalyse, XVI.
Terence (1967). The Self-Tormenter. In The Comedies of Terence (Frank O. Copley, Trans.). Indianapolis: Bobbs-Merrill.
Vailland, Roger (1960). La Fête. Paris: Gallimard.
Valéry, Paul (1956). Monsieur Teste. In J. Mathews (Ed.), The Collected Works of Paul Valéry (vol. 6). New York: Pantheon.

INDEX

Abfuhr, 49
abreaction, 244 adultery, 78
Aeschylus, 271, 273 affects, psychology of, 102–3 aggressions, primal and inverted, 106, 115 agricultural work, as symbolic copulation, 164
Ajax (Sophocles), 271
Akhenaton, 173, 180
Allacoque, Marie, 188
Allais, Alphonse, 13–14
allgemeine, 76–77
altruism, 187, 195
Ambassadors, The (Holbein), 135, 140
amor intellectualis Dei, 180
Amour fou, L' (Breton), 154
Analysis Studies, 159
"Analysis Terminable and Interminable" (Freud), 299
anamorphosis:
  in Antigone, 272–73, 282
  in architecture, 135, 140 in art, 135–36, 140–41, 272–73
  courtly love as, 139–54
Andersen, see Other anger, 103 animal realm:
  anger and, 103 symbols and, 45
animal totem, 177
Anthology of Sublime Love, The (Perret), 148 Antigone (Sophocles), 240, 241–87, 306, 320, 325
  anamorphosis in, 272–73, 282
  Antigone as hero of, 258, 262–66, 270, 276–83
  Antigone's beauty in, 247–48
  Antigone's entombment and hanging in, 248, 268–69, 280, 286, 299
  Antigone's self-justification in, 254–56
  Atè in, 262–64, 267, 270, 277, 281, 283, 286, 300 desire in, 247 importance of, 243, 257, 273, 284 translations of, 254, 270 anti-morality, 78 antiquity, love in, 98–99
anxiety, 103
Apocalypse, 294
aporia, 274–75
appetitive process, 33 architecture, 175
  anamorphosis in, 135, 140
  emptiness and, 135–36
Aristophanes, 297
Aristotle, 60, 121, 124, 216, 221, 252, 255, 273, 277, 292, 314–15, 318, 323 on catharsis, 244, 245, 246, 257–58, 287 ethics and, 5, 10–11, 12, 13, 22–23, 27, 29, 36 186
Ars Amandi (Ovid), 153 art:
  anamorphosis in, 135–36, 140–41, 272–73
  in caves, 139–40
  Ding and, 131, 141
  emptiness and, 130, 136, 140
  history and, 141–42 imitation vs. non-imitation in, 141 real and, 141
  rewards and, 144–45 see also creativity, sublimation and ascetic experience, 7
Atè, 262–64, 267, 270, 277, 281, 283, 286, 300 atherapy, 107
atomism, 32–33, 102
Aufbau, 40, 51
Aufhebung, 193
Augustine, Saint, 97, 220, 233–34 authenticity, as psychoanalytic ideal, 9–10 avoidance, 63–64

Bahnungen (facilitation), 31, 222 of language, 45 of memory, 58
  of pleasure principle, 36, 39, 41, 63, 137
Bataille, Georges, 201 beautiful, beauty, 257, 261, 269, 286–87, 295, 296, 297, 301

  desire and, 237–39, 248–49
  function of, 298
  good vs., 217
Befriedigungserlebnis, 39, 53, 93
Begriff, 259
behaviorism, 47
being, Being vs., 214, 248 belief (faith), 54, 62–63, 130–31, 170–71
"Bemerkungen über Sublimierung" ("Observations on Sublimation") (Bernfeld), 144, 155, 159
Bentham, Jeremy, 12, 187, 228
Bernays, Jakob, 246–47
Bernays, Michael, 246
Bernfeld, Siegfried, 111, 144, 145, 203–4, 211, 212 critique of, 155–60
Besetzung, 49–50, 137 bestiality, 5
Bewegung, 48
Bewusstsein, see conscious beyond-of-the-signified, 54
Beyond the Pleasure Principle (Freud), 21, 185, 213, 222
Bible, 68, 122
  see also ten commandments; specific books Blanchot, Maurice, 200–201 blindness, truth and, 310
Boehme, Jakob, 215
Bornibus, 120–21
Breton, André, 154
Breuer, Joseph, 244
Brucke, Ernst Wilhelm von, 29
Buddhism, 175, 176 burning bush, as Ding, 174, 180

calumny, 78
Camus, Albert, 201*n*
"ça parle, Le," 206*n*
Capellanus, Andreas, 146
castration, 299, 307, 308
Cathars, 123–24, 153, 215, 245
catharsis, 244–46, 257–58, 287, 310, 312, 315
Cathar Writings (Book of Two Principles) (Nelli, ed.), 124 Catholic church, 123–24
causality, 72
causa noumenon, 73
causa pathomenon, 97 cave art, 139–40 censor, 3
"Certain Aspects of Sublimation and Delirium" (Sharpe), 107 César (Pagnol), 69*n* character, ethics and, 10 child in man, 24, 25
Chinese language, 167
Chrétien de Troyes, 151, 153
Christ, 96, 97, 174 Christianity:
  atheistic message in, 178
  crucifixion image in, 262 and death of God, 193 doing good and, 319
Civilization and Its Discontents (Freud), 6–7, 13, 27, 34, 37, 89, 90, 96, 98, 143, 179, 184–86, 199, 207, 302, 322
Claudel, Paul, 298
Clement of Alexandria, Saint, 299 clothes, symbolism of, 226–28
Cohen, Gustave, 112
Colette, 115 collecting, psychology of, 113–14, 117 Combat, 155
comedy, function of, 90, 313–14 Communicating Vases, 91 complicationes, 40
component drive, 5, 194–95
Concerning the Heptameron (Febvre), 131
Confessions (Augustine), 220 conscience, consciousness vs., 122*n* conscious, 44
  endopsychic perception and, 49 perception and, 49–51, 61, 74 preconscious and unconscious and, 37, 61–62 reality principle and, 48 consciousness, 122*n*, 213–14, 223–24 consolamentum, 215 contiguity and continuity, 33
Contributions to Psychoanalysis (Klein), 115 "Contribution to the Critique of Hegel's Philosophy of Law, The" (Marx), 208 Corbin, Henry, 148, 149
counteraggression, 115
countertransference, 291
courtly love (Minne), 99, 109, 235
  as anamorphosis, 139–54
  Eastern religions and, 149, 153 heresy and, 125
  Lady and, 126, 146, 148, 149, 150–51, 162–63
  Liebe vs., 125
  poetry and poets of, 145–52, 161–63, 214–15 as sublimation, 128, 131, 136, 142, 160, 161–63, 215 unconscious traces of, 112, 131–32 covetousness, 82–83
creation:
  ex nihilo, 121–22, 212–14, 225, 260–61, 262 of signifiers, 119
creationism, 124, 126, 212, 261
Creative Imagination, The (Corbin), 148 creativity, sublimation and, 106–7, 115–17, 238 crime, as transgression, 260
Critique of Dialectical Reason (Sartre), 226
Critique of Judgment, The (Kant), 249, 261, 287
Critique of Practical Reason, The (Kant), 72, 76, 78, 80, 97
Critique of Pure Reason, The (Kant), 77, 78, 108 crucifixion image, 262 culture:
  nature vs., 67–68, 77–78, 274
  sublimation and, 107
  see also society
Cyril, Saint, 68

Da, Fort vs., 65, 169 danger, etymology of, 84
Daniel, Arnaud, 161–63, 215
Dante Alighieri, 149, 163
Dassin, Jules, 317–18
David, King of Israel, 81
De Arte Amandi (Capellanus), 146 death drive, 2, 6, 236, 239, 295
  in Antigone, 281, 282, 286
  Bernfeld on, 203–4
  nature of, 211–13
defense systems:
  organic, 73
  sublimation and, 95
De Libero Arbitrio (Erasmus), 97
"Denegration" ("Die Verneinung") (Freud), 37, 46, 52, 58
De Officiis (Cicero), 160 dependence, prophylaxis of, 10
Descartes, René, 103, 206
desire, 134, 216, 237, 300 action and, 310–25 of analyst, 300–301
  in Antigone, 247, 248–49
  beauty and, 237–39, 248–49 compromise and, 105
  definition of, 321
  desire of, 14
  function of, 209, 246, 257, 265
  genitalization of, 8 guilt, 319, 321
  law and, 82–84
  Law and, 170
  man's relationship to, 306, 310, 318 morality and, 3, 5 naturalist liberation of, 3–4 natural vs. perverse, 232 need vs., 207, 225 normalization of, 181 object and, 113
  of Oedipus, 309 pain and, 80 pleasure of, 152 power and, 315 repression of, 6 science of, 324
  and transgression of pleasure principle's limits, 109–10 destrudo, 194
Deuteronomy, 80–81
Deutsch, Helene, 9 Diabolus, 92
diachrony, synchrony vs., 285
Diderot, Denis, 4, 177
Ding, 43–70, 253 burning bush as, 174, 180
  centrality of, 97, 105
  distance between subject and, 69, 73, 105 drives and, 111
  as emptiness, 129–30
  ethics and, 103, 104, 105
  evil and, 124
  as extimacy, 139
  as Fremde, 52 genital act and, 300 inaccessibility of, 159, 203
  incest and, 68, 70
  Law and, 83–84, 186
  mythic body of the mother and, 106 Nebenmensch and, 51
  object and, 101–14, 126
  as Other of subject, 52, 71
  reality principle and, 45, 66
  repetition demanded by, 75
  Sache vs., 43–45, 62–63
  sublimation and, 95, 99, 115, 117, 126, 129, 131, 134, 158
  vacuole and, 150
  veiled nature of, 118
  Vorstellung and, 57–62, 63
Dionysionism, 198 discharge, 53, 244 doctor-love, 8
Dolce Vita, La, 253
Domnei, 149, 150
don de merci, le, 152
Don Quixote (Cervantes), 153 dreams, 62, 133
drives, 87–100, 144
  aim of, 110, 111 component, 5, 194–95
  Ding and, 111
  ego assisted by, 159
  as English translation, 110, 249*n* as fundamental ontological notion, 127 jouissance as satisfaction of, 209 pleasure principle as realm of, 96 satisfaction of, 111 source of, 93
  sublimation and, 110, 238
  see also instincts Dumont, Etienne, 12 duty, 7–8

Eckhart, Johannes (Master Eckhart), 63
ego, 37, 51, 137 drives' assistance to, 159 libido vs., 157 organic defense by, 73 Spaltung of, 171
  as unconscious, 49
Einführung des Ichs (Freud), 49, 95, 97
Einführung des Narzissmus (Freud), 111
Eleanor of Aquitaine, 126, 146
Electra (Sophocles), 271
Ellis, Havelock, 195
Eluard, Paul, 154, 309
Emma (patient), 73–74
émoi pulsionnel, 249 emptiness:
  architecture and, 135–36 art and, 130, 136, 140
  Ding as, 129–30
  female sexual organ and, 169, 215

emptiness (continued) of God, 196
sublimated forms of, 130
"Empty Space" (Mikailis), 116
endogamy, 67
endopsychic perception, 49 energy/matter equivalence, 122
Enfant et les Sortilèges, L' (Colette), 115
Entwurf (Project for a Scientific Psychology) (Freud), 35–42, 57, 73, 130, 222
Ding and, 45–47, 54, 101
importance of, 30, 35
original German vs. translations of, 37, 39, 40, 74 pleasure/reality opposition in, 27, 31, 32, 35, 36–42 as theory of neuronic apparatus, 47
Epimenides, 82
Epistles, 83
epopteia, 259–60
Erasmus, 97
Erlebnis, 54
Eros, 93, 99, 142, 231
eroticism, erotics, 4, 9, 14, 84, 100, 142, 145, 152, 188
Erscheinung, 60, 114
Es, 137, 206*n*
Essay on Negative Greatness (Kant), 189 Essays and Lectures (Heidegger), 120 étant, l', 214, 248
ethics:
Antigone's importance to, 243
Aristotelian, 5, 10–11, 12, 13, 22–23, 27, 29, 36, 186 central problem of, 121
definition of, 311
Ding and, 103, 104, 105
faults vs. misfortunes and, 89 Hegelian, 105 historical evolution of, 11–14 ideology and, 182
importance of, 3
innovation and, 14–15
Kantian, 72–73, 76–78, 79, 80, 108–9, 188–89, 259
Lacan's choice of term, 2 as mediator, 95
paradoxes of, 311–25
pleasure/reality opposition and, 35 and pleasure vs. good, 36 question formulation of, 19
rites and, 258
Sadian, 78–80, 188, 191, 197, 199–203, 209, 210–11, 212 as science of character, 10
sublimation and, 107–8
see also morality; moral law être, l', 214, 248
Euripides, 263, 264–65, 273 evil, 73, 97, 197
beauty and, 217
Freud and, 104, 106
jouissance as, 179, 184–90 search for source of, 123–24 Supreme-Being-in, 215 evolutionism, 126, 213–14
excluded interior, 101 exhibitionism, reciprocal, 158 existentialism, 122
ex nihilo creation, 121–22, 212–14, 225, 260–61, 262 experience, process of, 33 experimentum mentis, 313
extimacy, 139

Fable of the Bees, The (Mandeville), 69 facilitation, see Bahnungen faith (belief), 54, 62–63, 130–31, 170–71 Fanny (Pagnol), 69*n* fantasms, 115, 144, 239, 298, 316, 317
of phallus, 299, 301
in Sade, 261 speech and, 80
symbolization of, 99
father:
castration by, 307
Father as, 181
as he who acknowledges, 309 as idiot or thief, 308 and image of God, 308 incest by, 67 murder of, 2, 5, 143, 176–77, 180, 304 as myth, 309
Father, 228
death of, 126–27
as father, 181
Freud and, 96–97, 100, 126, 170–78
human nature of, 181 see also God fear and pity:
catharsis of, 244, 245, 247–48, 257–58
as lacking in martyrs, 267, 273
Febvre, Lucien, 131
Fechner, Gustav Theodor, 40
Fellini, Federico, 253 female sexual organ, metaphor and, 168–69, 227
feminine sexuality, 298–99
psychoanalytical avoidance of, 9 fictitious, definition of, 12 figurative, concrete vs., 120
Five Lectures on Psychoanalysis (Freud), 90
Fixierarbeit, 88
Fléchier, Esprit, 199
Fliess, Wilhelm, 27, 28, 35, 50, 53, 59
Folignio, Angela de, 188 fool, foolery, 182–83, 195
foreplay, 152
"Formulieringen uber die Zwei Prinzipen des Psychischen Geschehens" (Freud), 27
Fort, Da vs. 65, 169
Fourier, Charles, 225
François de Sales, Saint, 97
Franju, Georges, 70*n*

Freud, Anna, 113
Freud, Sigmund:
auto-analysis of, 26, 30 belief as obsession of, 130 Bernays family and, 246–47
as collector, 113 and evolution of ethics, 11, 12–14
as father, 181–82
gnomic formulas of, 129
impotency of, 26 intellectual decline of, 172 as non-progressive humanitarian, 183–84, 207–8 as not to be measured, 206 psychoanalysis handed to women by, 182 relationship between father and, 308–9 schism of disciples of, 92 Sovereign Good denied by, 70, 95, 300
"What does woman want?" question of, 9
see also specific works Freudian aesthetics, 159
"Freudian Thing, The" (Lacan), 132
Fromm, Erich, 26
"fuck" metaphor, 168

genital act, 300 genital love, 8
genital objecthood, 293
Gesammelte Werke (Freud), 91, 95, 156
Gevaert, 65–66
Giraudoux, Jean, 263
Gleichbesetzung, 49, 51
Gleichzeitigkeit, 65
Glover, Edward, 111, 115
Gnade, 146
gnomic formulas, 129
God, 121, 122, 124, 294
death of, 126–27, 143, 177–78, 179–81, 184, 193 emptiness of, 196
as guarantor of Law, 194 hatred for, 308
as "I am that I am," 81, 173 libertine challenge to, 34 radical elimination of, 213–14
see also Father Goethe, Johann Wolfgang von, 248, 250, 254, 255, 258, 268, 278 good, 259, 292
beauty vs., 217
Ding and, 72
Freud's denial of, 96
function of, 218–30, 233–34
Law and, 220–21
pain and, 240
pleasure principle and, 33–34, 36, 216, 221–22, 224–25
Gospels, 96
grace, 171, 261
grenouille, 227*n*
guilt, 57, 318
calming of, 4
desire and, 319, 321
omnipresence of, 3
gute Wille (good will), 77 habits, 222 acquisition of, 22 dimension of, 10

Haftbarkeit, 88
hallucination, 33, 52–53, 137, 138
Hamlet (Shakespeare), 251 happiness:
demand for, 291–301
etymology of, 13
hate, 306, 309
"Hatred, Culpability and Fear" (Jones), 306 hedonism, 185
Hegel, G. W. F., 133, 178, 198, 206, 208, 258 on Antigone, 235–36, 240, 243, 248, 249, 254
ethics and, 105
in history of philosophy, 234
Lacan as influenced by, 134, 249 and position of the master, 11–12, 23
Heidegger, Martin, 65–66, 120, 276, 297
Heine, Heinrich, 122, 147
Helmholtz, Hermann Ludwig Ferdinand von, 29
Heptameron, The (Navarre), 131
Heraclites, 299
Herbart, Johann Friedrich, 30 hero, ordinary man vs., 319–21
Herodotus, 255
He Who Punishes Himself (The Self-Tormentor) (Terence), 89
Hilflosigkeit, 303–4
Hinduism, 149, 153
Hippocrates, 245
Holbein, Hans, the Younger, 135, 140
Hölderlin, Freidrich, 65, 66 homeostasis, 46, 59, 118, 119 homo faber, 214
humanization of the planet, 233 hysteria, 53, 54, 73, 129, 138, 205–6

"I," 56
"I am that I am," 81
Ich, see ego
Ichgerechte, 156
Ich-ideal, Ideal-ich vs., 98, 234
Ichlibido/Objektlibido, 95, 98
Ichziele, 144, 156, 157, 158 idealism, 30
idealization, of object, 100, 111, 160
Ideals on the Novel (Sade), 199
Iliad (Homer), 172, 281–82 imaginary, 11, 20
Imago, 155, 164
immobility, 49
incest, 78, 304
Ding and, 68, 70
as fundamental desire, 67, 76 in ten commandments, 69
individuation, 198

"Infant Analysis" (Klein), 115
"Infantile Anxiety Situations Reflected in a Work of Art and in the Creative Impulse" (Klein), 115–17 Inquisition, 124 instincts, 106, 109, 204, 209, 301 artistic reward and, 145
  masochism in economy of, 14, 15 as measure of action, 311–12 plasticity of, 91
  satisfaction of, 293
  search for, 99
  see also drives instinctual excitement, 249 intellectual comfort, 192 intellectuals, left vs. right wing, 182–83, 195, 207 intemperance, 23, 29
Interpretation of Dreams, The (Traumdeutung) (Freud), 14, 27, 31, 37
"intersaid," 65
Introduction to Psychoanalysis (Freud), 14
Introductory Lectures on Psychoanalysis (Freud), 7, 90, 91
"It speaks," 206

Jakobson, Roman, 12
jealousy, 237
Jederman, 194
"Jewish Question, The" (Marx), 208 Jews, history of, 174
John, Saint, 322
Jones, Ernest, 9, 25, 159, 163–64, 182, 226–27, 246, 306, 308, 309
jouissance, 229, 298, 316
  as accessible to other, 237 as evil, 179, 184–90 murder of father and, 176 as satisfaction of drive, 209
  sublimation and, 322
  taming of, 4–5 of transgression, 177, 191–204
  Vorstellung and, 61
Joy of Love, The (Perdu), 148
Jung, Carl, 92
juvenile mentality, 25

Kant, Immanuel, 55, 70, 84, 97, 206, 207, 249, 257, 261, 269, 286–87, 295, 301, 315–16, 317, 323 ethical fable of, 108–9, 188–89
  ethics and, 72–73, 76–78, 79, 80, 259
Kaufmann, Pierre, 155–56, 158, 159, 161, 203–4, 211, 295
Kierkegaard, Søren, 198
King Lear (Shakespeare), 305
Kjar, Ruth, 116–17
Klein, Melanie, 106, 115–17, 307
Kleinian theory, 73, 106–7, 111, 115–17
knave, knavery, 182*n*, 183–84, 195, 199 knowledge, theory of, 60–61, 171 known, unknown vs., 33
Krafft-Ebing, Richard von, 195

La Fontaine, Jean de, 55
Lambin, Denis, 245 language:
  artifice and, 136
  dominance of, 45 inquiry through, 43 of love, 65 schizophrenia and, 44 sexual roots in, 167–68 unconscious and, 32, 44–45
langue d'oc, 146, 162
Laocoon (Lessing), 297
Laplanche, Jean, 38, 65, 66, 95, 133, 137
Last Judgment, 313, 314
Lautréamont (Isidore Lucien Ducasse), 201 law:
  desire and, 82–84
  philosophy of, 105
Law, 188, 192–93
  desire and, 170
  Ding and, 83–84, 186
  function of, 177
  God as guarantor of, 194
  good and, 220–21
  interiorization of, 310
Lebensneid, 237
Lee, M., 106
Lefebvre, Henri, 155
Lefèvre-Pontalis, Jean-Bertrand, 38, 44, 46, 50
Lessing, Gotthold Ephraim, 297
Lévi-Strauss, Claude, 67, 68, 75, 143, 274, 282, 285, 287 libertine thought, 4, 79, 131, 215
libido, 298
  archaic forms of, 93–94 demand by, 91–92
  desexualization of, 102, 111 ego vs., 157
  object and, 94, 109, 144, 158
Libidoziel, 157 lies:
  paradox of, 73
  prohibition against, 81–82 logos, 6, 179
love:
  as analytical ideal, 8–9 in antiquity, 98–99 hate and, 309 language of, 65 of neighbor, 177–78, 179–90, 193–94, 196 philanthropy vs., 186 sublime, 259
  as sublimation of feminine object, 109, 112 see also courtly love
Love and the Myths of the Heart (Nelli), 148
Luke, Gospel of, 96
Lust-Ich, 101, 103
Lustprinzip, see pleasure principle

Lust/Unlust polarity, 58, 59, 72
Lustziele, 157
Luther, Martin, 92–93, 97, 122

Macaulay, Thomas Babington, 25
Mandeville, Bernard de, 69
Manicheism, 215
Map of Love (Carte du Tendre), 146
Marius (Pagnol), 69*n*
Mark, Gospel of, 96
Martin, Saint, 186, 226, 228
Marx, Harpo, 55
Marx, Karl, 206, 208–9, 225–26, 227
masochism:
  in economy of instincts, 14, 15 moral, 20
  nature of, 239–40
master, function of, 11–12, 23, 292, 315 master-fools, 182–83 masturbation, collective, 158 match box fable, 113–14
Matthew, Saint, 96, 133
"Me!," 56 mechanism, 29 méchant, 89 mediation, 133–34
melancholia, 89, 116 même, 198
Memoirs on the Great Days in Auvergne (Fléchier), 199 memory, 209, 223 of forgotten things, 231
  Niederschriften and, 50–51 unconscious discourse of, 236
  Vorstellung and, 58
Mencius, 312, 325
metamorphosis, 264–65 metaphor and metonymy, laws of, 61, 168
metipsemus, 198, 203
Mikailis, Karin, 116
Miller, Henry, 200, 233
Minne, see courtly love
Mirabeau, Honoré-Gabriel Riquetti, comte de, 4, 79 mirror function, 151 mise en scène, 252–53
Mittel, action as, 53 mobility, 49
Molière, 244
monogamy, 8, 105
monotheism, 172, 174 monotonous qualities, 42, 49 moods, causes of, 48, 59 moral action:
  definition of, 76
  as experience of satisfaction, 56 moral conscience:
  paradox of, 89
  sublimation as, 87
  superego as support for, 310 moral imperative, 20, 21 moralisches Entgegenkommen, 306 morality:
  anti-, 78
  desire and, 3, 5 genealogy of, 35–36
  origin of, 5, 143
  of power, 315
  see also ethics moral law, 71–84
  real and, 20, 76
  rejection of, 175, 176–77 Sade's reversal of, 78–79 ten commandments and, 80–83
  see also ethics
morbidity, transgression and, 2
Morin, André, 126
Moses, 142, 171, 173–74, 180
Moses and Monotheism (Freud), 90, 130, 142, 145, 171–72, 175, 181
mother, 143, 307
  incest with, 67–70
  mythic body of, 106, 111, 115, 117
Motorische Neuronen, 41, 59
"Mourning and Melancholia" (Freud), 307 murder:
  of Christ, 174
  of father, 2, 5, 143, 176–77, 180, 304
  prohibition against, 81 music, catharsis and, 245–46 mysticism, 149, 187
myth, function of, 143

narcissism, 37, 95, 98, 112, 151
nature, culture vs., 67–68, 77–78, 274 Navarre, Marguerite de, 131
ne, 64, 305–6
Nebenmensch, 39, 51, 76, 151
need, desire vs., 207, 225 negative therapeutic reaction, 313
Nelli, René, 124, 148
Netz der Triebe, 91, 92
neuronenwahl, 54
neuronic apparatus, 46–47, 57, 58
neurosis, 35
"Neutralisation and Sublimation" (Bernfeld), 159
Never on Sunday, 317–18
New Justine, The (Sade), 200
Newtonian physics, 76
Nicolas of Cuse, 75
Nicomachean Ethics, The (Aristotle), 5, 10, 23, 27, 36
Niederschriften, memory and, 50–51
Nietzsche, Friedrich, 35, 198
"No and Yes," 132–33
Nobel Prize, 201–2
No/Name, paternal (Nom-de-père), 65
No/Name of the Father (Nom-du-père), 65, 142, 181, 314 non-dependence, as psychoanalytic ideal, 10
Non-Thing, 136
Nostre-Dame, Michel de (Nostradamus), 145–46
Not des Lebens, 46, 48, 58

nudity, function of, 227 Numbers, 81
numen, 172

object, 53 bad, 73 change of, 293
  in collecting vs. psychoanalysis, 113 cultural loss of, 99
  Ding and, 101–14, 126
  elaborations on, 99
  good, 73
  idealization of, 100, 111
  libido and, 94, 109, 144, 158 narcissistic foundations of, 112 overevaluation of, 109 part, 202 pathological, 76 pleasure principle and, 58
  refound, 118
  sublimation of, 109–14
objectalité genitale, l', 293 objectification, 33 objective chance, 154 object relations, 98 obligation, sense of, 3, 315
obsessional neurosis, 54, 203
Oedipus at Colonus (Sophocles), 250, 257, 271, 272, 284–85
Oedipus complex, 244, 304, 307
Oedipus myth, 142, 181, 304–7, 313, 324
Oedipus Rex (Sophocles), 243, 271–72
On Love (Stendhal), 146
"On the Influence of Sexual Factors on the Origin and Development of Language" (Sperber), 163 operational thought, 104–5 organic defense, 73
orthopedics, 10
Other, 53, 152, 192–93, 202
  assault on image of, 195
  Até and, 277
  Ding as, 52, 71
  jouissance as accessible to, 237 man deprived of good by, 234 pain of, 80 self-discovery as Other of, 66
Ovid, 146, 153, 265

Pagnol, Marcel, 69*n*
pain:
  desire and, 80
  ethics and, 108
  limit of, 59–60 pleasure and/or, 189
  see also masochism
Palladio, Andrea, 136 Pan, 163, 178, 198 paranoia, 54, 129, 130 part object, 202 pastoral, domain of, 88–89
pathologisches Objekt, 76 patients, 1, 2
Paul, Saint, 83, 95, 97, 170, 177, 189
peccant humors, 244
Péguy, Charles, 103
Peirce, C. S., 91
penis:
  comparisons of size of, 158
  see also castration
perception, 41, 65 consciousness and, 49–51, 61, 74 hallucination and, 52–53 thought vs., 33
Perdu, Pierre, 148
Perret, Benjamin, 148 perspective, in art, 136, 140 perverse drive, 5
perversion, 109–10, 194–95, 232
Phaedrus (Plato), 257, 259, 268
phallus, fantasm of, 299, 301 Phenomenology of Mind, The (Hegel), 235 philanthropy, 196 love vs., 186
Philoctetes (Sophocles), 271, 272, 320
Philosophical Works (Marx), 208
Philosophy in the Boudoir (Sade), 78
Philosophy of Law (Hegel), 208 Phoenissae (Euripides), 264
physics:
  nature's integration and, 236
  Newtonian, 76
Picasso, Pablo, 118
Piéron, Henry, 47
Pignarre, Robert, 254 pity, see fear and pity Plato, 105, 141, 182, 216, 221, 257, 259, 260, 323 pleasure function, 11, 12, 13 pleasure principle (primary process), 52, 53, 239 Bahnung and, 36, 39, 41, 63, 137 beyond, 184, 188
  as dominance of signifier, 134 field of, 104
  function of, 27, 72, 119
  good and, 33–34, 36, 216, 221–22, 224–25
  pain and/or, 189 reality principle vs., 20–21, 25–26, 30–34, 35, 36–42, 43, 48, 74, 137, 225 as realm of drives, 96 regulation of, 55 satisfaction vs., 41 search for object governed by, 58
  signifier and, 137–38
  tragedy and, 246 transgression of, 109
  unconscious and, 48, 63
  Vorlust and, 152
  Vorstellung governed by, 57, 61, 63 will and, 125
Poetics (Aristotle), 244, 245 poetry:
  as childhood ego goal, 144–45, 157 of courtly love, 145–52, 161–63 metamorphosis in, 264–65 romantic vs. metaphysical, 24–25

Poitiers, Guillaume de, 148, 151–52 Politics (Aristotle), 245 pot fable, 120–21 potlatch, 235
preconscious:
conscious, unconscious and, 37, 61–62 language and, 45
reality principle and, 48
Prévert, Jacques, 114, 275
Primal Cavity, The (Spitz), 133 primary process, see pleasure principle primum vivere, 306, 309
Problem of Unbelief in the Sixteenth Century, The (Febvre), 131
Project for a Scientific Psychology (Freud), see Entwurf
Proudhon, Pierre Joseph, 82
Psychanalyse, La, 276 Psyche (Rohde), 250, 285 psychic reality, 21, 33, 43, 130
psychoanalysis:
"American way" of, 219 demand for happiness and, 291–301 as ethical order, 88 goal of, 4
good and, 218–19
as handed to women, 182 ideals of, 8–10
Kleinian school of, 73, 106–7, 111, 115–17 moral action and, 21–22 moral goals of, 302–10 as moralizing hustle, 312 and psychology of affects, 103 sublimation foregrounded by, 128 termination of, 300, 303–4 psychoanalysts:
desire of, 300–301
transference and, 291 psychology: of affects, 102–3 atomism and, 102 of collecting, 113–14, 117 dreams and, 62
moral agency promoted by, 57
Psychology for the Use of Neurologists (Freud), 26–27 Psychopathia Sexualis (Krafft-Ebing), 195 puberty, 156

Q quantity, 46
Qη quantity, 46–47
Qualitätszeichen, 47, 50, 52

Raised Curtain, The (Mirabeau), 79
Rauh, Fritz, 3
Ravel, Maurice, 115
Reaktionsbildung (reaction formation), 94–95, 156–57 real, 118, 223
art and, 141
definition of, 70
hole in, 121 man and, 11, 129 moral law and, 20, 76 of psychic organization, 101 as rational, 180
structuralization of, 75
unitarianism of, 173
Real-Ich, 101, 102 reality, weight of, 108 reality principle (secondary process):
Aufbau and, 40
Ding and, 45, 66
good and, 222, 224
paradox of, 46
pleasure principle vs., 20–21, 25–26, 30–34, 35, 36–42, 43, 48, 74, 137, 225 precariousness of, 30
rectification and, 28 subject isolated from reality by, 46 reason, weight of, 108 rectification, 28
reification, 132, 134
religion:
Ding displaced in, 131, 134
emptiness and, 130
Religionsschwärmereien, 84 repetition, principle of, 41 repetition compulsion, 222–23 represent, representation vs., 71–72 repression, 54, 293
paradox of, 64–5
signifier and, 44
sublimation and, 156
ten commandments as, 69
"Repression" ("Die Verdranung") (Freud), 44 Rhetoric (Aristotle), 255, 287 rites, 224, 258
Rohde, Erwin, 250, 251, 285 romanticism, 24–25
Rougemont, Denis de, 123, 149 sabbath, 81

Sache:
definition of, 45
Ding vs., 43–45, 62–63
Sacher-Masoch, Leopold von, 239
Sacy, Silvestre de, 68
Sade, Marquis de, 4, 70, 185, 207, 219, 220–21, 231, 233, 248, 260, 295, 316 ethics of, 78–80, 188, 191, 197, 199–203, 210–11, 212 Saint-Just, Louis Antoine Léon de, 292
saintliness, 322
Samuel, second Book of, 81
Sartre, Jean-Paul, 226
satisfaction:
moral action as experience of, 56
pleasure principle vs., 41

schizophrenia, language and, 44
Schlüsselneuronen, 41
Schopenhauer, Arthur, 104, 212 science, 77, 129 biblical roots of, 122
  Ding repudiated by, 131, 134 as structuralization of realty, 75 Unglauben and, 130
secondary process, see reality principle second death, 211, 248, 254, 260, 294–95 secretorisch, 59
self:
  etymology of, 198
  integration of, 209
Self-Tormentor, The (Terence), 89*n*
Senhal, 151
Sensations, The (Piéron), 47 sensory organs, as sieve, 47 sentiment, 79
Sermons (Luther), 92 service of goods, 303, 304, 305, 313–15, 318–19, 321, 324 se tailler, 168
sexuality, feminine, see feminine sexuality Shakespeare, William, 251, 265, 305
shame, 298
Sharpe, Ella, 106, 107, 139
Sicherung, 73, 83
Sigmund Freud's Mission (Fromm), 26
signifiers, 43, 301
  Adam and Eve and, 227
  as at beginning, 213–14 creation of, 119
  first system of, 65
  Freudian aesthetics and, 159
  function of, 153, 168, 295
  hysteria and, 205
  man as between real and, 129, 134, 236 omnipotence identified with, 234 pleasure principle and, 137–38
  power of, 236
  refound object and, 118–19 repression and, 44
  tools vs., 120, 123 unleashing of, 314
signs:
  definition of, 91
  man as, 75
  repetition of, 72–73
"Similar and Divergent Unconscious Determinants, which Subtend the Sublimations of Pure Art and Pure Science" (Sharpe), 107 sin, 84, 170, 177, 189 society:
  individual vs., 105, 110
  see also culture
Socrates, 22
Songs of Maldoror (Lautréamont), 201
Sophocles, 257, 258, 269, 271–72, 273, 284, 285, 304, 320 soul, 105, 316, 318 Sovereign Good, 97
  Aristotle and, 11, 22
  Freud's refutation of, 70, 95, 300
  Kant's detachment from, 77
Spaltung, 102, 171, 209 speech:
  as distance between subject and Ding, 69
  fantasms and, 80 and law and desire, 82
Sperber, Hans, 163–64, 167, 168
spezifische Aktion, 41, 53 Spinalneuronen, 40 state, 318
  function of, 105
Stendhal, 146, 183
Sterba, Richard, 111, 157
Stimmungen, 26
Story of Juliette, The (Sade), 197, 200, 202, 210, 220
Story of O, The (Réage), 202
subject, 204, 224
  and access to relationship to death, 295
  Ding as Other of, 52, 71 distance between Ding and, 69, 73, 105 first apprehension of reality by, 51 and isolation from reality, 46
  signifier and, 44
  Spaltung and, 102
sublimation, 85–164
  artistic reward and, 144–45
  collective, 99
  courtly love as, 128, 131, 136, 142, 160, 161–63, 215 creativity and, 106–7, 115–17, 238 death drive as, 212
  definition of, 144, 293
  Ding and, 95, 99, 115, 117, 126, 129, 131, 134, 158
  drives and, 110, 238
  emptiness in, 130
  ethics and, 107–8
  of feminine object, 109, 112 function of Father and, 181 importance of, 128
  jouissance and, 322 in Kleinian doctrine, 117 limits of, 91–92, 94 of object, 109–14
  as prohibition, 87 projection of, 203 reaction formation and, 156–57
  repression and, 156
  satisfaction of instinct and, 293
"Sublimation, Substitution and Social Anxiety" (Glover), 111 subsidence, 265–66
summum bonum, 160
superego, 6, 7, 37, 66, 143, 176, 194, 302, 307, 308, 310
Supreme-Being-in-evil, 215
Surrogate, 94

symbolic, 11, 12, 20 animals and, 45
  diabolic and, 92–93
  Ding and, 57
symbolism, of clothes, 226–28
synchrony, 66
  diachrony vs., 285

Table Talk (Luther), 92
Taoism, 123
Technical Writings (Freud), 234 temple, destruction of, 175
Temps Modernes, Les, 134 ten commandments, 66, 79–83, 173–74 as moral law, 80–83 as prohibitions, 68–69
Tête contre les Murs, La, 70*n*
"Theory Concerning Creation in the Free Arts, A" (Lee), 106 Theory of Fictions, The (Bentham), 228 Thing, see Ding
Thomas Aquinas, Saint, 221, 238, 249 thought, 213–14 individual and collectivity and, 94 operational, 104–5 perception vs., 33
  as unconscious, 48
  Vorstellung and, 61
Three Essays on the Theory of Sexuality (Freud), 88, 90, 94, 152, 156
Totem and Taboo (Freud), 5, 171, 180, 181, 309
Trachiniae, The (Sophocles), 271, 272 tragedy:
  action in, 250–52, 313 author-subject conflict in, 250–51
  centrality of, 243–44
  Chorus in, 252 heroic isolation in, 271, 272 mise en scène in, 252–53
  nature of, 244, 246, 247, 257–58
  subsidence in, 265–66 transcendental aesthetics, 77
transference, 291
transgression, 207 attraction of, 2 crime as, 260
  jouissance of, 177, 191–204 morbidity and, 2
  origin of, 6
  of pleasure principle, 109
  translator's choice of term, 1*n*
Traumdeutung (The Interpretation of Dreams) (Freud), 14, 27, 31, 37
Trieb, see drives Triebregung, 249
troubadours, trouvères, 145, 148, 149, 161–63 truth:
  blindness and, 310
  truth about, 184

Uberich, see superego
Uberschatzung, 109
Unbewusst, see unconscious Ubung, 51
unconscious:
  centrality of, 224
  conscious, preconscious and, 37, 61–62 ego as, 49
  as field of non-knowledge, 236–37 as function of the symbolic, 12
  incest and, 68
  language as structure of, 32, 44–45 and laws of metaphor and metonymy, 61 lies in, 73
  memorizing discourse of, 236 as memory of forgotten things, 231 negation in, 137
  pleasure principle and, 48, 63
  representation in, 71–72
  Wahrnehmungsbewusstsein and, 51
"Unconscious, The" (Freud), 44 Unglauben, 130–31 unknown, known vs., 33
unmasking, psychoanalysis as, 9, 10 utilitarian conversion, 11, 36 utilitarianism, 160, 187, 216, 228

vacuole, 150, 152
Vailland, Roger, 73
Valéry, Paul, 296*n* values, theory of, 14, 87
vase fable, 119–21, 122, 129, 168
Ventadour, Bernard de, 149
Verdrangung, 156
"Verdrängung, Die" ("Repression") (Freud), 44
vermeidet, 63–64
Verneinung, 64–65, 144
"Verneinung, Die" ("Denegration") (Freud), 37, 46, 52, 58
Versagen des Glaubens, 54
Verschiebbarkeit, 91, 92
Verwerfung, 65, 131
virtue:
  function of, 292
  science of, 10
vital needs, 46
Vorbewusstsein, see preconscious
Vorlesungen (Introductory Lectures on Psychoanalysis) (Freud), 7, 90, 91
Vorrat, 49, 51
Vorratskammer, 51
Vorstellung, 57–62, 63, 74, 91, 93, 137–38
Vorstellungsrepräsentanzen, 61, 71, 102, 103, 118, 137

Wahrnehmungsbewusstsein, 49–51, 61, 74
  definition of, 49–50
Walter, Robert, 144
Whitman, Walt, 93
Wieder zu finden, 58

will, 212, 259 general, 195
  good and bad, 104, 125
Wille, 104, 212
Wirklichkeit, 26, 29
Wohl, 72,76
women:
  in feudal society, 147
  "grenouille" term for, 227*n* psychoanalysis handed to, 182 see also courtly love; feminine sexuality
"word," in French vs. German, 55
Wordsworth, William, 24
Wortvorstellung, 44, 45, 49
Wunsch, 24, 31, 72

yin and yang, 223
"You," Ding and, 56

Zielablenkung, 144
Zur Einfuhrung des Narzissmus ("On Narcissism: An Introduction") (Freud), 95
"Zur Problematik der Sublimierungslehre" ("On the Problematic of the Doctrine of Sublimation") (Sterba), 111

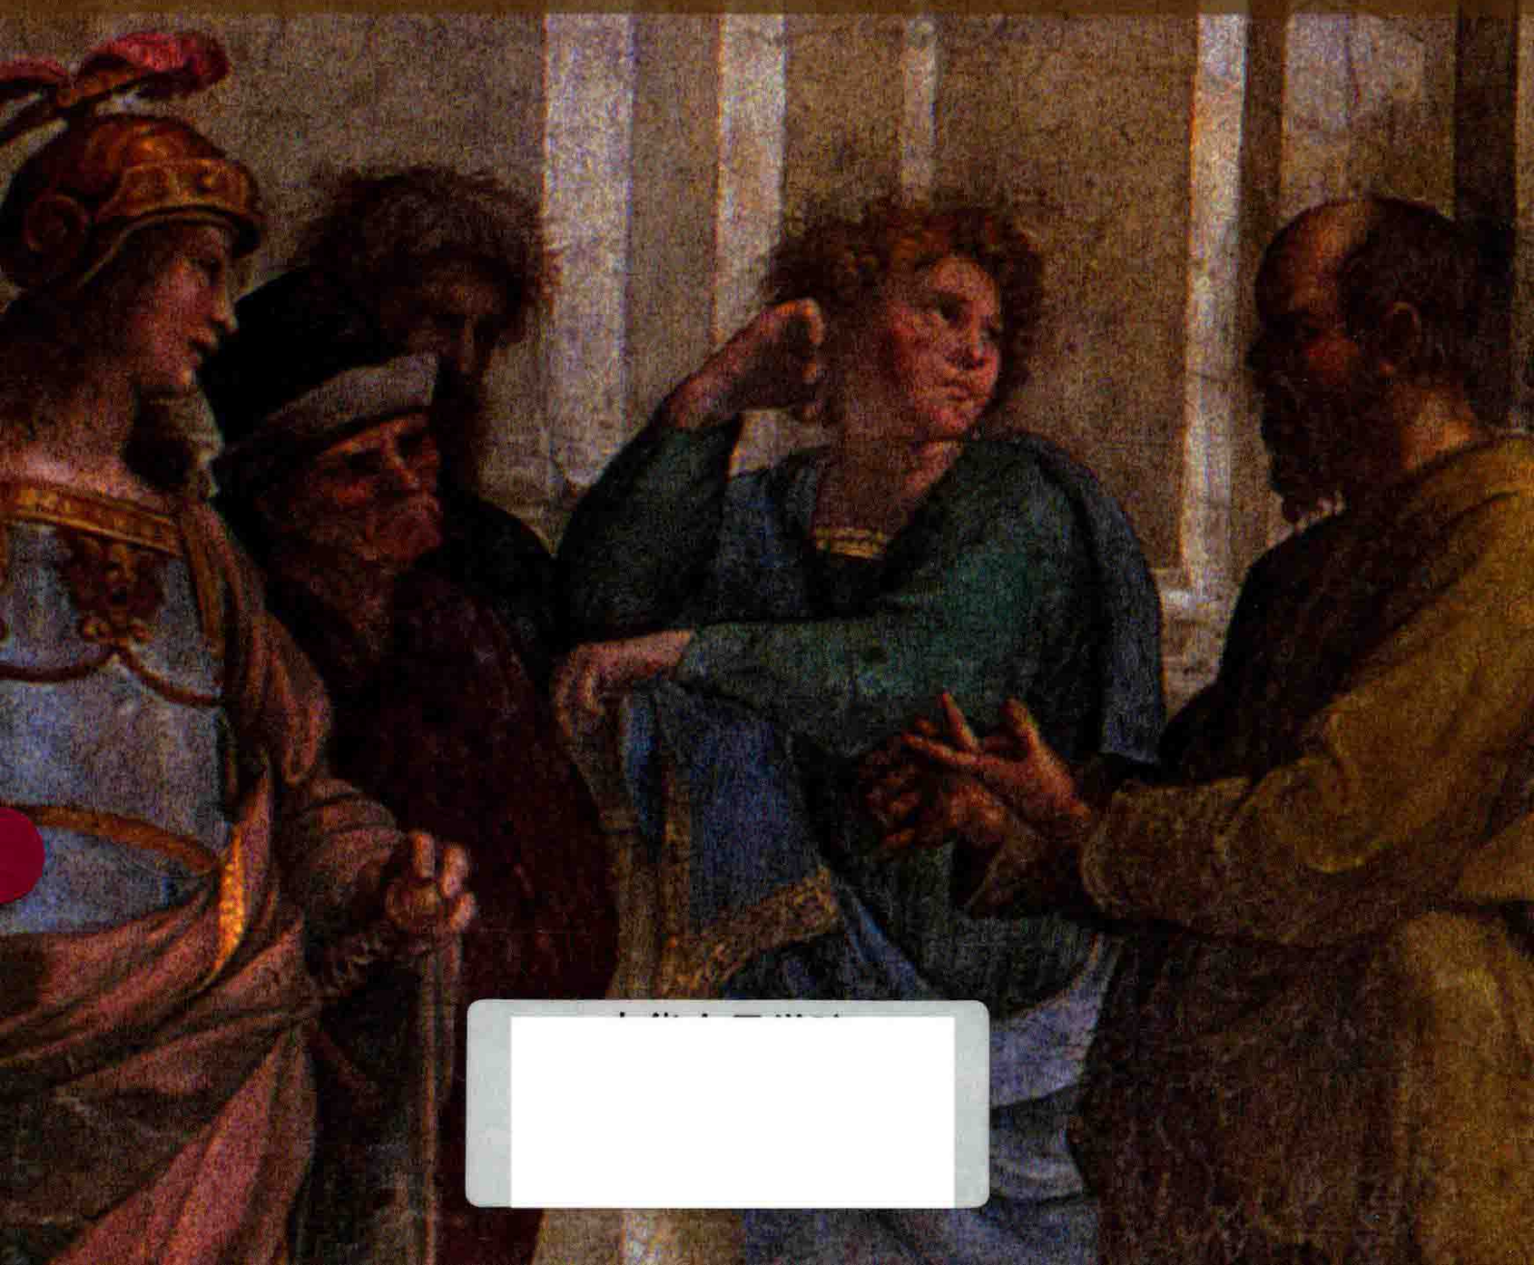
JACQUES LACAN

Transference

The Seminar of Jacques Lacan | Book VIII

Edited by Jacques-Alain Miller

Translated by Bruce Fink



"Alcibiades attempted to seduce Socrates, he wanted to make him, and in the most openly avowed way possible, into someone instrumental and subordinate to what? To the object of Alcibiades' desire – ágalma, the good object.

I would go even further. How can we analysts fail to recognize what is involved? He says quite clearly: Socrates has the good object in his stomach. Here Socrates is nothing but the envelope in which the object of desire is found.

It is in order to clearly emphasize that he is nothing but this envelope that Alcibiades tries to show that Socrates is desire's serf in his relations with Alcibiades, that Socrates is enslaved to Alcibiades by his desire. Although Alcibiades was aware that Socrates desired him, he wanted to see Socrates' desire manifest itself in a sign, in order to know that the other – the object, ágalma – was at his mercy.

Now, it is precisely because he failed in this undertaking that Alcibiades disgraces himself, and makes of his confession something that is so affectively laden. The daemon of Αἰδώς (Aidós), Shame, about which I spoke to you before in this context, is what intervenes here. This is what is violated. The most shocking secret is unveiled before everyone; the ultimate mainspring of desire, which in love relations must always be more or less dissimulated, is revealed – its aim is the fall of the Other, A, into the other, a."

Jacques Lacan

CNL
Centre national du livre

polity

www.politybooks.com

ISBN 978-0-7456-6039-4

Jacques Lacan

Transference

The Seminar of Jacques Lacan
Book VIII

Edited by Jacques-Alain Miller

Translated by Bruce Fink

polity

First published in French as Le Séminaire de Jacques Lacan, Livre VIII, Le transfert (c) Éditions du Seuil, 1991; revised edition published in 2001.

This English edition © Polity Press, 2015

Polity Press
65 Bridge Street
Cambridge CB2 1UR, UK

Polity Press
350 Main Street
Malden, MA 02148, USA

All rights reserved. Except for the quotation of short passages for the purpose of criticism and review, no part of this publication may be reproduced, stored in a retrieval system, or transmitted, in any form or by any means, electronic, mechanical, photocopying, recording or otherwise, without the prior permission of the publisher.

ISBN-13: 978-0-7456-6039-4

A catalogue record for this book is available from the British Library.

Library of Congress Cataloging-in-Publication Data

Lacan, Jacques, 1901-1981, author.
[Transfert, 1960-1961. English]
Transference / Jacques Lacan ; translated by Bruce Fink.
p. ; cm. -- (The seminar of Jacques Lacan ; bk. 8)
First published as Le transfert, 1960-1961 / Jacques Lacan. 2nd ed. corrected. 2001.
Includes bibliographical references and index.
ISBN 978-0-7456-6039-4 (hardcover : alk. paper) -- ISBN 0-7456-6039-8 (hardcover : alk. paper)
I. Fink, Bruce, 1956- , translator. II. Title. III. Series: Lacan, Jacques, 1901-1981. Séminaire de Jacques Lacan. English ; bk. 8.
[DNLM: 1. Transference (Psychology)--Lectures. WM 460 L129s 2015a]
RC506
616.89'17--dc23

2014047150

Typeset in 10.5 on 12 pt Times NR MT by Servis Filmsetting Ltd, Stockport, Cheshire Printed and bound in the UK by CPI Group (UK) Ltd, Croydon, CR0 4YY

The publisher has used its best endeavours to ensure that the URLs for external websites referred to in this book are correct and active at the time of going to press. However, the publisher has no responsibility for the websites and can make no guarantee that a site will remain live or that the content is or will remain appropriate.

Every effort has been made to trace all copyright holders, but if any have been inadvertently overlooked the publisher will be pleased to include any necessary credits in any subsequent reprint or edition.

For further information on Polity, visit our website: www.politybooks.com

Transference

Translator's Note

All quotations from Plato's Symposium are from the excellent rendition by Alexander Nehamas and Paul Woodruff in Plato on Love: Lysis, Symposium, Phaedrus, Alcibiades, with Selections from Republic and Laws, edited by C. D. C. Reeve (Indianapolis, IN, and Cambridge, England: Hackett Publishing Company, 2006). Since Lacan sometimes quotes from Léon Robin's translation into French, and sometimes provides his own rendition or paraphrasing, I do not always supply the exact translation found in Plato on Love, adapting it instead to fit what Lacan seems to me to be trying to convey. Indeed, it is not always easy to know when Lacan is providing his own rendition of the Greek and when he is putting words in a character's mouth that correspond to his own interpretation of the import of that character's speech.

I have relied for the Greek on the Loeb Classical Library edition (Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 1983) and on the Greek spellings and transliterations provided by Rachel Rue, Ph.D., who was kind enough to scour the manuscript for me.

All references here to Lacan's Écrits (Paris: Seuil, 1966) are to the French pagination included in the margins of Écrits: The First Complete Edition in English (New York and London: W. W. Norton & Co., 2006), translated by B. Fink in collaboration with R. Grigg and H. Fink. When I refer to Lacan's seminars, I provide the pagination of the French editions, followed – after a slash – by the page number in the English editions (published by Norton), when they exist; in the case of Seminar III, I give only the French page numbers, as they are included in the margins of the English edition. All but one of the extant seminars in French were published by Éditions du Seuil in Paris. Le séminaire, Livre VI: Le désir et son interprétation (1958–1959) [The Seminar, Book VI: Desire and Its Interpretation], was published in 2013 by La Martinière in Paris.

References to Freud's work here are always to The Standard

Edition of the Complete Psychological Works of Sigmund Freud (24 volumes), published in London by the Hogarth Press, abbreviated here as SE, followed by the volume number and page(s).

Note that throughout this Seminar I have translated l'analysé as "the analysand" (instead of as the more cumbersome "person analyzed"), even though Lacan had not yet begun to use l'analysant here.

Le réel means both reality and the real (Lacan defining the latter in opposition to the imaginary and the symbolic). It is not always clear which is intended at which point in his work, so whenever I translate le réel as "reality" instead of as "the real," I include the French in brackets.

Despite assistance from Rachel Rue, from my wife, Héloïse Fink, and from Russell Grigg and Dan Collins, numerous errors no doubt remain here. Lacan's incredibly broad background and in-depth knowledge of numerous fields are such that I have surely misunderstood specialized terminology, overlooked references to specific authors, and just generally misinterpreted the French – Lord knows it is easy enough to do given Lacan's singular style! His oral work presents additional problems, given the number of homophonies French allows for; I have attempted to address some of these (along with alternative readings and translations, as well as likely sources of Lacan's discussions) in my endnotes. The latter are keyed to the pagination of the present English edition. Numbers found in the margins here correspond to the pagination of the 2001 French edition.

Readers who believe they have found mistakes of whatever kind are encouraged to send comments to me at <brucefinkanalyst@gmail.com>. I consider this translation to be, like my others (for which updates can be found in the form of PDFs at <http://brucefink.com/bruce-fink-library/>), a work in progress, and hope to improve on the text here in future editions.

Abbreviations Used in the Text and Notes

Écrits	Écrits: The First Complete Edition in English
GW	Gesammelte Werke by Sigmund Freud (Frankfurt am Main: S. Fischer Verlag)
IJP	International Journal of Psychoanalysis
IPA	International Psychoanalytical Association
PQ	Psychoanalytic Quarterly
PUF	Presses Universitaires de France
RFP	Revue Française de Psychanalyse
SE	Standard Edition of the Complete Psychological Works of Sigmund Freud

Words followed by an asterisk (*) are found in English in the original.

Book VIII

Transference

1960–1961

Contents

Translator's Note vii
Abbreviations ix

INTRODUCTION

I. In the Beginning Was Love 3

THE MAINSPRING OF LOVE
A COMMENTARY ON PLATO'S SYMPOSIUM

II. Set and Characters 19
III. The Metaphor of Love: Phaedrus 36
IV. The Psychology of the Rich: Pausanias 50
V. Medical Harmony: Eryximachus 64
VI. Deriding the Sphere: Aristophanes 77
VII. The Atopia of Eros: Agathon 95
VIII. From Epistéme to Mýthous 110
IX. Exit from the Ultra-World 124
X. Ágalma 135
XI. Between Socrates and Alcibiades 149

THE OBJECT OF DESIRE AND THE DIALECTIC OF CASTRATION

XII. Transference in the Present 167
XIII. A Critique of Countertransference 180
XIV. Demand and Desire in the Oral and Anal Stages 196
XV. Oral, Anal, and Genital 209
XVI. Psyche and the Castration Complex 220
XVII. The Symbol Φ 234
XVIII. Real Presence 248

THE OEDIPAL MYTH TODAY
A Commentary on the Coûfontaine Trilogy by Paul Claudel

XIX.	Sygne's No	265
XX.	Turelure's Abjection	280
XXI.	Pensée's Desire	297
XXII.	Structural Decomposition	312

CAPITAL I AND LITTLE a

XXIII.	Slippage in the Meaning of the Ideal	329
XXIV.	Identification via "ein einziger Zug"	344
XXV.	The Relationship between Anxiety and Desire	360
XXVI.	"A Dream of a Shadow Is Man"	372
XXVII.	Mourning the Loss of the Analyst	385

Translator's Endnotes	399
Editor's Notes	432
Index	435

INTRODUCTION

I

IN THE BEGINNING WAS LOVE

Plato's Schwärmerei.
Socrates and Freud.
A critique of intersubjectivity.
The beauty of bodies.

I announced that this year I would discuss transference "in its subjective disparity, its supposed situation, and its excursions into the realm of technique."

"Disparity" is not a term I chose lightly. It essentially highlights the fact that transference involves much more than the simple notion of a dissymmetry between subjects. Right from the outset, "disparity" implies that I reject the idea that intersubjectivity alone can furnish the framework within which the phenomenon of transference is situated. Different languages offer more or less apt words with which to express the kind of disparity I have in mind. I have been trying to find something equivalent to the word "odd"* to qualify the essentially uneven [impair] nature of transference. There is no term in French with which to designate it, apart from imparité, which is not currently in use.

"Its supposed situation," my title continues, referring thereby to the attempt that has been made in recent years in analysis to organize what takes place during treatment around the notion of situations. "Supposed" is included there to alert you to the fact that I do not endorse this attempt, or at least that I propose to correct it. I do not think one can purely and simply say of analysis that it constitutes a situation. If it is a situation, then it is a situation that can also be said not to be a situation, or again that it is a rather artificial [fausse] situation.

As for "technique," everything that is proffered on that score must be viewed in relation to the principles, or at least to the search for principles, already evoked by my title, with its allusion to differences in approach. To put it in a nutshell, a correct topology is required here and, consequently, a rectification of what is commonly implied 12 by our everyday use of the theoretical notion of transference. The goal is to relate this notion to an experience. We are, however, extremely familiar with this experience, at least insofar as each of us has practiced analysis in one form or another.

It has taken me a long time to come to this crux of our experience. Depending on when one takes this seminar – in which I have been guiding a number of you for some years – to have begun, it is in either its eighth or tenth year that I am finally broaching transference. You will see that this long delay was not accidental.

Let us thus begin.

1

"In the beginning –"

You all immediately infer that I am paraphrasing the sentence, "In the beginning was the Word" [John 1:1].

"Im Anfang war die Tat," says another.

A third sustains that first – that is, at the beginning of the human world – there was praxis.

This gives us three apparently incompatible statements. But, in fact, from the perspective of analytic practice [expérience], what counts is not their value as statements but rather their value as enunciations or announcements – that is, the respect in which they bring out the ex nihilo character of all creation and demonstrate its intimate connection with the evocative power of speech. In this respect, all three obviously prove to come under the first statement, "In the beginning was the Word."

I am mentioning this so as to distinguish it from what I am saying, and from the point from which I am setting out to grapple with this most opaque term, this core of our experience: transference.

I intend to start, I would like to start, I will try to start today – beginning with all the necessary clumsiness – with the fact that the term "in the beginning" certainly has another meaning in psychoanalysis.

In the beginning of analytic practice was, let us recall, love. This beginning was not akin to the self-transparency of enunciation that 13 gave meaning to the three sentences mentioned before. It was a dense, jumbled [confus] beginning. A beginning not of creation but rather of training. I will come later to the historic moment at which, in the encounter between a man and a woman, Josef Breuer and Anna O., recounted in the inaugural case of the Studies on Hysteria, what was already a form of psychoanalysis emerged – Anna herself named it the "talking cure,"* referring to it also as "chimney sweeping."*

Before coming to that, I want to familiarize those of you who weren't here last year with some of the terms around which our exploration of what I called the ethics of psychoanalysis revolved.

Last year I endeavored to explain to you – to refer back to the word "creation" I mentioned a moment ago – the creationist structure of the human ethos as such, that is, the ex nihilo that subsists at its core, constituting "the core of our being," to borrow Freud's expression (Kern unseres Wesen). I wanted to show that this ethos wraps around the ex nihilo as subsisting in an impenetrable void.

To broach the subject, and to designate this characteristic of impenetrability, I began, as you may remember, with a critique whose aim it was to explicitly reject what you will allow me – or at least those of you who were here will allow me – to call Plato's Schwärmerei.

For those of you who don't know it, in German Schwärmerei means daydream or fantasy involving some enthusiasm, especially related to superstition. In short, it implies a negative assessment [of superstition] that was made at a later date from the perspective of a religious orientation. The word Schwärmerei is clearly inflected in this way in Kant's texts. Well, Plato's Schwärmerei consists in having projected the idea of the Sovereign Good onto the impenetrable void.

Such is the path that, with more or less success of course, I deliberately tried to trace out: what happens to us when we reject Plato's notion of the Sovereign Good as occupying the center of our being?

In order to relate that discussion to our practice, I naturally proceeded, with a critical aim, on the basis of what might be called Aristotle's conversion from Platonism. Aristotle is indubitably outmoded as far as ethics is concerned, but from our temporal vantage point, where we are obliged to show the historical fate of 14 ethical notions starting from Plato, it is clearly essential to refer to Aristotle.

In tracing what Aristotle's Nicomachean Ethics provides by way of a decisive step in the construction of ethical reflection, it is difficult not to see that, while Aristotle maintains the notion of the Sovereign Good, he profoundly changes its meaning. Through an inverse reflective shift, he turns the Sovereign Good into contemplation of the stars, the world's outermost sphere. And it is precisely because this sphere – which to Aristotle was an absolute, uncreated, and incorruptible entity – has been decisively exploded in our time into a shimmering expanse of galaxies, the last word in our cosmological investigations, that Aristotle can be taken as a crucial reference point for the notion of the Sovereign Good in Antiquity.

We were led into a tight spot by his step, the same tight spot as countless others who have attempted to take ethical reflection further. We had to either accept or reject what ethical reflection or thought has never been able to shake off – namely, that there is no good, bon, Gute, or pleasure that is not based on the Good [Bien]. It was up to us to seek the principle of Wohltat, right action [bien agir], and what it implies allows us to say that it is perhaps not simply good deeds, even if they are raised to the Kantian power of a universal maxim.

If we are to take seriously the fallacy of so-called moral satisfactions that Freud pointed out, insofar as an aggressiveness lurks within them that succeeds in stealing from he who carries out such deeds his own jouissance, while his misdeeds [méfait] have endless repercussions on his social partners – what these long conditionals and circumstantials indicate is the exact equivalent of Civilization and Its Discontents in Freud's work – we must ask ourselves by what means we are to honestly handle desire. In other words, how are we to keep desire in our deeds – that is, to preserve the relationship between desire and action? In action, desire ordinarily achieves its demise [collapsus] rather than its fulfillment, and, at best, a deed presents desire with its mere feat, its epic, heroic exploit [geste]. How, I ask, are we to maintain what might be called a simple or salubrious relationship between desire and action?

Let's not mince words about the meaning of "salubrious" in the context of Freudian practice. It means unburdened, as unburdened as possible of the infection that, to my mind – but not to mine alone, to everyone's from the moment they begin to engage in ethical reflection – is the seething ground [fond grouillant] of every social institution as such.

This assumes, of course, that psychoanalysis, in its very user's guide, does not respect the opaque spot [taie], newly invented cataract, moral wound [plaie], or form of blindness constituted by a certain practice deriving from the so-called sociological point of view. I could recount here what a recent meeting showed me about the vacuity and scandalousness to which sociological research leads – research that claims to reduce an experience like that of the unconscious to two, three, or maybe four sociological models – but my irritation, which was very great at the time, has subsided, and I will leave the authors of such exercises in futility to the truisms that will welcome them with open arms.

I should point out that in speaking of sociology in such terms, I am obviously not referring to the level at which Lévi-Strauss' thought is situated – I refer you to his inaugural lecture at the Collège de France – for he explicitly engages in an ethical meditation on social practice. His twofold reference to a cultural norm on the one hand, that is more or less mythically situated in the Neolithic era, and to Rousseau's political meditations on the other, is sufficiently indicative here. But let us set this aside – it is of no concern to us in the present context.

I will merely recall here that it was by examining Sade's savage reflections regarding ethics, and by following the insulting paths of Sadean jouissance, that I showed you one of the possible means of access to the properly tragic frontier where Freud's Oberland [highland] lies. It is at the heart of what some of you dubbed the "between-two-deaths" – a perfect expression for designating the field in which everything that happens in the universe traced out by Sophocles is articulated, and not just in the adventure of Oedipus Rex – that a phenomenon is situated about which I think I can safely say that we have introduced a guidepost in the ethical tradition, that is, in reflection on motives and motivations for doing the Good. I designated this guidepost as beauty insofar as it dresses up – or rather functions as a final barrier to access to – the final or mortal thing, at the point where Freud's thought made its ultimate admission with the term "death drive."

Please excuse this long detour. It was but a short summary by which I thought I should outline what we stated last year. This detour was necessary to remind you where we left off concerning the 16 function of beauty, as it will be a springboard for what I will have to say this year. Indeed I need not, for most of you, mention what is constituted by the term "the beautiful" or "beauty" as it is inflected in what I called Plato's Schwärmerei.

As a hypothesis, we are provisionally going to assume that the latter constitutes – at the level of an adventure that, if it is not psychological, is at least individual – the effect of a form of mourning that we can qualify as immortal, because it is at the very source of everything that has been articulated since then in our tradition concerning the idea of immortality: the immortal mourning for he who accepted the wager of sustaining his question, the same question raised by everyone who speaks, so much so that he received this question from his own daemon in an inverted form, to use our own expression. I am talking about Socrates, Socrates thus placed at the origin – and why not say so right away? – of the longest transference, giving this expression its fullest import, that history has ever known.

I hope to get you to sense this – Socrates' secret will be behind everything I will have to say about transference this year.

2

This secret was admitted to by Socrates. But it is not because one admits to having a secret that it stops being a secret. Socrates claims to know nothing, except how to recognize what love is, how to infallibly recognize, he tells us – I am referring to Plato's account in the Lysis, 204c – when he meets a couple, who is the lover and who is the beloved.

Socrates often refers to love and this brings us back to our point of departure, as I intend to highlight it today. Indeed, however prudish or improper it was to keep partially veiled the inaugural incident that dissuaded the eminent Breuer from following through on his first sensational experiment with the talking cure,* it is clear that it 17 was a love story. It is equally clear that it was not unrequited – in other words, love was not felt solely by the patient.

It is not enough to say, in the exquisitely measured terms of our vocabulary, as Ernest Jones does in the first volume of his biography of Freud, that Breuer must have fallen prey to what we call a somewhat pronounced countertransference. It is clear that Breuer loved his patient. By way of proof, we need no more evidence than what, in such cases, is the true bourgeois outcome: the return to renewed conjugal fervor and the abrupt departure for Venice, which even bore fruit in the form of a new daughter being added to the family – Jones sadly tells us that her death was tied to the catastrophic invasion of Vienna by the Nazis.

There is no point ironizing about such incidents, except, of course, insofar as they present what is typical of certain so-called bourgeois ways of dealing with love. They reveal the need for or necessity of an awakening regarding the neglect of the heart that goes together so well with the kind of abnegation characteristic of bourgeois duty.

But this is not what is essential here. What difference does it make whether Breuer resisted or not? What we should instead celebrate about that moment is that it foreshadowed the break between Freud and Breuer 10 years before it occurred. The latter's work with Anna O. took place in 1882, and it took 10 years for Freud's experience to result in the Studies on Hysteria, written with Breuer, and 15 years for them to go their separate ways. It's all there. Little Eros, whose mischievousness struck the one like a bolt from the blue and forced him to take flight, found his master in the other, Freud. Why?

I could say – if you'll allow me to strike a lighter note for a moment – that it was because all possibility of retreat had been cut off for Freud. This fact arises from the same context as the one we know of now that his correspondence with his fiancée has been published – the intransigent love he espoused. He would meet ideal women, who responded to him physically like porcupines, Sie streben dagegen, he wrote in the dream of Irma's injection, where the allusions to his own wife are neither obvious nor admitted to – "they always rub me the wrong way." The Frau Professor [the Professor's wife] appeared in every case as an element of the permanent picture Freud provided us with of his thirst, and she was occasionally a 18 source of marvel to Jones who, if my informants are to be trusted, himself knew what it meant to be submissive.

This would constitute a curious common denominator between Freud and Socrates, Socrates having had, as you know, dealings at home with an unmanageable shrew. The difference between the two, insofar as it was palpable, is that outlined by Aristophanes between the pompous otter and the Lysistrata-like weasel [belette] whose powerful bite can be sensed in the dialogues in his plays – a simple difference in odor.

But enough on this topic. I reckon that it is but a secondary connection, and that this datum concerning married life is in no way indispensable, each of you should be reassured, to your proper conduct. We must look further to approach the mystery in question.

The approach adopted by Freud – unlike Breuer, and regardless of the reasons why – made him master of the fearsome little god, Eros. Like Socrates, Freud chose to serve the god in order to make use of him. It is in this "making use of" Eros – which nevertheless had to be emphasized – that our problems begin. Making use of him for what?

This is why I had to remind you of the mile markers of our work last year – making use of Eros for the Good? We know that the realm of Eros goes infinitely beyond any field the Good can cover. At the very least, we take it for granted and this is why the problems posed by transference merely begin here. It is, moreover, something that is ever fresh in my mind. It is in yours too, inasmuch as people commonly say concerning transference that you must in no way, whether premeditated or permanent, posit as the primary aim of your action your patient's own good – supposed or otherwise – but rather his eros.

I don't think I should pass up the opportunity to remind you once again here of what the Socratic and Freudian endeavors – at their most scabrous – have in common. I will do so by pointing to the similarity of their outcomes via the duplicity of the terms in the following condensed expression: Socrates, too, chose to serve Eros in order to make use of him [pour s'en servir], to serve Eros in using him [en s'en servant]. Note that it took Socrates quite far – to a far-off place that people strive to camouflage by turning it into a pure and simple accident of what I earlier called the seething ground of the social infection. But wouldn't we be doing Socrates an injustice – 19 tantamount to refusing to accept his viewpoint – were we to believe that he didn't know full well that he was going against the tide of the whole social order within which his daily practice was situated? Wasn't his behavior truly insane and scandalous, despite the praiseworthy light his disciples devotedly cast on it by emphasizing its heroic facets? It is clear that they could not but record a major characteristic of Socrates, that Plato himself qualified with a term that has remained famous to those who have taken up the problem of Socrates: his ἀτοπία (atopía) within the order of the city.

In the social bond, opinions have no place if they are not borne out by all that ensures the city's equilibrium, and thus Socrates not only did not have his place – he was no place. What is so surprising if an act that is so powerfully unclassifiable that its aftershocks are still felt in our own times, and that has found a place – what is so surprising about the fact that it resulted in a death sentence? It resulted, in the clearest fashion possible, in real death, inflicted at a time chosen in advance, with everyone's consent and for the good of all. And, indeed, writers in the centuries that have since passed have never been able to decide whether the sanction was just or unjust. Where will Socrates' fate – a fate that can, without exaggerating, it seems to me, be considered necessary, not extraordinary – take him now?

As for Freud, on the other hand, wasn't it in strict accordance with the rigor of his path that he discovered the death drive? It too was quite scandalous, albeit less costly to Freud himself. But does this amount to a true difference?

Formal logic has been repeating for centuries, and its insistence is not unfounded, that Socrates is mortal and thus that he, in any case, had to die sooner or later. But it is not the fact that Freud died peacefully in his bed that concerns us here. Last year, I endeavored to show you how what I sketched out converges with Sadean aspirations. The idea of eternal death must be distinguished here from death insofar as it makes being itself into a detour – we being unable to know whether or not it makes sense. The idea of eternal death must be distinguished from the other death as well, the second, that of the body, the body that uncompromisingly obeys Eros. Eros is that by which bodies come back together, according to Plato into a single soul, according to Freud with no soul at all, but in any case into but one – Eros is what unites unitively.

20 You could, of course, interrupt me here by asking, "Where are you leading us?" "Eros," you will grant me, "is clearly the same in both cases, even if we can't bear it. But why are you trotting out the two deaths – last year's old hat? Are you still mulling it over? And what are you trying to convey with it?" The river that separates them. "Are we dealing with the death drive or dialectic?" My answer is, "Yes." Yes, if the one brings the other with it and astonishes you.

I am willing to admit that I'm getting off track, that I need not take you through all the most far-reaching paradoxes, and that by doing so at the outset, I am making sure you are astonished – if you weren't already – by Freud if not by Socrates.

If you are unwilling to be astonished by anything, these paradoxes will undoubtedly prove simple to resolve. You merely take as your point of departure something as easy as pie, as clear as day: intersubjectivity. I intersubjectivize you, you intersubjectivize me by my chinny chin chin – the first one who laughs will get a well-deserved slap.

Doesn't everyone know by now that Freud mistakenly thought that was all there was in the sadomasochist constant? Narcissism supposedly explained everything. And people ask me, "Didn't you yourself almost endorse the same view?" It should be said that at the time I was already restive regarding the function of the narcissistic wound, but that's of no importance. People will tell me that my untimely Socrates should also have come back to [the notion of] intersubjectivity. In all, he committed but one mistake, and that was to swim against the tide of the masses, which should always be our guide. Everyone knows that one has to wait for the masses before making the slightest wave on the shore of justice, for they will necessarily arrive there tomorrow. This is how astonishment works – things get chalked up to wrongdoing [faute]. Errors will never be anything other than errors of judgment.

That's that, without counting my personal motives – my ever-present need to exaggerate, related to my inclination to make things sound good [faire beau], beauty showing up here again. It's a perverse tendency. Thus my sophistry may be superfluous. So we'll begin again by starting from scratch, and I will take up anew – coming back down to earth – the power of understatement to aim without your being even slightly astonished.

3 21

Isn't intersubjectivity what is most foreign to the analytic encounter? Would it resurface if we were to flee from it, convinced that it must be avoided? Freudian practice congeals as soon as intersubjectivity appears on the scene. The former flourishes only in the latter's absence.

Are the doctor and the patient, as they say in talking about us – that doozy of a relationship people get all worked up about – going to outdo each other at intersubjectivizing each other? Perhaps, but in this case it can be said that both are rather uneasy. "He's telling me that to reassure me or make me happy," thinks the one. "Is he trying to pull a fast one on me?" thinks the other. Dick and Jane relationships get off to a bad start if they start out on this footing. They are doomed, if they stay at this level, to go nowhere. Which is why doctor/patient and Dick and Jane relationships must at all costs differ from diplomatic negotiations and ambushes.

With all due respect to Henri Lefebvre, what is known as poker, theory as poker, is not discussed in von Neumann's work, despite what Lefebvre has recently claimed. This means that, owing to my benevolence, I can deduce but one thing: Lefebvre knows nothing more of von Neumann's theory than the title of the latter's book that appears in the Hermann publishing house catalogue. It is true that, at the same time, Lefebvre situates the very philosophical discussion that held us in thrall at the level of poker. If he is not within his rights to do so, I can, after all, but wish him all the credit that comes from having done so.

Returning to the thoughts of our intersubjective couple, my first concern as an analyst would be not to get myself into a situation where my patient would have to confide such reflections to me. The simplest way to spare him that is precisely to avoid any attitude which would incline him to accuse me of attempting to reassure him, much less seduce him. Even if I try to absolutely avoid any such attitude, it could happen that I let something slip out anyway – if, for example, I see the patient, at the end of his rope, adopt a certain attitude. Even in this case, I can only say something about it if I stress that I assume that he is doing so unbeknown to himself. And even then I have to be cautious in order to avoid a misunderstanding – 22 namely, seeming to accuse him of some kind of trickery [finasserie], whether calculated or not.

I am not saying that it is the job of analysis to rework intersubjectivity in such a way as to raise it to a second power – as if the analyst were expecting the patient to impale himself [s'enferrer] so that the analyst could then roast him on the spit [le tourner]. No, intersubjectivity is withheld or, better still, put off indefinitely to allow another handhold [prise] to appear, whose essential characteristic is that it is transference itself.

The patient himself knows it; he calls for it; he wants to be found out elsewhere. You may retort that this is another aspect of intersubjectivity and that I, strangely enough, am supposedly the one who paved the way here. But whoever introduced the idea, it can only be attributed to me mistakenly.

And in fact, if I hadn't formalized the subjective alterities involved in the analytic setting in the guise of bridge players, no one could have claimed I took a step that converges with the falsely audacious schema Rickman once proffered that goes by the name of "two-body psychology."*

Such creations always have a certain modicum of success, given the state of amphibious respiration in which analytic thought maintains itself. Two conditions suffice for their success. First, that they be supposed to stem from honorable zones of scientific activity, whereby psychoanalysis can be made to seem relevant and shine anew – for what is relevant today quickly loses its luster. This is the case here, for Rickman was a man who, just after the war, had the advantageous aura of having been involved in the Russian Revolution, which was supposed to have given him plenty of experience in interpsychology. The second condition for success is not to rock the boat of analytic routine. This is how people repave a path for intellectual guidance that leads nowhere.

The name "two-body psychology"* could at least have had the virtue of awakening us to how the attraction of bodies it evokes might relate to the supposed analytic situation. But, curiously enough, the attraction of bodies is the very meaning that is elided when people use the term.

It is odd that we are obliged to turn to Socrates to realize its import. In Socrates' discourse, I mean in the dialogues in which he is made to speak, he refers constantly to the beauty of bodies. It 23 animates, so to speak, the moment of questioning we haven't taken up yet where we still don't even know how the functions of the lover and the beloved are divided up. At least a spade is called a spade there, which allows us to make, in this regard, some useful remarks.

If something in the impassioned questioning that characterizes the beginning of the dialectical process is, in fact, related to the body, it must be stated that, in analysis, this relationship is highlighted by traits whose value derives from its particularly negative impact. Socrates' ugliness gives us the most noble example of the fact that analysts – I hope that no one here will feel that I am singling him out – aren't well known for their physical charms. But at the same time it also reminds us that ugliness in no way constitutes an obstacle to love. I must nevertheless stress the fact that the ideal physical appearance of the psychoanalyst – or, in any case, the way in which the analyst is pictured in the popular mind – also includes an obtuse denseness and a narrow-minded brutishness that truly raise the whole question of prestige.

The silver screen is the most revealing medium in this regard. To refer only to Hitchcock's most recent film [Psycho], consider in what form the unscrambler of enigmas appears, the one who is presented there as deciding irrevocably at the end when there is no longer any other recourse. Quite frankly, he is endowed with all the features of the untouchable.

We touch here on an essential element of the convention as it concerns the analytic setting. In order for it to be violated in a way that is not revolting, the person who plays the role of analyst – sticking with film, consider here the movie Suddenly Last Summer – the therapist, he who pushes caritas [charity] to the point of kissing back an unfortunate woman who kisses him on the lips, must be a good-looking guy. In film, this is absolutely essential. True, he is also a neurosurgeon and he is promptly sent back to his trephines. The situation couldn't last.

Overall, analysis is the only praxis in which charm is a disadvantage. It would break the spell [charme]. Who ever heard of a charming analyst?

24 These are not irrelevant remarks, even though they may seem designed to amuse you. It is important for them to be made at the appropriate stage. It is no less notable that in guiding the patient, the very access to the body that medical examination seems to require is forgone, as a rule. This is worth pointing out. And we cannot explain why it is forgone simply by saying that it is in order to avoid excessive transferential effects. Why would such effects be any more excessive in this realm than in others? It is not due to anachronistic prudishness, traces of which subsist in rural areas, in Islamic harems, and in Portugal where, incredibly enough, doctors auscultate beautiful foreigners only through their clothing. We up the ante. Auscultation, however necessary it may seem at the outset of treatment or may be in the course of it, constitutes a breaking of the rules.

Let us look at things from a different angle. There is nothing less erotic than the reading of the body's momentary states at which certain psychoanalysts excel, for one might say that these bodily states are translated into signifying terms. The focal distance at which this reading can occur demands on the analyst's part as much aversion as interest.

Let us not too quickly decide what all of this means.

One could say that the neutralization of the body, which seems, after all, to be the first goal of civilization, is related here to a greater urgency, and that all these precautions assume that the body can be abandoned. I'm not sure about that. Here I am simply asking what this bracketing [epoché] is. It would show poor judgment on our part if we were not to recognize at the outset that psychoanalysis requires, right from the beginning, a high degree of libidinal sublimation at the level of collective relations. The extreme decency that one can truly claim to be maintained in the majority of cases in the analytic relationship makes us think that, if the regular confinement of the two interested parties in an enclosed space sheltered from all uninvited interruption only very rarely leads to bodily coercion [contrainte par corps] of one by the other, it is because the temptation to which this kind of confinement would give rise in any other occupation is lesser here than elsewhere. Let's leave it at that for the moment.

The analytic cell, even if it is comfy and cozy, is nothing but a bed for lovemaking. This is due to the fact that, despite all the attempts that have been made to reduce it to the common denominator of a situation – with all the connotations we can provide for this familiar 25 term – entering into it is not a situation. As I said earlier, it is the most artificial situation going.

What allows us to understand this is precisely the reference I will try to take up next time to what is, in the social context, the situation of love itself. It is to the extent that we can home in on what Freud discussed on more than one occasion – namely, the status [position] of love in society, a precarious status, a threatened status, and, to come right out with it, a clandestine status – that we can appreciate why and how, in the most protected context of all, that of the analyst's office, the status of love becomes even more paradoxical.

I will arbitrarily end our discussion today on this point. It will suffice if you see from what direction I intend to broach the topic.

Breaking with the tradition that consists in abstracting from, neutralizing, and emptying of all its meaning what may be involved in the foundations of the analytic relationship, I intend to use an extreme question as my springboard: what is presupposed by the fact of isolating oneself with another in order to teach him what he is lacking?

This situation is still more redoubtable if we consider that, by the very nature of transference, he will find out what he is lacking insofar as he loves [en tant qu'aimant]. If I am there for his own good, it is certainly not in the comfortable old sense in which the Thomist tradition articulates it as Amare est velle bonum alicui, since this "good" [bien] is already a term that is more than just problematic. If you were willing to grant what I said last year, you know that it is outdated.

I am not there, in the final analysis, for a person's own good, but in order that he love. Does this mean that I must teach him how to love? Clearly it seems difficult to avoid this necessity. As for what it means to love and what love is, we will have to indicate that the two things are not identical. As for what it means to love and to know what it is to love, I must at least, like Socrates, be able to credit myself with knowing something about it. Now if we take a look at the psychoanalytic literature, we see that this is what people talk about the least. It seems that love in its primordial, ambivalent coupling with hate is a self-evident term. Don't think of my humorous observations today as anything other than remarks designed to tickle your funny bone.

26 A long tradition, nevertheless, exists concerning love. It has most recently led to a huge harebrained lucubration by Anders Nygren who splits it into two radically opposed terms: Eros and Agápe. But before that, people debated about nothing else for centuries. Isn't it astonishing that we analysts – who make use of love and talk about nothing else – can be said to present ourselves as truly deficient when compared to this tradition? We haven't made even a partial attempt to add to – much less revise – what has been developed over the centuries on the subject of love or provide something that might be not unworthy of this tradition. Isn't that surprising?

In order to bring this home to you, I have selected as the subject matter for my next class a text of truly monumental interest, which lies at the origin of our whole tradition concerning the structure of love – Plato's Symposium.

If someone who is sufficiently interested wants to dialogue with me about it, I anticipate that it can only be to our advantage to read a text that is chock full of enigmas, where everything remains to be demonstrated – especially everything that the very mass of religious lucubrations that has permeated every fiber of our being, that is present in all our experiences, owes to this extraordinary testament to Plato's Schwärmerei.

I'll show you what we can find in it and what we can deduce from it by way of essential landmarks, even regarding the history of the debate about what really took place in the first psychoanalytic transference. I think that, once we have put it to the test, you will have no doubt as to our ability to find all the possible keys in it.

Assuredly, these are not terms that I would easily allow to be published in a summary of our work, since they are so showy. Nor are they formulations that I would like to have repeated outside of this room to furnish fodder for the usual tomfoolery. I will expect you to take into account this year among whom we find ourselves and who we are.

November 16, 1960

THE MAINSPRING OF LOVE

A COMMENTARY ON PLATO'S SYMPOSIUM

II

SET AND CHARACTERS

29

Alcibiades.
Scholars.
The Symposium, a session.
Recording on the brain.
Greek love.

Today we are going to begin our examination of the Symposium. At least that is what I promised you.

What I spoke about last time seems to have affected you in different ways. The tasters have been sampling the vintage. "Will it be a good year?" they wonder. I can only hope no one will dwell for too long on what may appear approximate in certain of the strokes with which I am trying to sketch out our path.

Last time I tried to show you the pillars of the scene that provides the context for what I have to say about transference. It should be quite clear that my reference to the body, in particular when beauty may be one of its attributes, was not simply an opportunity to be witty regarding transference.

It has been objected that in movies, which I took as an example of widespread views about psychoanalysts' looks, it sometimes happens that the psychoanalyst is a good-looking guy, and not only in the exceptional case I mentioned. My response is that such is the case precisely when analysis is taken as an occasion for comedy.

In short, you will see that the main points I brought out last time find their justification in the path we shall have to follow today.

How shall I relate what is at stake in the Symposium? It isn't easy, given the style and limits imposed upon me by my position and objective, which, let it not be forgotten, is specifically that of psychoanalytic practice. To set myself the task of making a nice orderly 30 commentary of this extraordinary text would perhaps require me to make a long detour, which would then leave us too little time for other parts of the field to which the Symposium seems to me to provide an illuminating introduction – this is why I chose it. It will thus be necessary to proceed in a way which is obviously not that of what one might call academic commentary.

Furthermore, I must assume that at least some of you are not truly familiar with Plato's work. I'm not saying that I consider myself thoroughly equipped in this regard either. But I do have enough experience with it, and enough of a grasp of it, to think that I can allow myself to direct a spotlight on the Symposium while giving proper consideration to the whole backdrop of the dialogue. Moreover, I bid those who are equipped to do so to monitor what I say, and to let me know, should the occasion arise, what might be, not arbitrary – it obviously must be – but forced or off the mark in its arbitrariness.

What's more, I have nothing against a certain roughness or newness – I even think it should be emphasized – in taking up a text like the Symposium. This is why you will excuse me for presenting it to you in a way that is a bit paradoxical at first, or that may seem paradoxical to you.

It seems to me that whoever reads the Symposium for the first time, if he is not obsessed with the fact that it is a text from a respected tradition, cannot fail to feel flabbergasted, to put it approximately.

I would go still further. If he has a bit of historical imagination, he must wonder how such a thing could have been preserved for us throughout what I would willingly refer to as the generations of monks and ignoramuses, all of them vocationally unsuited to transmit a text to us that is quite akin – due to at least one of its parts, in other words, its end, and one cannot but be struck by this fact – to (and why not just say so?) what is nowadays called a specialized literary genre, the kind that may fall within the ambit of police investigations.

Indeed, if you simply know how to read – and just once won't hurt you (I think that after my announcement the last time many of you went out and bought the text, and have thus no doubt had a 31 look at it) – you cannot help but be struck at least by what transpires in the second part of this dialogue between Alcibiades and Socrates.

What transpires between Alcibiades and Socrates goes beyond the limits of the symposium itself.

1

What then is a symposium?

It is a ceremony with rules, a sort of ritual, intimate contest among the elite, or parlor game. The holding of such a symposium is thus not simply an occasion for Plato's dialogue, but refers to the mores and real customs variously observed in different localities in Greece, and, I might add, in certain cultural strata. The regulation imposed is by no means unusual: each person must do his share by giving a short speech on a specific topic.

A rule is announced at the beginning of this symposium that no one is to drink to excess. The reason why is ostensibly that most of the people there already have splitting headaches from having drunk a bit too much the day before, but it also makes us appreciate the importance and gravity of the elite group formed by the fellow drinkers assembled that evening. Something nevertheless happens that was not expected – pandemonium, as it were.

At a point at which the meeting is far from over, and at which a guest by the name of Aristophanes is about to say something – to rectify some point or request an explanation [212c] – a group of people turn up at the doorstep and enter, all of whom are completely smashed, namely, Alcibiades and his companions. And Alcibiades, in a rather offhand manner, takes it upon himself to preside over the symposium, and begins to speak of things whose scandalous nature I intend to bring out.

This requires our forming a certain notion of who and what Alcibiades and Socrates are, which will take us quite far afield.

For the commonly accepted account, read what Plutarch says in his Lives of the Noble Grecians and Romans, and you will get an idea of Alcibiades' general character. But you will have to make an effort there too, for his life is described by Plutarch in what I will call an 32
Alexandrian atmosphere – in other words, a funny time in history where everything seems to transform characters into mere shadows of themselves. I am referring to the moralistic tone of the works that have been handed down to us from that era, involving a coming out of the shadows, or νεκυία (nekuía) as it's put in the Odyssey. Plutarch's fabrications or characters, colored by the fact of having, moreover, served as models or paradigms for the whole of the moralist tradition that followed, have a je ne sais quoi that reminds us of zombies. It isn't easy to make veritable blood flow anew through their veins. But try to imagine, on the basis of the one-of-a-kind career Plutarch outlines for us, who Alcibiades could have been, this man who shows up before Socrates – in other words, before he who declares elsewhere that he was Alcibiades' πρῶτος ἐραστής (prótos erastés), the first to have ever loved Alcibiades.

Alcibiades was a sort of early Alexander. All of his political adventures were beyond a shadow of a doubt marked with the stamp of defiance and extraordinary daring – tour de force – and the inability to either situate or stop himself at any point. He would turn the situation around wherever he went, snatching victory from the jaws of defeat for whichever camp he aligned with, but would be chased away or exiled by everyone – precisely, it must be pointed out, because of his misdeeds.

It seems that Athens lost the Peloponnesian War because the city felt the need to call Alcibiades back from the fray right in the middle of the hostilities to make him account for an obscure event, that of the so-called mutilation of the ἑρμαῖ (hermaí), which, with hindsight, strikes us as just as inexplicable as it is far-fetched, but which surely involved at its root an element of profanation and, strictly speaking, insult to the gods.

Nor can we completely let Alcibiades and his companions off the hook. The people of Athens were no doubt justified in calling him to account. The practice in question was suggestive, by analogy, of some kind of black mass. We cannot but notice the context of insurrection and subversion of the polis' laws from which a character like Alcibiades emerges – a context implying a break with and contempt for the forms, traditions, laws, and no doubt religion itself.

This is the kind of disturbing background he brought with him. He also exercised, wherever he went, a truly remarkable fascination on people [séduction]. After the suit brought against him by 33 the people of Athens, he sided with the enemy, Sparta, he himself having played a role in setting the two cities at odds, since prior to that he had done everything in his power to ensure that the peace talks between them fell through.

So he sided with Sparta, and right away found nothing better, nothing more worthy of his fame, than to get the queen pregnant, in plain sight of and with full cognizance of everyone. It turned out that it was well known that the king, Agis, had not slept with his wife for ten months, for reasons I'll spare you. The queen thus bore Alcibiades' child. "I didn't do it for pleasure's sake," he tells us, "but rather because it seemed a worthy undertaking to ensure a throne to my descendants, and to thus honor Sparta's throne with someone of my lineage."

As you may well imagine, such things can captivate people for a while, but are not easily forgiven. You know, of course, that Alcibiades, after having bestowed this present – along with several ingenious ideas concerning battle tactics – set up headquarters elsewhere, taking the opportunity to do so in a third camp, that of the Persians. He paid a visit to the person who represented the power of the king of Persia in Asia Minor, namely, Tissaphernes, who, Plutarch tells us, hardly liked Greeks – in fact he hated them, but he was taken with [séduit] Alcibiades.

From then on Alcibiades knuckled down to the business of restoring Athens' good fortune. He did so thanks to conditions whose history is also highly surprising, as it seems that it was in the thick of a network of double agents and constant double-crossing. All the warnings he sent the Athenians were immediately rerouted and passed on to Sparta and to the Persians themselves, who then informed the person in the Athenian fleet who had passed on the news, such that Alcibiades wound up being informed, in turn, that people in high places were perfectly well aware that he had betrayed them.

In any case, each of these people got on as best he could. What is clear is that in the midst of all this, Alcibiades reversed Athens' fortune. And consequently, although we cannot be absolutely sure of the particulars, which vary from one ancient historian's account to another, we should not be surprised to learn that Alcibiades returned to Athens with all the signs of an unprecedented triumph that, despite the joy of the Athenian people, marked the beginning of a swinging back of the pendulum of public opinion. For here we are dealing with someone who could not avoid being, at every turn 34 of the way, the kind of guy about whom people could not but have an opinion.

His death, too, was very strange. Questions remain as to who was responsible for it. It seems that, after a series of reversals of fortune, each more astonishing than the one before – as if, in any case, regardless of the trouble he got into, he could never be defeated – a sort of immense tide of hatred ended up doing him in, employing the means that legend or myth tells us must be used with scorpions. He was surrounded by a circle of fire – but he managed to escape from it, and it was only at some distance that he could be laid low with javelins and arrows.

Such was Alcibiades' incomparable career. While I have highlighted his highly active, exceptional, powerful, penetrating mind, I would nevertheless say that this character's most salient feature was the added luster of what is said of his looks [beauté]. Not only his precocious good looks as a child, insofar as we know that it is altogether related to the history of the dominant form of love at that time in Greece, namely, love for children, but also his long-preserved attractiveness, which even late in life made him someone who seduced people as much with his looks as with his exceptional intelligence.

Such was the man. Here we see him show up at the symposium, at this contest assembling serious learned men, albeit in the context of Greek love, which I'll stress later, that already provides a backdrop of constant eroticism to the speeches on love. He tells everyone about something that can be summed up in these words: the vain efforts he made when he was young, when Socrates loved him, to get Socrates to fuck him.

He goes into it at length, furnishing plenty of details and describing it in the crassest of terms. He quite clearly wanted to make Socrates lose control, show some emotional turmoil, and yield to direct corporal come-ons – physical contact. All of this is said publicly, by a man who is drunk, no doubt, but whose words Plato doesn't consider it beneath his dignity to repeat right down to the last detail.

I'm not sure I'm getting my point across. Imagine that a book comes out, not now – for Plato brings it out some 50 years after 35 the scene it relates took place. But imagine that a book comes out some time in the future, to avoid ruffling anyone's feathers, in which a celebrity, Kennedy, for example, a Kennedy who is simultaneously James Dean, recounts in a book designed for the elites that he did everything, when he was in college, to get ____ to make love to him – I'll let you fill in the blank with someone's name. You needn't absolutely restrict yourself to teachers, since Socrates was not exactly a teacher, but he was one all the same, a rather unusual one at that. Imagine that it is someone like Massignon, and at the same time Henry Miller. That would make waves, and would spell trouble for Jean-Jacques Pauvert who would publish the book. Keep this in mind when considering that it is thanks to those who we must call the Brothers variously ignoramus that this astonishing book has been handed down to us through the centuries, such that we no doubt have the complete text. This is what I was thinking, not without some degree of admiration, in thumbing through the admirable edition Henri Estienne gave us, which includes a Latin translation. This edition is quite definitive – it is such a perfect critical edition that even now, in all other editions, whether more or less scholarly, its pagination is provided. Those of you for whom this is all a bit new should know that the little 872a's and so on you see in the margins refer to Henri Estienne's pagination dating back to 1575.

Henri Estienne certainly wasn't an ignoramus [un ignorantin], but it's a bit hard to believe that someone who was capable of devoting himself to compiling such monumental editions – though this wasn't all he did – was sufficiently open to life to fully appreciate the contents of this text, inasmuch as it is a text about love.

Other people were interested in love during the same era as Henri Estienne, and I can certainly tell you that, when I talked last year at length about sublimation as concerns love for women, the author I didn't mention was neither Plato, nor any other scholar, but rather Marguerite de Navarre. I alluded to her without spelling it out. Keep in mind that, for the sort of banquet or symposium constituted by her Heptaméron, she carefully excluded the people with ink on their hands who appeared at the time as overhaulers of the contents of libraries. She wanted only cavaliers and lords, people who, when 36 speaking of love, spoke of something they had time to experience. And in all commentaries on the Symposium, it is this very dimension which is often lacking, leaving something to be desired. But that is of little consequence.

For those who never wonder whether their understanding, as Jaspers says, extends to the limits of the concrete, perceptible, or comprehensible, the story of Alcibiades and Socrates has always been hard to swallow. By way of proof I need but mention the fact that Louis [or Loys] Le Roy, Ludovicus Regius, the first French translator of these texts that had just surfaced in Western culture from the Orient, quite simply stopped translating when he reached Alcibiades' entrance. He went no further. It seemed to him that enough fine speeches had already been made – which is, indeed, true. The scene with Alcibiades seemed to Le Roy superfluously tacked on – apocryphal.

He wasn't the only person to behave this way either. I'll spare you the details, but one day Racine received the manuscript of a translation of the Symposium from a lady who had worked on it, asking him to look it over. Racine, a sensitive man, considered it to be untranslatable – not just the story of Alcibiades, but the whole Symposium. We have his notes, which prove that he looked very closely at the manuscript that had been sent to him. But as for correcting it, for it required nothing less than total revamping – only someone like Racine could translate the Greek – he refused. It didn't tickle his fancy.

Third reference: a long time ago I was lucky enough to come across handwritten notes of a course on Plato given by Victor Brochard, which had been tucked away somewhere. They are quite remarkable: the notes were exceptionally well taken, the writing exquisite and, concerning the theory of love, Brochard referred to everything relevant – the Lysis, the Phaedrus, and above all the Symposium. But he plays a very cute little game of substitution when it comes to the part about Alcibiades – he shifts gears and redirects things toward the Phaedrus, which becomes his new focus. He doesn't take it upon himself to account for the story of Alcibiades.

This reserve on his part is rather deserving of our respect. It at least attests to his sense that there was something there that raised a question. And I prefer this to seeing it resolved by the sorts of unusual hypotheses that are not infrequently proposed.

The most amazing of them, never in a million years would you guess it – and Léon Robin rallies to it, which is astonishing – is that Plato was concerned in this last scene to make people give his master his due. Scholars have discovered that, several years after 37 Socrates' death, a man by the name of Polycrates brought out a pamphlet in which one sees Socrates collapse under the weight of various accusations that are conveyed by three people. Polycrates is supposed to have made one of the three, Anytus, furnish an indictment whose main claim was that Socrates was responsible for what I told you about earlier – namely, the trail of corruption and scandal Alcibiades left in his wake his whole life long, including the string of problems, if not catastrophes, he created.

It must be agreed that the idea that Plato was trying to exonerate Socrates and his mores, if not his influence, by presenting us with such a scene of public confession, has truly got it all backward. What could people who come up with such hypotheses possibly be thinking? The idea that Socrates resisted Alcibiades' come-ons, and that this, in and of itself, would justify presenting this part of the Symposium, insofar as it was designed to improve the public's view of Socrates' mission, personally leaves me dumbfounded.

One of the two following things must be true – either we have to come to grips with a whole series of reasons Plato never mentions or else this scene in fact serves a purpose. Why does Alcibiades burst in? And why does he sit beside Socrates, who can be associated with him, who no doubt hails from a rather more distant shore, but who is the most indissolubly bound up with him in some way? Alcibiades' arrival here in the flesh is, in fact, closely related to the question of love.

Let us now see what it's about, since this is the focal point of everything at stake in the Symposium. It is here that will be most deeply illuminated, not so much the nature of love, but what interests us in this context – namely, the relationship between love and transference. This is why I am emphasizing the shift [l'articulation] between the speeches given at the symposium – at least according to the text of it that is reported to us – and Alcibiades' bursting onto the scene.

2

First I must sketch out for you the meaning of these speeches, but even before that, I must say something about the text thereof which is communicated to us – in other words, the narrative.

38 What is this text? And what is Plato telling us? One can raise this question right from the outset. Is it fiction or a fabrication, as many of his dialogues clearly are, being compositions that obey certain laws? Lord knows that much could be said about this. Why this genre? Why this law of the dialogue? We will have to leave certain things aside, and I will simply indicate to you that there is a whole lot to know in this vein. But the Symposium nevertheless has another feature that is not so very different from the way in which certain of his other dialogues are presented to us.

To give you a glimpse of what I mean, first let me say that we are going to take the Symposium as a sort of account of psychoanalytic sessions. For it is indeed a question of something like that. As the dialogue progresses, and the contributions by the different persons participating in the symposium lead one to the next, something happens, which is that each flash is illuminated by the one that follows, and then at the end, life – Alcibiades' presence – bursts onto the scene, this being reported to us as a raw and even disturbing fact. It is up to us to grasp the meaning of Alcibiades' speech.

Assuming then that this is what we are dealing with, we have, according to Plato, a sort of recording of it. As there were no tape recorders at the time, we'll call it a recording on the brain.

Recording on the brain is an exceedingly old practice, which underlay for many centuries the way people who participated in serious events listened, for as long as writing hadn't taken on the dominant role in our culture that it has nowadays. Since things can be written, those that are to be remembered are remembered for us in what I've called the kilos of language – stacks of books and piles of paper. But when paper was rarer and books far more difficult to manufacture and distribute, it was essential to have a good memory, and, if I may say so, to experience everything one heard with an eye to storing it in one's memory. It is not simply at the beginning of the Symposium, but in all the traditions we know of, that we find evidence that the oral transmission of the sciences and wisdom was absolutely essential. It is by this pathway, moreover, that we know something of them. In the absence of writing, the oral tradition served as their medium. 39

This is what Plato is referring to when he tells us how the text of the Symposium comes down to us. He has someone named Apollodorus tell the story. We know this character because he existed historically. He is supposed to have come into the picture just over 30 years before the appearance of the Symposium, if we take its date of publication as circa 370 B.C. It is thus before Socrates' death that Apollodorus hears, Plato tells us, the account of what happened. And Apollodorus is supposed to have heard it from Aristodemus, who attended the supposed symposium 16 years earlier, since we are given to believe it took place in 416 B.C.

It is thus 16 years after the fact that a character extracts from his memory the verbatim text of what was supposedly said. Consequently, the least one can say is that Plato takes all the necessary steps to make us believe in this brain recording which was widely practiced, and which was always practiced in such phases of culture. He stresses the fact that "Aristodemus," I am quoting 178a, "couldn't remember exactly what everyone said," no more than Apollodorus himself did – parts of the tape were damaged and there might be gaps at certain points. Obviously none of this can definitively answer the question of historical veracity, but it nevertheless rings true. If it is a lie, it is a pretty one. And as it is, moreover, manifestly a work on love – and we will perhaps come to where the notion arises that, after all, only liars can fittingly respond to love – the Symposium would certainly seem to be the choice reference, concerning love, of Socrates' action. This, indeed, is conveyed to us unambiguously.

This is clearly why the Symposium is such an important piece of evidence. We know that Socrates himself asserts that he truly knows only about what falls under the heading of love. No doubt the Theages, where he says so, was not written by Plato, but it is nevertheless a dialogue by someone who wrote about what was known of Socrates and what had been handed down about him. In it, Socrates is attested to have expressly said that he knew nothing, all in all, but this little bit, σμικροῦ τινος (smikroú tinos), of science, 40 μαθήματος (mathématos), which concerns matters of love, τῶν ἐρωτικῶν (tón erotikón). Socrates repeats this, and in exactly the same terms, at one point in the Symposium [177d].

What is the topic of the Symposium? The topic was proposed by the character, Phaedrus [177a–c]. He is no other than the character for whom another dialogue was named, one I referred to last year regarding beauty, in which love is also discussed, for the two are linked in Plato's thought. Phaedrus is said to be πατὴρ τοῦ λόγου (patér toú lógou), the father of the topic that is taken up in the Symposium [177d]. The topic is the following – what is the purpose of being knowledgeable about love? And we know that Socrates claims to be knowledgeable about nothing else.

It becomes still more striking when the following remark is made, a remark you will be able to fully appreciate when you go back to the text – Socrates says almost nothing in his own name. I will tell you today if we have time that this almost-nothing is important – I even think we are reaching the point where I can say so – it is no doubt essential, for it is around this almost-nothing that the scene really revolves, and that they begin, as was to be expected, to truly delve into the topic.

Socrates, in a sense, calibrates or adjusts the level at which things must be taken up and, in the final analysis, he does not rate love as highly as all that compared to the others present. What he says consists rather in framing [cadrer] things, adjusting the lights in such a way that one sees precisely the level, which is middling. If Socrates tells us something, it is assuredly that love is not divine. He doesn't rate it that highly, but it is nevertheless what he loves. In fact, he loves it and it alone.

It is worth pointing out the moment at which he begins to speak – just after Agathon. I will bring the characters in one at a time, instead of presenting them all at the outset. There is Phaedrus, Pausanias, and Aristodemus who is a party crasher – in other words, he ran into Socrates, and Socrates brought him along. There is also Eryximachus who counts as a colleague for most of you since he is a medical doctor, and Agathon who is the host. Socrates, who invited Aristodemus, arrives very late because, on the way, he had what we might call a fit [crise]. Socrates' fits consisted in stopping short, and standing still in some spot on one foot. That evening he stopped at the house next door where he had no business being. He remained 41 glued there in the foyer between the umbrella stand and the coat rack, and there was no way to rouse him. One must provide a bit of atmosphere for these things. These stories are not nearly as boring as they make them out to be in junior high school.

Some day I'd like to give a talk – in which I'd take my examples from the Phaedrus, or from one of Aristophanes' plays – on an absolutely essential trait without which there is no way of understanding how what I will call the lit circle is situated in everything Antiquity has bequeathed us.

We live in the midst of constant light. The night is brought to us on a stream of neon. But try to imagine that up until a relatively recent era – there's no need to go back as far as Plato – night was night. When, at the beginning of the Phaedrus, someone comes knocking to wake up Socrates because he has to rise a little before daybreak – I hope it's in the Phaedrus, but that's of little importance, it's at the beginning of one of Plato's dialogues – it's a whole to-do. He gets up and finds himself truly in the dark, for he knocks things over at every step. The same thing happens at the beginning of one of Aristophanes' plays. When one is in the dark, one is truly in the dark. It is at such times that you cannot recognize the person who is touching your hand.

The Heptaméron, to mention what was still common in Marguerite de Navarre's era, is full of stories that turn on the fact that at that time, when you slipped into a lady's bed at night, it was considered entirely possible to pass yourself off as her husband or her lover, as long as you kept your mouth shut. It seems that went on all the time. Obviously, what I will call, with an altogether different meaning, the spreading of light, changes many things in the realm of human relations. To us, night is not a consistent reality – it cannot be poured from a ladle or form a blanket of darkness. That deprives us of certain things, many things.

All of this to return to our topic, which is that to which we must come – namely, what is signified by the lit circle in which we find ourselves, and what was at issue when love was talked about in Greece.

42 When it was talked about, well, as Mr. de La Palice would say, it was Greek love that was at issue.

3

You'll have to get used to the idea that Greek love was love for pretty boys. And . . . that's it.

It is quite clear that when people spoke of love they were speaking of nothing else. All the attempts we make to situate this in its proper context are doomed to failure. To try to see exactly what it is, we are no doubt obliged to push back the furniture in a certain way, re-establish certain perspectives, and look at it from a different angle, by saying that there wasn't necessarily only that, obviously, naturally. The fact remains that, as far as love was concerned, that's all there was.

You will tell me that love for boys is something that was universally accepted. Some of our contemporaries have been saying so for a long time, regretting that they weren't born a bit earlier. But no. The fact remains that in a whole part of Greece it was not at all thought well of, and that in a whole other part of Greece – Pausanias says so himself in the Symposium – it was thought well of. And as it was in the totalitarian part of Greece, among the Boeotians and Spartans, where everything that was not prohibited was compulsory, that it was not only thought well of, but the mandatory form of service, there was no getting around it. There are people who are far superior to us, says Pausanias – it's well thought of by we Athenians, but it's prohibited nevertheless, and naturally that makes it all the more invaluable [182].

All of this teaches us little, except that it was more credible, on condition that we understand more or less what it corresponded to. To get some idea of it, we must refer back to what I said last year about courtly love. It wasn't the same thing, but it served an analogous function in the society. It was quite obviously a kind of sublimation – recall that I tried last year to provide a slight rectification in your minds regarding the real function of sublimation.

It involved nothing that we can situate within the register of 43 regression on a societal scale. While it is true that psychoanalytic theory points to fraternity among men as the basis of the social bond – homosexuality attaching man to the neutralization of the bond – that's not what is at issue here. It is not in the least a question of the dissolution of the social bond and a return to some sort of innate form. It is obviously something else – it is a fact of culture. This form of love was practiced by the masters of Greece – people of a certain social class and milieu, people at a level at which culture reigned supreme and was developed. This love was obviously the great center of elaboration of interpersonal relationships.

Let me remind you, in another guise, of what I indicated at the end of an earlier Seminar – the schema of the relationship between perversion and culture, insofar as culture is distinct from society. While society leads, via censorship, to a form of disintegration which is called neurosis, perversion can be understood, contrariwise, as a kind of elaboration, construction, or even sublimation – to use that word – when it is a product of culture. The circle closes: perversion contributes elements that shape [travaillent] society, and neurosis favors the creation of new cultural elements.

This doesn't stop Greek love from being a perversion, however sublimated it may be. No culturalist viewpoint can prevail here. Let it not be retorted, on the basis of the pretext that it was an accepted, approved, and even celebrated perversion, that it was not a perversion. Homosexuality still was what it is, a perversion. To maintain, in order to be accommodating, that if we treat homosexuality, it's because in our era it's something else altogether – it's no longer in style, while at the time of the Greeks it served a cultural function, and was as such worthy of our highest regard – is truly to skirt the issue.

The only thing that distinguishes contemporary homosexuality from Greek perversion is, I believe – well – hardly to be found anywhere but in the quality of its objects. High-school students here are pimply and turned into blithering idiots by the education they receive. In Greece, the conditions were favorable for their being objects of homage, without it being necessary to go find these objects in dark alleys or in the gutter. That's the whole difference. 44
But the structure is in no way different.

This is scandalous given the eminent dignity we have bestowed upon the Greek message. People shroud themselves in this context in fine words. "Nevertheless," they say, "don't think women weren't paid suitable homage, for all that. Don't forget that Socrates, for example, in the Symposium, while saying very little in his own name, has a woman, Diotima, speak in his stead. Don't you see that this proves the supreme homage was paid, even in Socrates' own words, to women?" That, at least, is what the kind souls never fail to trot out in this context. And they add, "You know, from time to time he went to visit Lais, Aspasia, and Theodota who was Alcibiades' mistress" – anything and everything they can find in the gossip of the historians. And then there's the amazing Xanthippus [Socrates' wife] to whom I alluded last week. "She was there the day of his death, you know, and she even wailed so loudly she deafened all around." There's just one hitch – it is attested to in the Phaedo – and it is that Socrates bids those present to get her out of there as quickly as possible and put her to bed straight away so that they can talk in peace, there being only a few hours left. If it weren't for that, the dignity of women in Greece would be safe and sound.

Personally, I don't question the importance of women in ancient Greek society. I would even say it was rather considerable, and you will see its import in what follows. The fact is that they had what I would call their true place. And not only their true place, but an altogether eminent role in love relations. We have all kinds of proof thereof. It turns out, in fact, assuming, as usual, that we know how to read – you can't read ancient authors with blinders – that they had a role that is veiled for us, but that is nevertheless eminently theirs in love: quite simply the active role. The difference between the women of Antiquity and modern women is that the women of Antiquity demanded their due – they attacked men.

This is quite palpable in many cases. Once you have opened your eyes to this point of view, you will notice many things in ancient history that otherwise seem strange. Aristophanes, who was a very 45 fine music-hall director, did nothing to conceal how the women of his time behaved. There has never been anything more characteristic and direct concerning women's doings, and this is precisely why learned love [l'amour savant], so to speak, sought refuge elsewhere. We have here one of the keys to the question, and it is not such as to surprise psychoanalysts terribly much.

All of this may seem to be a rather long detour for our undertaking, which is to analyze a text that aims at discovering what it means to be learned in love. Please excuse this detour. We know that the Symposium dates back to the time of Greek love and that this love was, so to speak, "schoolish," in other words, love of pupils. For technical reasons – for reasons of simplification, exemplification, and use as a model – this love allows us to understand a connection [articulation] that is always elided in what is overly complicated in love involving women. It is in this respect that this love for school[boys] [amour de l'école] can legitimately provide us and everyone with schooling in love [d'école de l'amour].

Which doesn't mean it should be reinstituted. I would like to avoid all possible misunderstandings – soon people will be saying that I am advocating Platonic love. There are many reasons why it can no longer serve as a love school. Were I to tell you which reasons, I would be making great lunging thrusts with a sword into the curtains without being sure what lies behind them. I generally avoid such things, believe me. There are reasons why it should not be reinstituted, and why it would even be impossible to do so. One of the reasons, which will perhaps surprise you if I propose it here, is that for us, at the stage we are at, love – and its phenomenon, culture, and dimension – has for some time now been disconnected from beauty. That may surprise you, but that's the way it is.

Even if you haven't yet noticed, you will if you reflect a bit. Consider it from both sides, from that of beautiful artworks, on the one hand, and from that of love, on the other, and you will realize that it is true. It is, in any case, a condition that makes it difficult to prepare you to see what is at stake, and it is precisely why I have taken this long detour. We now return to beauty, whose tragic function I brought out last year, since it supplies the true meaning of what Plato tells us about love.

Moreover, it is quite clear that, currently, love is no longer situ- 46 ated at the level of tragedy at all, nor at another level I'll talk about later. It is at the level of what is called Polyhymnia in Agathon's speech [187e]. This is the level of what presents itself as the most vivid materialization of what is essential in fiction, which for us is film.

Plato would be overjoyed by this invention. There is no better illustration in the arts of what Plato places at the beginning of his vision of the world. What is expressed in his myth of the cave is illustrated every day for us by the dancing beams that shine on the screen, showing all our feelings in a shadowy state. In contemporary art, the defense and illustration of love most clearly belong to this dimension.

This is why I told you before – a remark that was not without eliciting your reluctance, made as it was as an aside, but which will nevertheless be the linchpin of our progress here – that love is a comical feeling. But an effort is necessary to arrive at the focal point at which one can appropriately appreciate its import.

There are two things that I've noted about love in my prior work, and I will remind you of them here.

The first is that love is a comical feeling. You will see what illustrates it in our investigation, and we will come full circle in this regard, which will allow us to bring up again what is essential – the true nature of comedy. It is so essential and indispensable that it is why there is in the Symposium a presence that, for a long time, commentators were never able to explain, that of Aristophanes, who was nevertheless, historically speaking, Socrates' sworn enemy.

The second thing I wanted to mention, which we'll come across constantly and which will serve us as a guide, is that love is giving what you don't have. You will also see this appear in one of the essential full spirals of what we will encounter in our commentary.

In any case, to begin the step-by-step examination by which Socrates' speech will have an enlightening function for us, let us assume that Greek love allows us to isolate in a love relationship the two partners in the neuter. It is a question of something pure that is naturally expressed in the masculine, and that first allows us 47 to articulate what happens in love at the level of the couple formed by the lover and the beloved, ἐραστὴς (erastés) and ἐρώμενος (erómenos), respectively.

Next time I will show you how the process that unfolds in the Symposium allows us to characterize these two functions, the lover and the beloved, with all the rigor of which psychoanalysis is capable.

In other words, at a time at which psychoanalysis did not yet exist, and the unconscious in its true function in relation to the subject was assuredly the most unsuspected of dimensions – thus with all the limitations this implies – something was quite explicitly articulated that converges with the crowning point of our experience, the same thing I tried to lay out for you under the twofold heading of The Relation to the Object, one year, and Desire and Its Interpretation two years later. To formulate it in the terms we arrived at, you will clearly see that the lover appears here as the desiring subject [le sujet du désir], with all the weight that the term "desire" has for us, and the beloved as the only one in the couple who has something.

The question is to figure out whether or not what he has bears a relation, I would even go so far as to say, any relation whatsoever, to what the other, the desiring subject, is lacking.

The question of the relations between desire and that upon which it becomes fixated has already led us to the notion of desire qua desire for something else. We arrived at this by analyzing the effects of language on the subject. It is quite strange that a dialectic of love, that of Socrates, that was established entirely by means of dialectic and by putting the imperatorial effects of questioning as such to the test, does not bring us to the same crossroads. It does much more – it allows us to go beyond, and to grasp the moment at which a shift or reversal occurs in which, from the conjunction of desire with its object qua inadequate, the signification called love must arise.

Anyone who has not grasped this shift [articulation] and the conditions it implies in the symbolic, imaginary, and real, cannot grasp what is at work in the effect called transference, whose automatic functioning is so strange. Nor can he compare transference and love or gauge the share or dose of illusion or truth that must be attributed to each and both. 48

In this respect, the investigation to which I have introduced you today will turn out to be of inaugural importance to us.

November 23, 1960

49

III

THE METAPHOR OF LOVE

Phaedrus

The other's being: an object?
From "Know thyself" to "He doesn't know."
The gods belong to the real.
Orpheus, Alcestis, and Achilles.

Last time we ended with the positions of ἐραστὴς (erastés) and ἐρώμενος (erómenos), the lover and the beloved, the dialectic in the Symposium allowing us to present them as the basis, crux, or essential articulation of the problem of love.

The problem of love interests us insofar as it allows us to understand what happens in transference – and, to a certain extent, because of transference.

To justify such a long detour, which may seem superfluous to those of you who are attending this Seminar for the first time this year, I will try to help you immediately grasp the import of our study here.

1

It seems to me that at some stage of his training, something must occur to the psychoanalyst that can give him pause for thought at more than one turning of the way.

Isn't the simplest point – one that is difficult to avoid, it seems to me, starting at a certain age, and that must already pose for you, very directly and in and of itself, the problem of what love is – the following? Hasn't it ever struck you at some turning of the way that something was missing in what you gave to those closest to you?
50 And not simply that something was missing, but that there was something that left the abovementioned loved ones irremediably missed by you? What could that be?

Being an analyst allows you to understand it – with those close to you, you have merely revolved around the fantasy that you have basically sought to satisfy through them. This fantasy has more or less replaced them with its own images and colors.

The being you can suddenly be reminded of by some accident, of which death is clearly the example that makes us best understand its full resonance, this veritable being – should you so much as call it to mind – flees and is already eternally lost. Yet it is this being that you are attempting to connect up with along the paths of your desire. But this being [être-là, which is also the French for Dasein] is yours. As analysts, you are well aware that it is, in some sense, because you failed to want it that you also basically missed it. But at least here you are at the level of something that is your own fault, and your failure reflects the precise magnitude of that fault.

Is it because you made mere objects, so to speak, of these other people you have cared for so poorly [mal]? Would that you had treated them like objects, objects whose weight, taste, and substance we savor! Today you would be less troubled by your memories of them. You would have given them their due, paid them the proper homage and love. You would have at least loved them as thyself, except that thou hardly [mal] lovest thyself. But it is not even the fate of the barely [mal] loved that we have all known. You wanted to make subjects, so to speak, of them – as if that were the end-all of the respect they deserved, respect, so to speak, for their dignity, the respect owed to your semblables.

I'm afraid that this neutralized use of the expression, "our semblables," is quite different from what is at issue in the question of love. I suspect that the respect you have for these semblables all too quickly tends to come down to chalking everything up to their whimsical resistance, narrow-minded ideas, and inborn stupidity – in short, to their own "beeswax." Let them work it out for themselves. This is, I think, the basic reason why you stop short of infringing on their freedom, one of your common behavioral traits. "Freedom to be indifferent [Liberté d'indifférence]," people say. However, it is not their freedom but rather yours.

It is here that a question arises in analysts' minds: "What is our relation to our patient's being?" We are well aware that it is what is at stake in analysis. Is our access to this being the access allowed by 51 love? Does this access bear any relation to what we can know about the nature of love, beginning with the question that I am raising this year? As you will see, this will take us rather far. There is a metaphor in the Symposium that I intend to make use of in this regard. It seems, indeed, that there were, at the time, statues representing a satyr or a silenus on the outside, and inside of which something was lodged, as in Russian dolls. We don't really know what was inside, but they were assuredly precious objects. In any case, Alcibiades compares Socrates to these small objects. My question will aim, but only at the end of our exploration, at what, in analysis, there must be, can be, or is supposed to be inside.

I am trying to broach the problem of the relation of the analysand to the analyst, which manifests itself in the odd phenomenon known as transference, in a way that homes in on it as closely as possible and that eludes its forms as little as possible. Every analyst knows it, but people more or less seek to extract its true weight or avoid it altogether. We can do no better, in this regard, than to begin with an investigation of what the phenomenon of transference is supposed to imitate to the greatest extent, even to the point of becoming indistinguishable from it – namely, love.

One of Freud's famous articles sets off in this direction, "Observations on Transference-Love," a text which is part of what are usually called his "Papers on Technique." It situates transference with respect to what it is closely related to. But there has always been an uncertainty in the problem of love, an internal dissension, some kind of duplicity, which is precisely what we must try to focus in on. It can be shed light on by the ambiguity of something else, which is the substitution that takes place in the process – which, after attending this Seminar for a while, you should know is something that happens in analytic action and that I can summarize for you.

He who seeks us out does so on the basis of the assumption that he doesn't know what he has, and the whole unconscious, the fundamental "he doesn't know," is already implied therein. It is in this way that a bridge is erected that can link up our new science with the whole "know thyself" [γνῶθι σαυτόν (gnóthi sautón)] tradition.

There is, of course, a fundamental difference. The emphasis shifts completely due to this "he doesn't know." I believe I've said enough about it already not to have to do anything other than point out the difference in passing.

52 It is a question of what the subject truly has in himself, of what asks to be educated, brought out, and cultured in accordance with all traditional pedagogical methods – which take refuge behind the fundamentally revelatory power of a dialectic, and are the shoots and suckers of Socrates' inaugural method insofar as it is philosophical. Is this where we are going to lead someone who seeks us out as analysts?

In your sole capacity as readers of Freud's work, you should already know something of what, at first glance at least, manifests itself as the paradox of what is considered to be the term, telos, end, or termination of analysis. What does Freud tell us if not that, in the final analysis, what is found at the end of this path by those who follow it is essentially nothing other than a lack?

Whether you call this lack "castration" or Penisneid ["penis envy"], it is a sign or metaphor. But if this is truly what analysis runs up against in the end, isn't there already some ambiguity here? In short, in recalling the twofold register between the beginning or theoretical starting point of an analysis and its end, it does not escape me that its first appearance may seem deceptive, and quite necessarily so. Its whole unfolding is nevertheless inscribed therein. The course of an analysis involves, strictly speaking, the thorough revelation of something that is called the unconscious Other.

To anyone who is listening to me talk about it for the first time – but I suspect this is not the case for any of you here – all of this can only be taken as an enigma. But that is not why I am presenting it to you – I am doing so in order to assemble the terms in which our action is formulated. It is also in order to immediately sketch out the general trajectory we will follow. It is but a question, for goodness' sake, of immediately apprehending the analogy between this unfolding and these terms, on the one hand, and the fundamental, original situation of love, on the other. The latter, while obvious, has never, to the best of my knowledge, been situated in the terms in which I propose that we articulate it right away, the two terms with which we are beginning: erastés, the lover (or ἐρῶν, erón, the one who loves [l'aimant]), and erómenos, the one who is loved (the beloved).

Isn't all of this best laid out right at the outset? There's no point playing hide-and-seek. We can see it right away in such a gathering – isn't it essentially what the erastés or lover is lacking that characterizes him for all those who come into contact with him? As 53 analysts, we can immediately add that he knows not in what he is lacking, furnishing the particular accent of inscience that is characteristic of the unconscious.

On the other hand, hasn't the erómenos or loved object always been situated as the one who knows not what he has, what he has that is hidden, and which makes him appealing? Isn't what he has something that, in love relationships, is destined not only to be revealed, but to come into being, to be rendered present, whereas up until then it was merely possible? In short, let us state it with an analytic accent, or even without such an accent: the beloved doesn't know either. But it is a matter of something else in his case – he knows not what he has.

Note that the two terms that, in their essence, constitute the lover and the beloved in no way coincide. What the one is missing is not what is hidden in the other. This is the whole problem of love. Whether one knows it or not is of no consequence. In the phenomenon of love, at every step of the way one encounters the wrenching and discordance associated with it. No one needs, for all that, to dialogue [διαλέγεσθαι (dialégesthai)] or dialectize, διαλεκτικεύεσθαι (dialektikeúesthai) about love to be involved in this gap or discord – it suffices to be in the thick of it, to be in love.

Does that say it all? Is that sufficient? I can't go any further here. I'm already going pretty far in saying this. I am exposing myself to the risk of a certain immediate misunderstanding. But I have no intention here of misleading you, so I'll lay my cards on the table at once.

Of course things go further. We can provide here, in the terms we use, a formulation that takes up anew what is already indicated in the analysis of the creation of meaning in the signifier–signified relation, provided we are prepared to see in what follows how it should be handled and its truth. Love as a signifier – for to us it is a signifier and nothing else – is a metaphor, assuming that we have come to understand metaphor as substitution.

This is where we enter uncharted waters. For the time being I bid you to simply accept it, and to consider what I am saying as what it is: an algebraic formula. It is insofar as the function of erastés or the person who loves, as a lacking subject, comes to take the place of, or is substituted for, the function of erómenos, the loved object, that the signification of love is produced.

It will perhaps take me some time to explain this formulation. We 54 have the time to do so in the year before us. At least I won't have failed to give you, right from the outset, this reference point which can serve, not as a riddle, but as a landmark that may help you navigate around certain ambiguities in the discussions to come.

2

Let us now enter into the Symposium whose set I depicted and whose characters I presented last time.

These characters have nothing primitive about them, despite the fact that they present us with a simplification of the problem [of love]. They are highly sophisticated characters – that's the word for it! Let me retrace now one of the staves [portées] I spoke with you about last time, for I think it's important that it be stated as provocatively as possible.

It really is quite funny that, in close to 24 centuries of religious thought, there hasn't been a single reflection on love, whether by libertines or clerics, which hasn't referred to this inaugural text. Now, after all, to someone who happens along unawares – to the country bumpkin who leaves his little patch of ground [lopin] outside Athens – this symposium, taken in its outer trappings, seems rather like a gathering of aging fairies, as people call them, a meeting of old faggots [lopes]. Socrates is 53, Alcibiades, who is apparently still handsome, is 36, and Agathon himself, whose house they are meeting at, is 30 – he has just won the prize for the best tragedy, and this is what allows us to precisely establish the year of the symposium [416 B.C.].

One must not stop at such outward appearances. It is always in sitting rooms – in other words, in places where people are not especially good-looking – at the homes of duchesses, in the course of an evening, that the most refined things are said. They are lost forever, naturally, but not for everyone, in any case not for those who say them. Here, for once, we have a chance to know what these characters, each in his turn, exchanged that particular evening.

A lot has been said of the Symposium. You don't need me to tell you that those whose job it is to be philosophers, philologists, and Hellenists have scrutinized it with a magnifying glass. I haven't 55 exhausted the sum total of their remarks, though they are not inexhaustible, as they always revolve around one point. However far from inexhaustible they may be, it is nevertheless out of the question for me to go into all of the little debates that have sprung up over one line or another. First of all, it is not clear that it would prevent me from leaving out something important. And furthermore, it is not easy for me, being neither a philosopher, a philologist, nor a Hellenist, to put myself in their shoes and give you a class on the Symposium. All I can hope to do is to give you a first take on it.

I hope you won't imagine that I am relying on a first reading alone. Be so kind as to believe that I am not taking up this text for the first time strictly for the purposes of this Seminar. Be so kind as to also believe that I have taken some pains to refresh my memory of the works that have been devoted to the text, and to familiarize myself with those I had previously neglected.

I am telling you this to beg your pardon for having discussed the last part first. I did so because I think it's the best part. Of course, on the basis of the very method that I am teaching you, what I see in the text must be greeted by you with some reservations. It is here that I run the greatest risks – you should be grateful to me for running them in your stead. Let this serve simply as an introduction to your commentaries, which should not so much target what I am going to tell you about what I've understood, as what is in the text itself. The latter, after what I tell you, will seem to you to be what attracted my attention. Whether my understanding of it be true or false, the signifiers that justify it in the text are impossible for you to ignore, even if you understand them differently than I do.

I will thus skip the first few pages, pages which are always found in Plato's dialogues. This dialogue is not like the others, but one nonetheless encounters here a situation constructed to create what I called the illusion of authenticity – distance, indications of transmission, of who repeated what another told him. This is always the way Plato attempts to create a certain depth at the outset, and it no doubt serves, in his eyes, to amplify what he has his characters say.

56 I will also skip over the rules I mentioned last time, the laws of the symposium. I indicated that the laws were not simply local or improvised, but based on a prototype. A symposium was something that had its laws – although no doubt not exactly the same ones everywhere, in Athens and in Crete, for example.

I will skip over all these references, in order to come to the unfolding of a ceremony that involves something that must have a name – a name which, I might mention in passing, can be debated – a "eulogy" of love. Is it ἐνκώμιον (enkómion) or is it ἐπαίνεσις (epaínesis)? I will skip that discussion – it is of interest, but only of secondary interest. Today I would simply like to situate the progression of events through the succession of speeches.

The first speech is made by Phaedrus. Phaedrus is another rather odd character. His character traits should be traced, although this is not terribly important. For the time being, you should simply know that it is odd that he is the one who proposed the topic, who is the πατὴρ τοῦ λόγου (patér toú lógou) [177d], the father of the topic, for we know him a bit from the beginning of the Phaedrus – he's a curious sort of hypochondriac. This may serve us a bit further on.

Now that I think of it, let me take the opportunity to apologize for something. When I spoke to you about darkness last time, I referred, I don't know why, to the Phaedrus. It occurred to me later that it is not the Phaedrus which begins with nighttime, but the Protagoras. That corrected, let us proceed.

Phaedrus, Pausanias, and Eryximachus. Aristophanes was supposed to have spoken before Eryximachus, but he had the hiccoughs and let Eryximachus speak before him. It is a perennial problem to figure out why Aristophanes, the comic poet, was there with Socrates, when everyone knows that he didn't just criticize Socrates, but ridiculed and defamed him in his comedies. Indeed, historians generally hold him partly responsible for Socrates' condemnation and tragic fate. There is no doubt a profound reason for his presence here, as I said, for which I am not offering, no more than anyone else, a final answer. But perhaps we can try to shed a few dim rays of light on the question.

Then comes Agathon, and after Agathon, Socrates. This constitutes what is, strictly speaking, the symposium, that is, everything that happens up until the crucial moment which, as I pointed out last time, should be considered essential: Alcibiades' entrance. 57
The latter is accompanied by the breaking of all the rules of the symposium, if nothing else by the mere fact that Alcibiades shows up drunk, declares himself to be essentially drunk, and is thereby immersed in drunkenness as such.

Suppose you were to claim that the Symposium is of interest primarily because it shows how difficult it is to say something about love that holds water. If that were all that were at issue, we would be purely and simply mired in full-blown cacophony. But what Plato shows – at least this is what I maintain, and it is not especially audacious to do so – in a way that is never revealed or brought to light, is that the contour traced out by this difficulty indicates to us the point at which lies the fundamental topology which stops us from saying anything about love that holds water.

What I am saying here is not very new. No one dreams of disputing it, certainly none of the people who have studied this so-called "dialogue" – in quotes, because it is barely a text that deserves such a title, as it is a series of eulogies, a series of ditties or drinking songs in honor of love. Since, of course, the speakers at the symposium are a bit smarter than others, it takes on more importance. Moreover, we are informed that it is a topic that is not often selected, which might surprise us at first.

We are told that each person transposes the topic into his own key. But we don't really know why, for example, Phaedrus is given the task of introducing it from the standpoint, we are told, of religion, myth, or even ethnography. And, in effect, there is some truth in all of that. Our Phaedrus introduces love by telling us that it is μέγας θεὸς (mégas theós), a great god. That's not all he says, but he refers to two theologians, Hesiod and Parmenides, who, for different reasons, spoke of the genealogy of the gods, which is of great significance. I don't feel obliged to go into Hesiod's Theogony and Parmenides' Poem just because a verse of each is quoted by Phaedrus. I will nevertheless mention that two or three years ago, maybe four, a very important study of Parmenides' Poem came out, by a contemporary of ours by the name of Jean Beaufret. But let us leave that aside and try to figure out what there is in Phaedrus' discourse.

There is thus a reference to the gods in it. Why to the gods in 58 the plural? I don't know what meaning the gods may have for you, especially the gods of Antiquity, but they are spoken about enough in this dialogue for it to be rather useful, if not necessary, that I answer as if you had asked me, "What do you really think of the gods? Where are they situated in relation to the symbolic, imaginary, and real?" It is not a pointless question by any means. Right up to the end of the Symposium, the question at issue is whether or not love is a god, and we make at least some progress by the end of the dialogue inasmuch as we know with certainty that it is not.

I am not going to give you a class in this context on the sacred. It will suffice if I make a few formulaic statements about the topic. The gods – insofar as they exist for us in the register that allows us to make headway in our practice, if it is true that my three categories are of any use to us whatsoever – quite certainly belong to the real. The gods are a mode by which the real is revealed.

This is why all philosophical progress tends, by its own inherent necessity, to eliminate them. And it is why Christian revelation, as Hegel so astutely remarked, is also situated along the path of their elimination – it is a bit more advanced, it goes a little further down the road that leads from polytheism to atheism. Compared to the notion of god as the height of revelation, of numen, as real shining and appearance – this is fundamental – the mechanism of Christian revelation is indisputably situated along the path that leads to the reduction and, in the final analysis, abolition of the notion. Indeed, it tends to displace the God of Christian revelation – and the same is true of dogma – onto the Word, Logos. Stated differently, it is situated on a path parallel to that trodden by the philosopher, insofar as he is destined to deny the gods.

Man will thus seek in Logos, in other words, at the level of signifying articulation, the revelations he encountered up until then in the real – in the real in which what revealed itself was, moreover, real – through the real that displaces [the God of Christian revelation].

This is what any investigation does which, at the outset of the philosophical approach, tends to articulate itself as science, and Plato teaches us, rightly or wrongly, faithfully or unfaithfully [au vrai ou au pas vrai], that this was what Socrates was doing. Socrates demanded that we not be content with that to which we have this 59 innocent relation known as δόξα (dóxa) [opinion], and which is – why not, for God's sake? – sometimes right [vrai], but rather that we ask why, that we be satisfied only by the assured truth [vrai assuré] which he calls ἐπιστήμη (epistéme): science, knowledge that provides its reasons. This, Plato tells us, was the point of Socrates' φιλοσοφεῖν (philosopheín) [philosophizing].

I have already mentioned what I called Plato's Schwärmerei. One must indeed believe that something of his enterprise remained stymied in the end, since the rigor and talent deployed in demonstrating such a method didn't stop so many things in Plato's work from being used by all the mystagogies. I am speaking above all of gnosis and of everything in Christianity itself which has always remained gnostic. The fact remains that it is clear that what Plato liked was science. How could we hold it against him for not having followed this path all the way, right from its very first step?

Whatever the case may thus be, to introduce the problem of love, Phaedrus refers to the notion that love is a great god, almost the oldest of the gods, born right after Chaos, Hesiod says. Love is also the first god thought of by the mysterious goddess, the primordial Goddess of Parmenides' poem.

We cannot now determine – and the enterprise is perhaps impossible to carry out in any case – everything these terms might have meant in Plato's day. But try, nevertheless, to entertain the idea that the first times people said these things, they could not possibly have had the appearance of stupefying provincialism they had, for example, in the seventeenth century in which, when one spoke of Eros, everyone played at it. In the 1600s, it was situated in a wholly different context, that of courtly culture, with echoes of L'Astrée, and all that followed – namely, words with no import. Here words have their full import, and the discussion is truly theological.

To convey this import, I have found nothing better than to tell you – if you really want to grasp it – to get a hold of Plotinus' second Ennead, where you will see that what he is talking about is situated at approximately the same level. Eros is at issue there too; in fact, it is the only thing at issue there. You cannot, if you have at least cursorily read a theological text on the Trinity, fail to notice that Plotinus' discourse – written at the end of the third century A.D. – 60 is, if we change but three words in it, quite simply a discourse on the Trinity. Zeus, Aphrodite, and Eros are the Father, the Son, and the Holy Spirit. I say that simply to allow you to imagine what is at stake when Phaedrus speaks of Eros.

For Phaedrus, to speak of love is, in short, to speak of theology. It is very important to realize that his speech begins with such an introduction, as for many people even today, and especially in the Christian tradition, for example, to speak of love is to speak of theology.

But his speech does not stop there. It continues with an illustration of these ideas. The type of illustration employed is also quite interesting in its own right.

For it speaks to us of divine love, and specifically of its effects.

3

The eminence of love's effects depend on the degree of dignity they involve.

We encounter here a theme which has since worn a bit thin in the rhetoric that has grown up around love – namely, that love is a bond against which no human effort can prevail. An army made up of beloveds and lovers – the implicit classic illustration is the famous Theban legion – would be invincible, inasmuch as the beloved for his lover, and the lover for his beloved, are eminently able to represent the highest moral authority, that before which one does not yield, that before which one cannot bring dishonor upon oneself. This notion leads, at its most extreme, to love as at the heart of the ultimate sacrifice.

I find it noteworthy that Euripides' version of Alcestis surfaces here, illustrating once again what I formulated for you last year as what delimits the zone of tragedy – namely, the between-two-deaths. I will summarize it: King Admetus is a happy man, but a man to whom death has suddenly signaled its imminence. Alcestis [the king's wife], the incarnation of love, is the only one who is willing to take the king's place to satisfy death's due – the only one among all the relatives, including the king's elderly parents who in 61 all probability have very little time left to live, and the king's friends and children.

In a speech in which it is essentially male love that is discussed, this may seem remarkable, and it is worth keeping in mind. Alcestis is thus offered up to us as an example. This lends import to what is to come. Indeed, two examples follow on that of Alcestis, both of which, in the words of the orator, were also situated in the field of the between-two-deaths.

The first, Orpheus, managed to descend into hell to seek out his wife Eurydice. As you know, he came back up empty-handed because of a mistake he made, that of looking back before he was allowed to. This mythic theme is reproduced in many legends of other civilizations than Greece, one of which is a famous Japanese legend. The other example Phaedrus provides is that of Achilles.

Showing you what results from a comparison of these three heroes is as far as I can take things today. It is a first step which will already put you on the scent.

Let us consider first Phaedrus' remarks about Orpheus [179d]. What interests us here is Phaedrus' commentary – not whether he gets to the bottom of things, nor whether it's justified – we cannot go that far. What concerns us is what he says. And it is precisely the strangeness of what he says that should attract our attention.

He tells us that the gods did not at all appreciate what Orpheus, son of Oeagrus, did. The reason he gives is found in the interpretation he proposes of what the gods did to the guy, who was not so great as all that, who had gone soft [amollī] – we don't know why Phaedrus has got it in for him, or why Plato does either. The gods didn't show him a real woman, but rather the wraith of a woman. This echoes what I began my talk with earlier regarding the relation to the other – namely, the difference between the object of our love insofar as our fantasies cover it over, and the other's being, insofar as love wonders whether or not it can reach it.

In death, Alcestis truly takes the place of or substitutes for the other's being, according to Phaedrus. You will find a term in the text, and you won't be able to say that I put it there – ὑπεραποθανεῖν (hyperapothaneín). The substitution or metaphor I was telling you about earlier is literally realized here. Alcestis authentically takes Admetus' place. Paul Ricoeur, who has the Greek text open before 62 him, can find ὑπεραποθανεῖν at 180a. Orpheus having been eliminated from the contest for merit in love, this expression is provided to signal the difference between Alcestis and Achilles.

The case of Achilles is rather different. He is the one who chooses ἐπαποθανεῖν (epapothaneín). He is the one who will follow me. He follows Patroclus in death.

To understand what this interpretation of Achilles' gesture would have meant to an ancient Greek would warrant a great deal of commentary. It is much less clear than the case of Alcestis. We are forced to consult Homer's texts, where it turns out that Achilles in fact had a choice. The question is whether or not to kill Hector merely to avenge Patroclus' death. "If you don't kill Hector," his mother Thetis tells him, "you will return home in peace, and you will live happily to a ripe old age. If you kill him, your fate is sealed – it is death that awaits you." Achilles doesn't doubt what she says, for there is another passage where he himself has the thought, as an aside, "I could leave in peace." But then, it's unthinkable, and he says why. This choice is considered, all by itself, to be as decisive as Alcestis' sacrifice. The choice of Moira, fate, has the same value as the substitution of being for being.

There is really no need to add to this, as Mario Meunier, who is otherwise a fine scholar, does in a footnote (why he does so, I don't know) that in what follows Achilles kills himself on Patroclus' tomb. I have looked a great deal into Achilles' death the past few days, as it bothered me, and I can't find a reference anywhere in the legend of Achilles which would allow one to say such a thing. I have, moreover, seen a great many versions of Achilles' death, certain of which attribute to him activities that are rather curious from the vantage point of Greek patriotism, as he is supposed to have betrayed the Greek cause for the love of Polyxena, who is a Trojan woman. This would diminish some of the import of Phaedrus' speech.

Sticking to the speech itself, what is important is that Phaedrus gives detailed consideration to the respective functions of Patroclus and Achilles in their erotic bond. He sets us straight: "Don't imagine for a minute that Patroclus was the beloved, as was generally 63 believed. It turns out," says Phaedrus, "upon careful scrutiny of the characteristics of the characters, that the beloved could only have been Achilles, who was younger and still beardless." I am highlighting this because the question is constantly raised whether one must love them before or after their beards begin to grow. The Greeks talk of nothing else. We encounter this discussion of beards everywhere. We can thank the Romans for having done away with this problem for us. There must be some reason for it. In any case, Achilles didn't have a beard. Therefore he must have been the beloved. Patroclus was ten years older than Achilles. A careful examination of the texts shows that Patroclus must have been the lover.

That's not what interests us – it is simply the first indication of something that bears a relation to what I specified as the target starting from which we are going to make headway. Indeed, what the gods find sublime, more marvelous than anything else, is when the beloved behaves as one would expect a lover to behave. With respect to this point, the example of Alcestis is strictly opposed to that of Achilles.

What does this mean? It is what the text says. One cannot imagine why Phaedrus would tell this whole story that runs on for two pages if it were of no importance. You think I am exploring the Carte du Tendre [the Map of the Tender Feelings], but it isn't me, it's Plato. And it is very well articulated. One must deduce therefrom what forces itself upon us. Since Phaedrus explicitly contrasts Achilles with Alcestis, and tips the scales in favor of giving the gods' love prize to Achilles, this means that Alcestis was in the position of the erastés, of the lover. It is insofar as Achilles was in the position of the beloved that his sacrifice was so much more admirable than hers.

In other words, the entire theological speech by Phaedrus, the hypochondriac, culminates in pointing out that what I earlier called the signification of love leads to this. Its most sensational, remarkable, sanctioned appearance, crowned by the gods who give Achilles a special place on the Isles of the Blest – as everyone knows it is an island that still exists at the mouth of the Danube, on which they have now stuck an insane asylum or some sort of reform school – is precisely related to the fact that in this case a beloved behaved like a lover.

I won't be able to go any further today, but I would like to end with something suggestive, which will perhaps allow us to raise a practical question here. It is the following: in an erotic couple, it is, 64 on the whole, on the side of the lover that one finds activity in the natural position, so to speak.

This remark will be full of consequences for us if, in considering the Alcestis/Admetus couple, you are willing to glimpse something that lies especially within your ken due to what we discover in psychoanalysis about what women can experience regarding their own lack. Why not formulate, at a certain level at least, that in a couple, a heterosexual couple in this case, we find in the woman both lack, as we say, but also, and at the same time, activity?

In any case, Phaedrus never suspects that it could be otherwise. Now what do we find in the other half of the couple? In the beloved, erómenos? – or to put it in the neuter, ἐρώμενον (erómenon), for what is it that one "eromenoses," one errs or loves, in this whole story of the Symposium? It is something that is very often put in the neuter: τὰ παιδικά (tá paidiká) [darling]. It is the object. What this designates – namely, a neuter function – is associated with the function of what is loved. It is in the beloved that we find the element of strength.

You will see this in what follows, when we will have to articulate why the problem is situated at a more complex level when heterosexual love is at issue. At that level, it can be plainly seen that the distinction between activity and strength is useful. But it was important to pinpoint it at the moment at which we encounter it so clearly illustrated in the example of Achilles and Patroclus. It is illusory to think that strength is identical to activity, and that Achilles is not the beloved just because he seems to be stronger than Patroclus. This is refuted here in the text, and this is what we should learn from it in passing.

Having arrived at this point in his speech, Phaedrus gives the floor to Pausanias, who for centuries has been taken to express Plato's opinion regarding love for boys.

I will take special pains in dealing with Pausanias. He is a very odd character indeed, and is far from deserving the esteem in which he has been held, having been considered to have Plato's imprimatur. He is, in my view, an altogether episodic character, who is never theless important from a certain vantage point – inasmuch as the 65 best comment to jot down in the margin next to his speech is the Christian truth that the kingdom of heaven is off-limits to the rich.

I hope to show you why next time.

November 30, 1960

67

IV

THE PSYCHOLOGY OF THE RICH

PAUSANIAS

The myth of the beloved's molting.
The rules of Platonic love.
Calvinist love.
Kojève and Aristophanes' hiccoughs.

Today I am going to try to make some headway in my analysis of the Symposium, as it is the path I have chosen by which to present you the topic of transference this year.

Last time we proceeded as far as the end of the first speech, that by Phaedrus. You know which speeches follow – those by Pausanias, Eryximachus, Aristophanes, and Agathon, the host of the symposium at which Aristodemus was present. From start to finish it is Apollodorus who narrates, repeating what he heard from Aristodemus. Socrates speaks after Agathon, and you will see how unique the path is that he takes to express what he knows love to be. You know that the last episode is Alcibiades' entrance, an astonishing public confession in its quasi-indecency, which has remained an enigma to all commentators. There is also something after that entrance, but we'll come to that later.

I would like to avoid leading you along this path step by step, speech by speech, in such a way that you will, in the end, be either lost or bored, or lose sight of the goal toward which we are headed. This is why I began class last time with these words about the object, the object's being: we can always tell ourselves, with more or less good reason, but always with some reason, that we have missed it – that we have failed it.

I will come back to the other's being, this being that it was fitting for us to try to reach while there was still time, indicating what is at 68 stake in relation to the two main terms of what is, in this case, called "intersubjectivity."

1

When people invoke intersubjectivity, they are claiming that we must recognize in the other a subject like ourselves. Access to the other's being supposedly lies quintessentially in this direction.

But there is also another direction, one that I indicate when I try to articulate the function of desire in the apprehending of the other as it occurs in the erastés-erómenos couple, which has been the organizing principle of all reflection on love from Plato right up until Christian reflection.

I think I have already indicated clearly enough that, in desire, the other as a being [l'être de l'autre] is not a subject. Erómenos is erómenon, in the neuter, and also tá paidiká, in the neuter plural – things about the beloved child, one might translate it. The other, insofar as he is aimed at in love, is, as I said, aimed at as a beloved object.

What does this mean? What can we say we have missed in he who is already too far away for us to make good our having failed him? It is clearly his quality as an object. What sparks off the movement involved in the access to the other that love gives us is the desire for the beloved object, which I would compare, if I wished to illustrate it, to a hand that reaches out to pick a fruit when it is ripe, to draw close a rose which has opened, or to stir a fire, the logs of which suddenly burst into flames.

Try to follow me so that you will grasp what I'll say next. With this image, which I won't develop any further, I am sketching out before you what is known as a myth. You will see it in the miraculous character of what follows. Last time I told you that the gods, the starting point in the Symposium – mégas theós, love is a great god, Phaedrus says right at the outset – are a manifestation of the real. Now any shift from this manifestation to a symbolic order distances us from the revelation of the real.

Phaedrus tells us that Love is the foremost of the gods imagined by the Goddess in Parmenides' Poem. Jean Beaufret, in his book, identifies the Goddess with truth – with better reason I think than with any other function – with the radical structure of truth. Recall 69 the way I talked about it in "The Freudian Thing." Truth's first imagining or invention is Love. Hence Love is presented to us here as having no father or mother. There is no genealogy of Love. Yet already in Hesiod's work, in the most mythical forms of the presentation of the gods, a genealogy is sketched out: a system of kinship, a theogony, or a symbolism.

What is the Christian God – who, owing to His internal organization, is at the midpoint about which I spoke to you between theogony and atheism, this trine God, one and yet three – if not the radical articulation of kinship as such, of what is most irreducibly and mysteriously symbolic about it? The most hidden relationship – and, as Freud says, the least natural, the most purely symbolic – is that of father to son. The third term remains present there, going by the name of love.

This was our point of departure: Love is a god, in other words, a reality that manifests and reveals itself in the real. As such, we can only speak of it through myth. This is also what allows me to lay out before you our orientation here, by directing you toward the formula, metaphor, or substitution of erastés for erómenos. This metaphor generates the signification of love.

To illustrate it for you, I will take the liberty of completing my image and of truly making it into a myth.

The hand that extends toward the fruit, the rose, or the log that suddenly bursts into flames – its gesture of reaching, drawing close, or stirring up is closely related to the ripening of the fruit, the beauty of the flower, and the blazing of the log. If, in the movement of reaching, drawing, or stirring, the hand goes far enough toward the object that another hand comes out of the fruit, flower, or log and extends toward your hand – and at that moment your hand freezes in the closed plenitude of the fruit, in the open plenitude of the flower, or in the explosion of a log which bursts into flames – then what is produced is love.

But we must not stop there. We must say that what we are looking at here is love – in other words, that it's your love when you were first erómenos, the beloved object, and suddenly you become erastés, he who desires.

70 Consider what I mean to emphasize with this myth. Every myth is related to the inexplicable nature of reality [réel], and it is always inexplicable that anything whatsoever responds to desire.

The structure in question is not one of symmetry and reciprocity [retour]. For this symmetry is not symmetrical, since insofar as the hand extends, it extends toward an object. The hand that appears on the other side is the miracle. But we are not here to orchestrate miracles. We are here for something quite different – to know. What must be emphasized in this context is not what happens between here and the hereafter, but rather what happens here – in other words, the substitution of erastés for erómenos (or for erómenon).

A few of you thought there was some vagueness in what I articulated last time concerning the metaphorical substitution of erastés for erómenos, feeling it contradicted the supreme example to which the gods award the crown, before which the gods themselves are astonished, ἀγασθέντες (agasthéntes) [179c and 180a]. Namely, that Achilles, the beloved, epapothaneín, dies, let's say – to remain imprecise for we will see what this means – for Patroclus, which is why Achilles is superior to Alcestis who offered to die instead of the husband whom she loves. The term used by Phaedrus to describe her, hyperapothaneín, is contrasted with epapothaneín. She dies in the stead, ὑπέρ (hypér), of her husband. The case of Achilles is different, because Patroclus is already dead.

Alcestis changes places with her husband who is called upon by death – she crosses the space I mentioned earlier which is between the one that is here and the hereafter. She does something that serves to wrest from the gods a disarming testimony before this extremity, that wins her the singular prize of being able to come back among human beings from death as what lies beyond [life].

But there is something still more remarkable, as Phaedrus explains. It is even more remarkable that, instead of returning to his land to be with his father amid his fields, Achilles accepted his tragic destiny, his fatal destiny, the certain death that was promised to him, if he avenged Patroclus. Now Patroclus was not his beloved. Achilles was the beloved. Phaedrus claims – rightly or wrongly, and this is of little consequence to us – that Achilles was the beloved of the couple, and that he could have occupied only that position. Through his action, which comes down to accepting his fate as it was written, he places himself, not in the stead of, but rather in the wake of Patroclus. He makes of Patroclus' fate the debt he must pay, the debt with which he must come to terms. And this is what 71 commands, in the eyes of the gods, the most necessary and the greatest admiration, for the level attained by Achilles in the order of love's manifestations is, as Phaedrus tells us, higher. Achilles is more honored by the gods, inasmuch as it is they who judge his action. They are full of admiration, strictly speaking, and simultaneously astonished – for they are overwhelmed by the value of love as they see it manifested by humans. To a certain extent, the gods, being impassive and immortal, are unable to understand what happens at the mortal level. They detect a certain gap between themselves and mortals, and view what happens in the manifestation of love as a miracle.

Emphasis is thus placed in Phaedrus' speech, where epapothaneín is contrasted with hyperapothaneín, on the fact that Achilles, erómenos, turns into erastés. The text says so and affirms it – it is as erastés that Alcestis sacrifices herself for her husband, and this is a less radical, total, and brilliant manifestation of love than the switching of roles that takes place in Achilles when he changes from erómenos into erastés.

Thus it is not a question, in this erastés over erómenos, of a relation whose amusing image would be that of the lover over the beloved, "the father over the mother," as Jacques Prévert says somewhere. This is no doubt what led Mario Meunier to make the bizarre error I mentioned to you of claiming that Achilles kills himself on Patroclus' tomb. One cannot say that Achilles, as erómenos, replaces Patroclus, since Patroclus is already out of range, already out of reach. The event that is, strictly speaking, miraculous in itself is that Achilles the beloved becomes the lover.

This is how the phenomenon of love is brought into the Symposium's dialectic.

2

We cannot take up Pausanias' speech in all its details, line by line, because of time constraints. We must punctuate [scander] it.

You have all read the Symposium in enough depth for me to say that this speech begins with the distinction between two orders of 72 love. Love, says Pausanias, is not one. We must determine which kind of love we should praise. Enkómion and épainos, which for some reason I called epaínesis last time, are slightly different in nuance. The praising, épainos, of love must thus begin with the fact that love is not one. The distinction is based on its origin. "Love and Aphrodite are inseparable" [180d], he says, but there are two Aphrodites.

One Aphrodite has nothing to do with women – she had no mother, for she was born from the projection onto Earth of the rain engendered by the primal castration of Uranus by Cronus. Urania – that is, Heavenly Aphrodite – was born therefrom, and thus owes nothing to sexual difference.

The other Aphrodite was born somewhat later, from the union of Zeus and Dione. Let me remind you that the whole history of the advent of he who governs the present world, Zeus, is linked – see Hesiod – to his relations with the Titans who are his enemies, and Dione is a Titaness. I will not stress the point any further. The Aphrodite born of man and woman is called Pandemos [or Common Aphrodite]. The deprecatory, scornful tone is explicit in Pausanias' speech – she is the common Venus, altogether plebian, the Venus of those who confuse one form of love with the other, who seek it at base levels, who do not make love into the kind of elevated subjugation that Uranian Aphrodite provides.

Such is the theme around which Pausanias' speech develops. Unlike Phaedrus' speech – which is a myth lover's [mythomane] speech, in the strict sense of the word, a speech about a myth – Pausanias' speech is a sociologist's discourse, or rather, for that would be exaggerating, the discourse of an observer of societies. Everything in it apparently hinges on the diversity of positions in the Greek world with respect to higher love, the kind of love that develops between those who are both the strongest and the most vigorous, and who are also the most intelligent, ἀγαθοὶ (agathoí) [181e], who know how to think – in other words, between people situated at the same level owing to their capacities: men.

Customs, Pausanias tells us, differ greatly between Ionia and Persia, on the one hand, where this kind of love – he adduces evidence of this – would be disapproved of, and Elis and Sparta, on the other, where this love is more than simply approved of, since it appears to be very unseemly for the beloved to refuse to grant his favors to his lover: he must χαρίζεσθαι (charízesthai) [gratify, 182b]. The Athenians seem to Pausanias to have a superior apprehension of the rite, so to speak, of the social shaping of love relationships.

If Pausanias approves of the fact that the Athenians erect obsta- 73 cles, forms, and prohibitions – at least this is how, in a more or less idealized form, he presents it to us – it is because these practices correspond to a certain goal. This love quite deliberately manifests itself, is borne out, and is established over a certain span of time, and what's more, over a span which is comparable, he says formally, to that of marriage. There is a love contest, ἀγωνοθετῶν (agonothetón) [184a] – love presides over struggle and rivalry among candidates, by putting to the test those who compete for the position of lover. May the best man win.

This ambiguity is oddly maintained for a full page. Where do we situate the virtue or function of he who chooses the winner? For while Pausanias would like he who is loved to be at least a bit more than a child, and already capable of some discernment, he is in any case the one of the two who knows the least, the one who is least capable of judging the virtue of what one could call the beneficial relationship between the two. This is left to a kind of test [184a] between the two. Virtue is also found in the lover – namely, in the way in which his choice is made, according to what he seeks in the beloved. What he seeks in the beloved is something to be given to the beloved. Both are going to meet up at a point that Pausanias refers to somewhere as the place where "these two principles [of conduct] coincide absolutely" [184e], at which the conjunction or combining takes place. What is it really?

It has to do with an exchange. The lover, as Léon Robin translates it in the text of the Budé edition, shows that he is able to contribute something whose object is intelligence, φρόνησις (phrónesis), and the whole of the field of merit or excellence, ἀρετὴ (areté). The beloved needs to gain in education, and generally in knowledge, παιδεία (paideía) and σοφία (sophía). They will meet up here and, according to what Pausanias says, constitute a partnership at the highest level [184e]. It is at the level of κτάομαι (ktáomai) – an acquisition, profit, acquiring, or possession – that this couple comes together, and this couple will forever articulate the so-called higher form of love: the love which, even once the partners have changed, will be called "Platonic love" for centuries to come.

Reading this speech, it seems to me very difficult not to realize under what heading such a psychology falls. The whole speech is elaborated in terms of a valuation [cotation] of values, a search for listed values [valeurs cotées]. The point is clearly to invest one's 74 psychic funds properly. If Pausanias demands somewhere that severe rules – I'm referring back to the earlier part of his speech – be imposed on the blossoming of love and the courting of the beloved, these rules are justified by the fact that too many favors, πολλὴ σπουδὴ (pollé spoudé) – here the investment I just mentioned is clearly at stake – should not be expended or wasted on young things who aren't worth it [181d–e].

This is, moreover, why we are requested to wait for them to be further along in their development so that we know what we are dealing with. Later on, Pausanias says that those who muddle the order of candidacy [postulance] and merit are savages and barbarians. In this respect, access to the beloved must be limited, he says, by the same kinds of prohibitions and laws by which we strive to impede access to freeborn women, it being through such women that two families of masters are united. These women represent in themselves whatever you like in terms of a name, value, firm, or dowry, as we call it today. This is why they are protected by orders. It is a comparable protection which must prohibit those who are not worthy of it from gaining access to the desired object.

The further you go in this speech, the more you see what I mentioned at the very end of the last class – namely, the psychology of the rich.

Rich people existed before the rise of the bourgeoisie. Even in agricultural or still more primitive economies, the rich exist. The rich have existed and manifested themselves since the beginning of time, if nothing else in their periodic spending on lavish festivities. The first duty of the rich in primitive societies is to spend money on luxuries.

It is quite strange that, as societies evolve, this duty seems to shift to a secondary or at least clandestine level. But the psychology of rich people is entirely based on the fact that what is at stake in their relations with others is value. It is a question of what can be valued according to the available modes of comparison and scale, of what can be compared in open competition, which is, strictly speaking, that of the possession of goods.

What is at issue is possession of the beloved, because he is a good fund of capital – the very word is there, χρηστὸς (chrestós) [183e] – and a lifetime will not be enough to turn it to good account. As we know from Aristophanes' comedies, several years after this sympo- 75 sium Pausanias takes things a bit further with Agathon, who is the beloved here as everyone is well aware, even though he's already had hair on his chin – which is of great importance in this context – for many moons.

Agathon is 30 years old [at the time of the symposium], and has just won first prize in the competition for the best tragedy. Pausanias runs away with him years later to what Aristophanes calls the Isles of the Blest, namely, a place far away, not just in the countryside, but in a distant land. It is not Tahiti, but Macedonia, where he remains for as long as his safety is assured. Pausanias' ideal in matters of love is sheltered capitalization, the stocking up of what rightfully belongs to him because he has been able to discern it and put it to good use.

We can, I think, discern the successor of this type of character, as we glimpse him in Plato's dialogue, in another type that I will designate for you rapidly because he's located at the other end of this chain.

He's someone I met, not in analysis – I wouldn't talk to you about him if he were – but I got to know him well enough for him to open up his heart, or what passed for one in his case, to me. He was quite famous and was reputed to have a lively feeling of the limits imposed, in love precisely, by a rich person's position. He was an excessively rich man, and had – and this is no metaphor – safes full of diamonds, because you never know what might happen. It was right after World War II, and the whole planet could have gone up in smoke.

He was a rich Calvinist. I apologize to any of you who are of this faith. I don't believe that it is the privilege of Calvinism to create rich people, but it is not unimportant to mention this detail, for one can nevertheless observe that Calvinist theology has had the effect of bringing to light as one of the elements of moral guidance that it is on Earth that God rewards the people he loves with plentiful goods. Elsewhere as well perhaps, but it starts here on Earth. The idea that observance of the divine commandments brings success here on Earth did not fail to bear fruit in all sorts of enterprises. Be that as it may, the Calvinist in question treated the order of merits he acquired here on Earth for the afterlife exactly as he would have treated entries in an account book: "Such 76 and such an object bought on such and such a day." All of his actions were directed toward acquiring a well-stocked safe for the hereafter.

Digressing in this way, I don't want to seem to be telling a facile apologue, but it is impossible not to complete the picture with a sketch of his matrimonial fate. One day he knocked someone over on the street with the bumper of his humungous car, despite the fact that he always drove very carefully. The person who had been run over shook it off. She was pretty and a concierge's daughter, which is not altogether incompatible with being pretty. She reacted coldly to his apologies, even more coldly to his proposal to indemnify her, and still more coldly to his proposals to go have dinner together. In short, as his access to this miraculously encountered object became more and more difficult, his opinion of her grew higher and higher. "Here is a sure value," he said to himself. All of which led him to marriage.

We find here the same theme as that laid out in Pausanias' speech. For Pausanias tells us to what extent love is a value. Consider for a minute, he tells us, that we forgive everything done in the name of love. If, in order to obtain a position, a public function, or some social advantage, a man resorted to the least of the extravagances that we allow when it comes to relations between a lover and the person he loves, he would be dishonored: he would be guilty of what one might call moral baseness, ἀνελευθερία (aneleutheria), for that is what flattery, κολακεία (kolakeia), entails. Flattery is not a worthy means for a master to use to obtain what he desires.

Thus the more something goes off the red-alert value charts [cote d'alerte], the better we can gauge what love is. It is the same basic register as the one that led my good Calvinist, accumulator of goods and merits, to in effect have an amiable wife for a while, provide her of course with jewels – which every evening were taken off her body and placed in a safe – and then end up in a situation whereby one day she ran off with an engineer who made 50,000 francs a month.

I don't want to seem to be overdoing it on this score. Pausanias' speech is curiously presented to us as an example of the fact that there is, in love in Antiquity, some kind of glorification of the moral quest. Even before we get to the end of his speech we notice that it 77 clearly shows the error of any ethics that latches only onto what one might call outward signs of value.

Indeed, Pausanias cannot do otherwise than end his speech by saying that, if everyone accepted the primacy of these fine rules by which value is granted only on the basis of merit, what would happen? Let us read a translation of 185a–b:

> Only in this case, we should notice, is it never shameful to be deceived; in every other case it is shameful, both for the deceiver and the person he deceives. Suppose, for example, that someone thinks his lover is rich and accepts him for his money; his action won't be any less shameful if it turns out that he was deceived and his lover was a poor man after all. For the young man has already shown himself to be the sort of person who will do anything for money – and this is far from honorable. By the same token, suppose that someone takes a lover in the mistaken belief that this lover is a good man and likely to make him better himself, while in reality the man is horrible [κακὸς (kakós), fundamentally vile], totally lacking in virtue; even so, it is noble for him to have been deceived.

Strangely enough, people generally try to see in this the first manifestation in history of what Kant called righteous intention. It seems to me that it is truly to lapse into a singular error not to see instead the following.

We know from experience that the entire ethics of educational or pedagogical love, in matters of homosexual and even heterosexual love, always involves some sort of illusion. It is this illusion which, in the end, rears its ugly head. You may, at some point, have had someone – and, as we are talking about Greek love, [we'll take a homosexual example] – brought to you [for treatment] by his protector, assuredly with the best of intentions on the latter's part. I doubt you have seen any patently Good effect stem from this more or less enthusiastic protection, concerning the development of he who has been designated to you as the beloved – that is, as the object of a love that presents itself as a love of the Good, love for the acquisition of the best goods. This is what allows me to tell you that this is far from being Plato's opinion.

Indeed, Pausanias' speech concludes rather abruptly, I must say, with lines [185e] that say more or less the following: "Uranian love, that's the good stuff, and those who don't have it, well, let them 78 resort to the other, Pandemos, common Venus, the great scoundrel, who doesn't have it either. They can go fuck off if they want it. It's on that note," he says, "that I will conclude my speech on love. As for the plebs and their common love, I have nothing more to say." If Plato agreed with that, do you think that we would see what occurs immediately afterward?

3

Immediately afterward, Apollodorus speaks in his own name, saying "Παυσανίου δὲ παυσαμένου" (Pausaníou de pausaménou), "Pausanias having paused" [185c].

The expression is difficult to translate, and there is a short footnote which says that "no French expression corresponds to" it, the "numerical symmetry of the syllables" being important; "there is probably an allusion; see the introduction to the volume." Léon Robin wasn't the first to have raised an eyebrow at this expression. Already in Henri Estienne's edition we find a marginal note. Everyone has raised an eyebrow at this "Pausaníou de pausaménou" because they sensed something intentional here. I will show you that people have not realized exactly what it was.

Immediately after having made this clever remark, Apollodorus emphasizes that it is a pun – "You see, I have learned from the masters to ἴσα λέγειν (ísa légein), to speak by isology." One can translate this as a play on words, but isology is truly a technique. I will spare you an account of all the efforts that have been made to find out who the master was. Was it Prodicus [of Ceos]? Or was it Isocrates instead? There is iso in Isocrates, and it would be particularly iso to isologize Isocrates. This leads to problems – you cannot begin to imagine what these problems have generated by way of research! Were Isocrates and Plato buddies?

People reproach me for not always citing my sources – well, starting today, I have decided to do so. Here my source is Ulrich von Wilamowitz-Moellendorff, a sensational character. If you can read German and you come across his books, buy them. I would love to have his book on Simonides [of Ceos]. He was an erudite German from the beginning of the century, an exceptional person whose works on Plato are truly enlightening. He is not the person I'm refer-79 ring to here concerning "Pausaníou de pausaménou," for he didn't pay any particular attention to this bit of banter.

I don't think there is any reference here [at 185c], however distant, to the way in which Isocrates handles isology when it comes to demonstrating, for example, the merits of a political system. The whole discussion that you find on this point in the preface to the Symposium by Léon Robin is surely interesting, but it has no bearing on the problem. Here's why.

My mind was no doubt already made up concerning the import of Pausanias' speech, and last time I even explained my impression completely in telling you that it is the epitome of the Christian curse that what is most worthwhile is forever refused to the rich. But I think I had a confirmation of that, which you will be the judge of, last Sunday when I was – I am continuing to cite my sources – with Kojève. I would be distressed if I had neglected to tell you of his importance in my own training, and I think certain people here know that I am indebted to him for having introduced me to Hegel's works.

I was thus with Kojève and, of course, since I'm always thinking of you, I spoke with him about Plato. Kojève is doing something that has nothing to do with philosophy now, for he's an eminent man. But he nevertheless writes from time to time a couple of hundred pages on Plato, producing manuscripts that circulate in various places. He shared with me on this occasion a number of things he very recently discovered in Plato, but he could tell me nothing about the Symposium because he had not reread it, and because it does not fall within the ambit of his current work.

Thus my efforts were not rewarded, although I was very encouraged by many things he told me about other aspects of Plato's work, namely, about the following, which is quite obvious – that Plato hides from us what he thinks just as much as he reveals it to us. It is thus only as a function of each individual's abilities – in other words, up to a certain limit which assuredly cannot be gone beyond – that we can glimpse it. You shouldn't hold it against me, therefore, if I don't give you the last word on Plato, because Plato has clearly decided not to give it to us.

At this point, when everything I am telling you about Plato has perhaps led you to open up the Phaedo, for example, it is important that you realize that the goal of the Phaedo is perhaps not entirely to 80 demonstrate, appearances notwithstanding, the immortality of the soul. I would even say that its goal is obviously the contrary. But let us set that aside.

As I was saying goodbye to Kojève, I remarked to him, "We didn't get around to speaking about the Symposium very much." And as Kojève is a very, very proper guy, in other words, a snob, he replied, "In any case, you will never be able to interpret the Symposium if you do not know why Aristophanes had the hiccoughs."

I had already told you that this was very important. It is obviously very important. Why would he have the hiccoughs if there were no reason for it?

Naturally, I had no idea why he had the hiccoughs. But encouraged by this little prod, I said to myself, "Let's take another look at it." I did so quite reluctantly, as a matter of fact, expecting merely to once again come across boring speculations on the value, perhaps even the psychosomatic value, of hiccoughing and sneezing in Antiquity. I very distractedly opened up my copy again, and looked at the text where "Pausaníou de pausaménou" appears, for it is immediately thereafter that Aristophanes is to be given the floor, and I noticed that for 16 lines [185d–e] the only topic of conversation is how to stop his hiccoughs. When will his hiccoughs stop? Will they stop, or won't they? If they don't, you take this kind of thing, and in the end they will. Such that with the παῦσαί (paúsai), παύσωμαι (paúsomai), παύσῃ (paúsei), παύεσθαι (paúesthai), παύσεται (paúsetai), and the Pausaníou de pausaménou at the beginning, we find seven repetitions of paus in these lines, making for an average interval of two and a seventh lines between the occurrences of this constantly repeated word. If you add to this the occurrences of "it will" or "it will not help," and the "I will do what you told me to do," where the term ποιήσω (poiéso) [to make] is repeated with almost equal insistence, the homophonies and isologies come up every line and a half. Hence it is extremely difficult not to see that, if Aristophanes has the hiccoughs, it's because throughout Pausanias' discourse he's been splitting his sides laughing – and Plato has been doing the same.

In other words, the fact that Plato gives us something like "it's tempting to tempt temptation," and then repeats for 16 lines the word "tempting" and the verb "to tempt," should make our ears prick up. There is no other example in any of Plato's texts 81 of a passage so directly similar to certain passages in the Vermot Almanac. Which brings up one of the authors I cut my teeth on – I read for the first time a Platonic dialogue by Courteline in the Vermot Almanac that is called "Theodore Looks for Matches," which is truly a kingly portion.

I think my claim is sufficiently clear that, for Plato himself, insofar as he speaks here through Apollodorus, Pausanias' speech is quite ridiculous.

As we don't have much time left, I will not analyze for you the speech that follows, that of Eryximachus, who speaks instead of Aristophanes. We will discuss the meaning of the doctor's speech on the nature of love next time.

We will also see something that I think is much more important – Aristophanes' role. His speech will take us a step further, making it the first step that really enlightens us, even if it didn't enlighten Antiquity's readers, to whom Aristophanes' speech always remained enigmatic, like an enormous mask. It involves a dioecisme, διασχισθησόμεθα (diaschisthisómetha) [193a], as he puts it, a being separated in two, a Spaltung or splitting,* which, while not identical to what I have developed for you with the Graph of Desire, is certainly not totally unrelated.

After Aristophanes' speech, we will look at Agathon's speech. I can already tell you, so that you know where we are going between now and next time – and here I need no scholarly preparation to showcase this feature – that there is but one thing that Socrates articulates when he speaks in his own name and that is that the speech given by Agathon the tragic poet isn't worth a wooden nickel. People say that it is in order to spare Agathon's feelings that Socrates has himself replaced, so to speak, by Diotima and gives us his theory of love from her lips. I absolutely cannot see how one can spare the feelings of someone who has just been executed. And this is precisely what Socrates does to Agathon.

I beg of you, starting now, to broach the crux of the matter, if only to raise objections if there's any reason to do so. After all the fine things that Agathon, in his turn, says of love – not all the good things [biens] about love, all the profit that can be drawn from love, but all its virtues and beauties, for nothing is too good to be chalked up to love's credit – what does Socrates articulate? In one fell swoop, 82
Socrates undercuts all of that, bringing things back to their root, by asking, "Love? Love of what?"

From love we thus shift to desire. And the characteristic of desire, insofar as Ἔρως ἐρᾷ (Éros . . . erá) [200a], that is, Eros desires, is that what is at stake – in other words, what desire is supposed to bring with it, beauty itself – is lacking in it, ἐνδεής (endeés) [and ἐνδεὴς, 200e, 201b], ἔνδεια (éndeia). In these two terms, desire is lacking; desire is in itself identical to lack. Therein lies the entire personal contribution Socrates makes in his own name in his speech in the Symposium.

Starting from this, something is going to begin, something that is far from attaining the status of anything you can hold in the palm of your hand. And how would that even be conceivable? Up until the end, on the contrary, we get mired ever deeper in the shadows, and we will find here the ever darker night of Antiquity. Everything there is to be said about the conception of love in the Symposium begins here.

December 7, 1960

83

V

MEDICAL HARMONY

ERYXIMACHUS

On the supposed science in love.
From the good to desire.
Medicine and science.
The path of comedy.

It is important to see the nature of the undertaking into which I have been drawn, in order for you to be able to put up with the detours, insofar as they may be fastidious. For, after all, you don't come here to listen to me comment on a Greek text, in the treatment of which I do not claim to be exhaustive.

I do the majority of the work for you, in other words, in your stead, in your absence, and the best service I can do you is to incite you to look at the text. If you have looked at the text at my suggestion, it will perhaps happen that you read to some extent with my glasses. Which is probably better than not reading at all.

We must not lose sight of what we are destined to arrive at, the goal that dominates this whole undertaking, and you must grasp in what respect you can accompany it, providing more or less commentary on it. We are trying to answer the question from which we began – the simple question of transference.

1

In saying that this question is simple, I mean that it involves terms that have already been elaborated.

Here is a man, a psychoanalyst, from whom people seek knowledge [science] of what is most intimate about them – this is truly 84 the state of mind with which people commonly approach him – and thus of what should immediately be assumed to be most foreign to him. And yet, at the same time, what we encounter at the beginning of an analysis is that he is assumed to have this knowledge [science].

I am defining the situation here in subjective terms, in other words, from the perspective of the person who requests to do an analysis. For the time being we needn't bring in everything this situation objectively implies and that sustains it – namely, the specificity of what is proposed in this science, in other words, the unconscious as such. The subject has no notion of that, whatever his wishes to the contrary may be.

Defined simply in this subjective way, how does this situation generate something – as a first approximation – akin to love? One can, roughly speaking, define transference as something like love.

Let me try to put this better and go a bit further. Transference is something that calls love into question, calling it into question deeply enough, from the vantage point of analytic reflection, to have introduced what is known as "ambivalence" as an essential dimension of it. This is a new notion compared to the philosophical tradition whose very origins we are, not fruitlessly, investigating here. The close connection between love and hate is absent at the beginning of this tradition, if we situate this beginning – one must situate it somewhere – as Socratic.

But today we are going to see that there is something prior to it that serves as its point of departure.

I would not be sticking my neck out so very far by raising this question – which articulates the possibility of the emergence of transference – if, in some way, the tunnel hadn't already been started at the other end. We are going toward something that we know, having already seriously studied the topology of what the subject must find in analysis in the place of what he is seeking. If he sets off in search of what he has, but does not know he has, what he discovers is what he is lacking in. It is precisely because I have articulated this before that I dare raise the question that I first formulated. What he finds in analysis is articulated in the form of what he is lacking – namely, his desire.

Desire is not a good [un bien] in any sense of the term. It certainly 85 is not a good in the sense of a κτῆσις (ktésis) [180b provides κτῆσιν (ktésin)], something one could have in some way. An inversion must be detected in the time – "time" defined in both chronological and topological senses – it takes for transference love to blossom, which turns the search for a possession [un bien] into the realization of desire.

You understand, of course, that when I say "realization of desire," I assume that it is clearly not possession of an object. Indeed, it involves the emergence of desire as such in reality. This is what led me to present the Symposium to you this year. It was not an accidental encounter. But as I was seeking, in the midst of my memories, where to find the central axis of what I have been able to retain in what I have learned, guided by some compass deriving from experience, it seemed to me that the Symposium, regardless of how far it is from us, is the place where the meaning of this question is debated in the most vibrant way, particularly the moment which concludes it at which Alcibiades appears.

Alcibiades breaks in strangely, in all senses of the term, both at the level of the dialogue's composition and in the supposed scene. All of a sudden, the series of ordered speeches, announced in the Symposium's agenda, is manifestly broken by the eruption of the true party – the upheaval this different order introduces. But Alcibiades' words themselves also constitute an avowal of his own discordance. What he says truly reflects his suffering, his having been ripped apart by Socrates' attitude, which still leaves him wounded, almost as much as at the time [they had been seeing each other], bothered by some kind of strange wound.

Why does Alcibiades make this public confession? And why does Socrates make the interpretation that Alcibiades' confession has an immediate aim – namely, to separate Socrates from Agathon – an interpretation that immediately leads to a return to order? All of you who have looked at this text since I began speaking about it have been struck by what this strange scene has in common with all sorts of instantaneous situations and positions that occasionally arise in the transference. This remains impressionistic, and it will require a much closer and more finely honed analysis to see what is delivered up to us by a situation that is manifestly not to be attrib-86 uted to a sort of "presentiment of sychanalisse," as Aragon calls it in his Traité du Style. No, it is rather an encounter – the appearance of several outlines that are revealing to us.

I have been taking my time in showing this to you not simply in order to get a running start before the leap which must be, as Freud says, that of a lion – in other words, a single bound. I have been doing so because, in order to understand the full meaning of the scene between Alcibiades and Socrates, we must understand the general design of the work. It is indispensable to map out the terrain. If we do not know what Plato means by presenting this scene, it is impossible to situate its import.

We have now arrived at the speech given by Eryximachus, the medical doctor.

2

Let us hold our breath for a moment. The fact that he is a physician should pique our interest.

Should Eryximachus' speech lead us to do research on the history of medicine? I could not even sketch out such a task for all sorts of reasons. First of all because it's not our concern here, and this detour would be rather excessive. Second, because I don't truly believe it would be possible.

I don't think that Eryximachus is specified, in other words, that in bringing in this character Plato has a particular doctor in mind. But the fundamental features of his position remain to be examined. They are not necessarily historically accurate features, except insofar as they provide a very general dividing line [between positions or schools], but they will perhaps give us pause to reflect for a moment, in passing, on what medicine is.

Others have already noted that Socrates makes frequent references to medicine. When he wishes to bring his interlocutor to the level of dialogue where he intends to direct him toward the perception of a rigorous approach, he often refers to some technician's art. If you want to know the truth about such and such a subject, he often asks, who would you ask? And among the technicians, doctors are far from being excluded. They are even treated with special reverence. They are certainly not situated, in Socrates' eyes, at a lower level than the others. It is nevertheless clear that the rule of the medical approach cannot be reduced to any sort of intellectual hygiene.

The doctor in question here, Eryximachus, speaks as a doctor, 87 and he immediately declares medicine to be the greatest of all the arts. Medicine is the great Art.

I will only briefly mention that we find confirmation here of what I said to you last time about Pausanias' discourse. In beginning, Eryximachus expressly formulates the following: "Since Pausanias, after a fine beginning" – which is not a very good translation for ὁρμήσας (hormésas) [185e] – "having given a fine thrust at the beginning of his speech, did not end as brilliantly, as appropriately," etc. It is thus clear to everyone that Pausanias' speech ended badly – this is taken to be obvious. It must be said that our ears are not exactly attuned to that, and that we don't have the impression that Pausanias' speech concluded as badly as all that. We are, after all, used to hearing such idiotic claims about love. It is all the more strange to see to what extent Eryximachus' words meet with everyone's approval, as if everyone found Pausanias' speech woolly-headed, and as if all the crude jokes about pausaménou were transparent to Antiquity's readers.

I think it is rather essential that we articulate what we can gather about these matters of tone, to which the mind's ear always pays attention, even if it doesn't openly make a criterion of it. Socrates refers to tone all the time, in Plato's texts. How often, before beginning his own speech, or making an aside in someone else's speech, does he invoke the gods in a formal way, so that the tone will be sustained, maintained, and harmonized. As you will see, this is very close to the heart of my theme today.

Before taking up Eryximachus' speech, I would like to make a few comments whose retrospective nature, although it leads us to some first truths, still is not easily spelled out. I will show you in passing that medicine has always considered itself scientific. It is in your stead, as I was saying earlier, that over the past few days I have tried to make sense of this brief chapter in the history of medicine. In order to do so, I obviously had to leave behind the Symposium and look at various other parts of Plato's opus.

88 As neglected as this aspect of your medical training may have been, you have heard of a series of schools in Antiquity. The most famous, the school that no one is unaware of, is that of Hippocrates. Prior to that there had been the Cnidus school in Rhodes, and even before that, a school headed by Alcmaeon centered in Croton, whose speculations are impossible to dissociate from those of a scientific school that flourished at the same time and in the same place – namely, that of the Pythagoreans. But to speculate on the essential role and function of Pythagoreanism in understanding Plato's thought would, as you know, involve a detour in which we would literally get lost. Instead I will try to bring out the themes that are strictly related to our topic – namely, the meaning of the Symposium as a work, insofar as it is problematic.

We don't know very much about the character Eryximachus himself, but we know certain things about a number of other characters who appear in Plato's dialogues, and who are directly related to Alcmaeon's medical school, inasmuch as the latter is itself related to the Pythagoreans. For example, Simmias and Cebes, who speak with Socrates in the Phaedo, are disciples of Philolaos, one of the masters of the first Pythagorean school. If you look back at the Phaedo, you will see that their answers to Socrates' first propositions on what must ensure the immortality of the soul include the exact same terms as Eryximachus' speech – first and foremost, the notion of ἁρμονία (harmonía), harmony or concord [accord].

Medicine, as you can see here, has always considered itself scientific. It is in this respect, moreover, that it has always showed its weaknesses. Through a sort of internal positional necessity, it has always referred to the science of its era, whether good or bad. Good or bad, how can you know that from the vantage point of medicine?

My sense is that our science – our physics – is good science, but that for many centuries we had very poor physics. This is, in fact, quite clear. But what is not clear is what medicine should do with science. In other words, how, through what opening, from what end, should medicine approach science? For something has not been elucidated in medicine, which can hardly be considered negligible, 89 since it concerns the very idea of health.

What is health? You would be wrong to believe that even in modern medicine – which believes itself to be scientific compared to all other forms of medicine – it is completely clear. From time to time, the ideas of normality and pathology are proposed to some student as a dissertation topic, in general by people with training in philosophy. There is, on that subject, an excellent book by Canguilhem, his Essai sur quelques problèmes concernant le normal et le pathologique (The Normal and the Pathological), but its influence is obviously quite limited in strictly medical circles. Without attempting to speculate at the level of Socratic certitude about the very idea of health, we can say that what show – all by themselves, especially for we psychiatrists and psychoanalysts – how problematic the idea of health is, are the very means we use to achieve a state of health. To put it in more general terms, these means show that, whatever the nature of health and the propitious form that supposedly corresponds to health may be, we are led to postulate, at the crux of this propitious form, paradoxical states, to say the least – states whose manipulation in our therapies is responsible for the return to an equilibrium which, on the whole, remains rather unexamined.

This is what we find at the level of the postulates of the medical position that are least susceptible of demonstration. It is this very position that is maintained here in Eryximachus' speech by the name harmonia. We don't know what kind of harmony is involved, but the notion is truly fundamental to any medical position as such. All we have to seek is concord. And we haven't gotten much further than Eryximachus concerning the essence or substance of this idea of concord.

It is a notion that is borrowed from an intuitive domain and, in this respect, is simply closer to its sources. But it is also historically more defined, and more palpable, inasmuch as it is explicitly related to the field of music, which is taken as a model here. Concord is the Pythagorean form par excellence. And everything that is in any way whatsoever related to the concord of tones – even if it is of a more subtle nature, even if it is the tone of speech I mentioned earlier – brings us back to the same assessment. It was not idly that 90 I mentioned the ear in passing – the evaluating of consonances is essential to the notion of harmony.

As soon as you get into the text of this speech – I will spare you the boring chore of reading it line by line, which is never very easy with such a large audience – you will see how essential the notion of concord is to understanding the way the medical position is presented here.

3

Everything articulated here is a function of a medium that we can neither exhaust, nor in any way reconstruct – namely, the themes of prior discussions that we can assume to be present in the minds of the participants.

Let us not forget that we find ourselves at the historic climax of a particularly active era. The sixth and fifth centuries of Hellenism are overflowing with intellectual creativity. You can consult on this subject fine works, for example, for those of you who read English, a long book the likes of which only English publishers can afford the luxury of publishing, a book which is part and parcel of the philosophical legacy, Bertrand Russell having written it for us in his old age.

This volume makes a fine New Year's present – its wide margins are illustrated with admirable color illustrations that are extremely simple and aim at firing a child's imagination – and it contains everything one must know from the fertile period to which I am referring today, that of the pre-Socratics and Socrates, up until our times, in other words up until English positivism. No one truly important is left out. If your only concern is to be unbeatable at fashionable dinners, you will know everything once you've read this tome, except of course the only important things – namely, those that are not known. But I nevertheless recommend that you read the book. It is called Wisdom of the West. It will fill in for you, as it would for anyone, a considerable number of almost necessary lacunae in your store of general knowledge.

Let us try to organize what we see when we set out to understand what Eryximachus means.

91 The people of his time find themselves faced with exactly the same problem as us. And yet they go more directly to the essential antinomy. Is it because they don't have such an abundance of minute facts with which to fill out their discourse? That hypothesis is based on deception and illusion. This antinomy is clearly the one that I began to bring out for you earlier – in any case, we cannot allow ourselves to take any sort of concord at face value. Experience teaches us that concord hides something in its bosom, and the whole question is to know what can be required of the concord's underpinnings – from the point of view of what cannot be decided by experience, it always involving, as it does, something a priori, apart from which it cannot be posited.

Must we require similarity at the heart of concord or can we remain satisfied with dissimilarity? Does every concord assume some principle of concord? Can that which is in tune [l'accordé] come out of what is out of tune? Come out of conflict? Don't imagine for a minute that it was Freud who first raised this question. The proof is that it is the first issue Eryximachus' speech raises. The notion of discord and concord – for us, in other words, the notion of the function of anomaly compared to normality – has pride of place in his speech, starting at about the ninth line, 186b:

> Dissimilar subjects desire and love objects that are themselves dissimilar. Therefore, the love manifested in health is fundamentally distinct from the love manifested in disease. And now recall that, as Pausanias claimed, it is as honorable to yield to a good man as it is shameful to consort with the debauched . . .

Here we are led to the question of physical health, and of what this virtue [health] and this disorder [dérèglement] signify.

We immediately find a formulation that I can but point out on the page. Not that it gives us much, but it should nevertheless be of interest to analysts in passing. For there is some rustling here that should hold our attention. Eryximachus tells us, and this is a word-for-word translation, that "medicine is the science of the erotics of bodies," ἐπιστήμη τῶν τοῦ σώματος ἐρωτικῶν (epistéme ton tou sómatos erotikón) [186c]. No better definition, can, it seems to me, be given of psychoanalysis.

He adds, πρὸς πλησμονὴν καὶ κένωσιν (pros plesmonén kai kénosin), "in regard to repletion and depletion," to quote the brutal translation. What I wish to underscore here are the two terms "full" and "empty" – whose role we shall see in topology and in intellectual 92 positions – and what is at stake at this meeting point of physics and medical practice. This is not the only text in which "full" and "empty" are mentioned. It is one of the fundamental intuitions that should be highlighted in the course of any study of Socratic discourse.

He who would engage in such an enterprise would not have to go far to find an additional reference. See the beginning of the Symposium. Socrates is dawdling in the foyer of the neighboring house, where we can imagine him in the position of a gymnosophist, standing on one foot like a stork, totally immobile until he has found the solution to some problem. He shows up at Agathon's later than everyone expected him to. "So, you found your thing! Come sit by me," Agathon says to him. And Socrates replies something like, "Maybe, and then again maybe not, but what you are hoping for is that what I now feel full of will pass over into your emptiness, like what happens between two vases when a bit of wool is strung between them" [175c–d]. This amusing physics experiment must have been, for some unknown reason, conducted quite often, as this allusion was probably telling for everyone present. The movement from the inside of one vase to another, the transformation of the full into the empty, the communication of contents, is one of the main images that regulates what one could call the "fundamental covetousness" of all these philosophical exchanges. It should be kept in mind in trying to understand the meaning of the speech proffered here.

A little further on one finds a reference to music as a principle of concord, which is the basis of what is offered up to us as the essence of the function of love between beings. This brings us, on the next page, in section 187, to the choice which is vivid in Eryximachus' speech and which I told you was primordial concerning the subject of what can be conceived of as at the crux of concord – namely, the similar and the dissimilar, order and conflict.

When it comes to defining harmony, Eryximachus notes the paradox found in the work of an author who preceded them by about a century, Heraclitus of Ephesus [187a]. Indeed, Heraclitus explicitly referred to the opposition of contraries as being the principle of composition for every unit [or One; unité]. The One is 93 constituted, Eryximachus tells us, by "being at variance with itself," "like the attunement of a bow or a lyre." This ὥσπερ ἁρμονίαν τόξου τε καὶ λύρας (hósper harmonían toxou te kai lýras) is extremely famous, if only for having been cited here in passing. But it is cited in the work of many other authors as well, and has been handed down to us in several scattered fragments that German scholars have collected concerning pre-Socratic thought. Among those that remain by Heraclitus, this one is truly central. In the book by Bertrand Russell that I recommended to you earlier, you will in fact find an illustration of a bow and its cord, showing the vibration that leads to the arrow's flight [p. 24].

What is striking is Eryximachus' evident bias, the reason for which we do not immediately see, against Heraclitus' formulation. He thinks it must be modified. It seems that he must have criteria whose source we cannot easily fathom. We find ourselves here at a crossroads where we are in no position, above all regarding characters so far in the past, so phantomlike, to determine how much should be attributed to prejudice, a priori judgment, choices made in accordance with a certain consistency of themes in a theoretical system, or psychological tendencies. We must confine ourselves to noting that there is, in fact, something here that is echoed in many other places in Plato's discourse. Some aversion is expressed here to the idea of referring to any conjunction of contraries whatsoever, even if one situates it in reality [réel], as involved in the creation of a phenomenon which seems to me to have nothing to do with it – namely, that of concord. It seems that when it comes to concerning oneself with the idea of harmony – to speak in medical terms, of diets and doses – the idea of measure and proportion must be maintained at its very core. Heraclitus' vision of conflict as in itself creative can in no way be defended here to certain people's satisfaction – or perhaps to certain schools' satisfaction, a question we shall leave in abeyance.

I do not share Eryximachus' bias. All kinds of models in physics have given us the idea of the fecundity of contraries, contrasts, and oppositions, and the notion of an absolute non-contradiction of a phenomenon with its opposing principle. On the whole, physics supports far more the image of waves than that of forms, Gestalts, "whole forms" [la bonne forme], despite what modern psychology has made of them. We cannot fail to be surprised, it seems to me, at 94 finding maintained here, and elsewhere in Plato's work, the idea of some kind of impasse or aporia, some kind of preference one must have for the necessarily fundamental character of concord with concord or of harmony with harmony.

4

If you look at the Phaedo, a dialogue that constitutes an extremely important backdrop for our understanding of the Symposium, you will see that the whole discussion with Simmias and Cebes is based on the notion of harmony.

As I was telling you last time, Socrates' whole argument for the immortality of the soul is presented in the Phaedo in a way that clearly takes the form of a sophism, which is no other than that around which my remarks revolve – namely, that the very idea of the soul qua harmony excludes the possibility of its rupture. When his two interlocutors object that this soul, whose nature implies constancy, permanence, and duration, could easily vanish at the same time that the corporeal elements – whose conjunction constitutes the soul's harmony – disperse, Socrates answers by saying nothing more than that the idea of harmony in which the soul participates is in itself impenetrable, and that it would slip away or take flight at the very approach of whatever could call its constancy into question.

The idea that anything whatsoever that exists could participate in the Platonic idea as incorporeal essence proves to be fictional in nature, an illusion. Things go so far in the Phaedo that it is impossible not to remark that there is no reason to believe Plato was any less aware of this illusion than we are. Our claim to be more intelligent than the person who wrote Plato's work is quite unbelievable, unimaginable, and truly astounding.

This is why, when Eryximachus sings his little song, without it immediately having any obvious consequences, we can ask ourselves what Plato meant by having this series of sallies take place in this particular order in the Symposium. At least we have realized that Pausanias' speech, which immediately precedes this one, is 95 ridiculous. And if we keep in mind the overall tone that characterizes the Symposium, we certainly have the right to wonder whether what is at stake isn't consonant with comedy as such. In discussing love, it is clear that Plato chose the path of comedy.

Everything will confirm this in what follows, and I have my reasons for beginning to assert it now, at the moment at which our famous comedian is going to take center stage. People have been trying to figure out for ages why Plato had him come to the Symposium in the first place. It is scandalous, because this famous comedian was one of the people responsible for Socrates' death.

The Phaedo, namely, the drama of Socrates' death, is presented to us with the lofty character lent it by the tragic tone with which we are familiar. It is not, however, quite so simple, since there are also comic elements in it, but tragedy dominates and it is staged for us. In the Symposium, on the contrary, there is not one single aspect of the dialogue that cannot be suspected of comedy, right down to the incredibly short speech Socrates makes in his own name.

So as to leave nothing out, I would like to respond to one of my auditors whose presence honors me most, and with whom I had a short discussion on the subject. Not without reason, motive, or accuracy, my interlocutor thought he had noticed that I was taking Phaedrus' speech at face value, unlike that of Pausanias. Well, in the sense of what I am asserting here, Phaedrus' speech, in referring to the gods' assessment regarding the topic of love, has no less ironic value than that of Pausanias. For, in fact, the gods cannot understand anything about love. The expression "divine stupidity" should, in my book, be more widespread. It is often suggested by the behavior of the beings we address precisely when it comes to love. Asking the gods to take the stand and give testimony about what is at stake in love seems to me, in any case, not to be discordant with what follows in Plato's discourse.

Here we are on the verge of Aristophanes' speech. But we won't turn to it just yet. I would simply like to bid you to complete, with your own means, what remains to be seen in Eryximachus' speech.

It was an enigma to Léon Robin that Eryximachus relied on the opposition of Heavenly and Common love, given what he says about the medical – physical – handling of love. In fact, I think that astonishment is truly the only fitting attitude we can adopt in 96 response to Robin's astonishment, for the question is clarified in Eryximachus' own speech, confirming the context in which I have been trying to situate it for you.

While Eryximachus refers to astronomy in relation to the effects of love in section 188, it is inasmuch as the harmony with which one must try to converge [confluer, s'accorder] concerning the fine order of the health of men is the very same harmony that dictates the order of the seasons. When it is the kind of love in which people get carried away, in which there is hubris or excess, the kind that prevails during certain seasons, then disasters begin, and mayhem ensues, "destruction," as he expresses himself – damage, under which heading fall epidemics, but also frost, hail, blight, and a whole slew of other things [188b].

This brings us back to a context in which we can use the notions that I propose, as the most far-reaching categories to which we are forced to refer if we are to found a valid discourse about analysis – namely, the imaginary, the symbolic, and the real.

People are surprised that a Bororo identifies with a macaw. Doesn't it strike you that it isn't in the least a question of primitive thought, but rather of a primitive position of thought concerning what thought is about for everyone, for you and for me? Questioning not his place, but his identity, man must situate himself, not on the inside of the limited enclosure which is his body, but in the total, crude reality [réel] he deals with. We cannot escape the law whose consequence is that we will always have to situate ourselves at the precise point of this delineation of reality [réel], which constitutes the progress of science.

In Eryximachus' time, no one had the slightest idea what a living tissue as such was, and it is thus out of the question that the doctor could make anything else of humors than humidity, in which natural vegetation can proliferate in the world. The disorder that leads men to excess owing to intemperance and to getting carried away is the same disorder that leads to the disorders of the seasons enumerated here.

Chinese tradition presents us with the Emperor accomplishing with his hand the major rites upon which the balance of the whole 97 Middle Kingdom depends, tracing out the first furrows at the beginning of the year whose direction and straightness are designed to ensure the balance of nature. There is nothing in this position, I dare say, that isn't natural. Eryximachus endorses the notion of man as microcosm, that is, not that man is in himself a synopsis or image of nature, but that man and nature are one and the same – one wouldn't dream of composing man of anything but the order and harmony of cosmic components. Hasn't this position, despite what we think we have reduced biology to, left some traces in our intellectual presuppositions? I wanted to leave you with that question today.

Assuredly, to detect those traces is not as interesting as to notice where, at what more fundamental level, we analysts situate ourselves when, to understand ourselves, we use notions like the "death instinct." As Freud himself did not fail to recognize, it is an Empedoclean notion.

I will show you next time that the formidable gag constituted by Aristophanes' speech, manifestly presented as the entrance of a clown onto the scene of Athenian comedy, explicitly refers – I will provide you with proof thereof – to the cosmological conception of man. And on this basis I will show the surprising opening that results therefrom, an opening left gaping in the idea of love that Plato may have had.

I will go so far as to say that, in and of itself, the discussion of love leads to a radical ridiculing of the incorruptible, immaterial, superessential, purely ideal, participatory, eternal, and uncreated order, which is the order that all of Plato's work reveals to us – perhaps ironically.

December 14, 1960

VI

99

DERIDING THE SPHERE

ARISTOPHANES

From the universe to truth.
Socrates and his witness.
The clown [pitre].
Perfect motion.

My talk today will, I hope, pass through its winter solstice before the celestial conjunction.

Led by its orb, you may have felt we were getting further and further afield from the topic of transference. Rest assured, however, that today we will reach the nadir of this ellipse. From the moment we divined that there was something we could learn from the Symposium, and inasmuch as that turns out to be valid, it was necessary to take as far as we are going to today the analysis of important parts of the text that might seem to have no direct bearing on our topic.

But no matter, we are now involved in the endeavor, and once one has begun to follow a certain path in discourse, there is a sort of non-physical necessity that makes itself felt when we wish to take it all the way.

Our guide here is a discourse, Plato's discourse in the Symposium. Like a musical instrument, or rather a music box, it is full of all the significations to which it has given rise throughout the centuries, and this is why part of our effort here is to home in as closely as possible on its meaning. In order to understand and judge it, one cannot but mention the discursive context – in the sense of a concrete universal discourse – in which it is situated.

Let me try to make sure you are getting my point. It is not my goal, strictly speaking, to situate the Symposium historically. You certainly realize that such is not my method of commentary, and 100 that I always examine a discourse with an eye to what it leads us to understand. I do so even with discourses developed at a very distant era in which things we must understand were not clearly visible. But in the case of the Symposium, it is impossible for us not to consider the relationship between discourse and history – not how the discourse is situated in history, but how history itself arises from a certain way that discourse enters into reality [réel].

I must thus remind you that the Symposium is situated in the second century of the birth of concrete discourse about the universe. Let us not forget the philosophical efflorescence, so to speak, in the sixth century B.C. It was all the stranger and odder owing to the echoes or other modes of a sort of terrestrial chorus, heard at the same era in other civilizations, there being no apparent relationship among them. But I don't even want to so much as sketch out the history of the sixth-century philosophers, from Thales to Pythagoras or to Heraclitus and so many others. What I'd like to bring out is that for the first time in the Western tradition – the tradition discussed in the book by Bertrand Russell that I recommended to you last time – a discourse developed that deliberately targeted the universe, aiming to render it discursive.

At the beginning of this first step of science as wisdom, the universe appears as a universe of discourse. In a sense, there will never be any universe other than a universe of discourse. And everything we encounter from that era, right down to the very definition of the elements, whether four or more, bears the mark, seal, or stamp of the requirement or postulate that the universe must give itself over to the signifying order.

The point was not, of course, to find parts of speech [éléments de discours] in the universe, but rather parts that were organized the way speech is. All the steps articulated at that time by the advocates and inventors of this vast investigative movement show that, if one cannot discuss one of the universes thus formed in a manner that is coherent with the laws of speech [discours], it must be totally rejected. Recall the modus operandi of Zeno the dialectician who, when it came to defending his master, Parmenides, provided sophistical arguments designed to cast his adversary into an irremediable quandary.

Thus, as a backdrop to the Symposium, and in the rest of Plato's work as well, we see an attempt that is grandiose in its innocence:
101 the hope harbored by the first so-called physical philosophers to find the ultimate handhold on reality [réel] thanks to the guarantee provided by discourse. Discourse was, in the end, their only instrument of experimentation.

Please excuse me for not going into this topic at any greater length. I do not intend to give a talk on Greek philosophy. I am simply providing you with the minimal background you must have to interpret this particular text, if you are to judge it accurately.

1

I must first remind you that reality [réel] and a hold on reality [réel] did not have to be conceptualized at that time as correlated with a subject, even if it was a universal subject. Such a hold is correlated with a term that I will borrow from Plato, who, in the course of a digression in The Seventh Letter, names what is sought through the operation of the dialectic, τὸ πρᾶγμα (to prágma).

This is the very term I had to bring out last year in my discussion of ethics, and that I called "the Thing." It is not die Sache, an affair, [but rather das Ding] – you can understand the latter, if you prefer, as the main concern [la grande affaire] or ultimate reality. It is what the very thinking that takes it on and disputes it depends on, and such thinking is, so to speak, but one of the ways to put to prágma, the Thing, into practice. It is the essential praxis.

You should realize that theory, the word for which – theoria – arose at that very time, as contemplative as it may be made out to be, is not merely contemplative, and the praxis out of which it grows, Orphic praxis, demonstrates this rather well. Theory is neither, as our use of the word implies, the abstraction of praxis, nor its general reference, nor the model of its application. Right from its very first appearance, theory is praxis itself. Theory is itself the exercise of power, to prágma, the main concern.

One of the masters of that era – and the only one I choose to cite, for, thanks to Freud, he is one of the patron saints of analytic speculation – Empedocles, in his no doubt legendary trappings (and his trappings are what are important, for they are the trappings that have been bequeathed to us), is all powerful. He claims to be master of the elements, able to resuscitate the dead, a magician, and a lord of the royal secret in the same land where charlatans with a similar style appeared later. People ask him for miracles and he performs 102 them. Like Oedipus, he does not die, but rather returns to the center of the world in the fire of a volcano and the abyss.

As you will see, this remains quite close to Plato. Thus it is no accident that, at a much more rationalist era, we quite naturally borrow his reference to to prágma.

But what about Socrates? It would be quite odd if the whole historical tradition were mistaken in saying that he contributed something original against this backdrop – a break or opposition. Socrates explains his position – insofar as we can trust Plato, who presents him to us in fact, presumably in the context of historical testimony – as involving a need to take a step back, feeling weary and disgusted by the contradictions generated by the first philosophical attempts as I have just characterized them.

It is Socrates who comes up with the new and essential idea that one must first guarantee knowledge. To show everyone that they know nothing is a path that is in itself revealing – it reveals a virtue which, in its finest successes, does not always succeed. In what Socrates calls epistéme, science, what he finds, in the end, what he brings out or detaches, is that discourse engenders the dimension of truth. Discourse, which is ensured by a certainty inherent in its very action, ensures truth as such wherever it can. It is nothing but this practice of discourse.

When Socrates says that it is not him but rather truth itself that refutes his interlocutors, he demonstrates something whose most solid feature is its reference to a primitive combinatory, which, as the basis of our discourse, is always the same. The upshot being, for example, that your father is not your mother, and that it is by the same token, and by this token alone, that one can declare that what is mortal must be distinguished from what is immortal. Indeed, Socrates refers the whole ambition of discourse to the domain of pure discourse. He is not, as people say, the one who brings man back to man or measures all things by man. Protagoras is the one who came up with the watchword, "Man is the measure of all things." Socrates brings truth to the level of discourse. He was, so to speak, a supersophist, and therein lies his mystery, for had he merely been a supersophist, he would have given rise to nothing more than the sophists did – namely, what remains of them: their dubious reputation.

103 It is something other than a temporal subject that inspired his action. Here we come to Socrates' atopía, to his unsituable side. This is what interests us. We sense here something that can enlighten us concerning the atopia that is demanded of us as analysts.

It is certainly on the basis of his atopia, of the "nowhereness" of his being, that Socrates sparked off a whole line of research – the facts attest to it. Its fate is linked, in an ambiguous fashion, to a whole history that can be broken down into the history of consciousness, as we say today, the history of religion, the history of morals or politics, and perhaps even the history of art, though certainly to a lesser extent. I could merely designate this whole ambiguous line, which is both widespread and vigorous, by mentioning the question trotted out anew by the most recent imbecile, "Pourquoi des philosophes?" ["What are philosophers for?"], if we didn't already sense that this line is part and parcel of the torch handed down, although it is in fact foreign to everything it illuminates – the Good, Beauty, Truth, the Same – even as it prides itself on dealing with them.

If we try to read Socrates' heritage [descendance], relying on contemporary or almost contemporary witnesses, as well as distant effects, the idea might come to us that it is a sort of perversion without an object.

In truth, when one tries to focus in on, approach, imagine, or get a fix on who this person could, in fact, have been, believe me, it's tiring. I can formulate the effect of this fatigue no better than with the words that came to me one Sunday evening: "This Socrates character is killing me." Strangely enough, I woke up the next morning in a much better mood.

It seems impossible not to begin by taking what is attested to by Socrates' entourage literally, right up to just before his death, which is that he said that, in short, we can fear nothing of a death about which we know nothing – and in particular, he added, we don't know that it might not be a good thing [Apology, 29a].

We are so used to hearing nothing but lofty sentiments in classical texts that, when we read this, we no longer pay any attention to it. But it is striking to bring this out in the context of Socrates' final days, when, surrounded by his remaining faithful students, he casts a last glance askance [regard en dessous], a glance Plato fixes on paper, for he was not present, that he calls the bull's look [Phaedo, 117b]. Consider his attitude during the trial. If the Apology repro- 104 duces exactly what he said to his judges, it is difficult to believe, in listening to his defense, that he did not want to die. In any case, he explicitly repudiates any pathos that might be seen in his situation, thereby provoking his judges, who were used to ritual supplications by the accused parties.

I am trying, this being a first approximation, to get at the enigmatic nature of a desire to die. It can, no doubt, be considered ambiguous, as we are dealing with a man who spent 70 years trying to satisfy this desire, and it is clear that it cannot be taken in the sense of a tendency toward suicide or failure, or in the sense of any kind of masochism, whether moral or otherwise. But it is difficult not to formulate the tragic minimum related to the deportment of this man in a sort of gratuitous no man's land* or between-two-deaths.

As you know, when Nietzsche discovered Socrates it went to his head. The Birth of Tragedy grew out of it, as did all of his subsequent work. The tone I am adopting in speaking to you of it no doubt indicates some impatience with it on my part, but it is nevertheless indisputable, and Nietzsche put his finger on it: it suffices to open almost any one of Plato's dialogues to see Socrates' profound incompetence every time he broaches the topic of tragedy. Look at the Gorgias – tragedy is touched on there and executed in three lines among the arts of flattery as one rhetoric among others, and there is nothing more to be said of it [502b–d]. Nothing tragic, no tragic sense of life, as we say nowadays, sustains Socrates' atopia, only a daemon. Don't forget this δαίμων (daimon or daemon), for Socrates talks about it incessantly.

This daemon seems to haunt him [l'hallucine] in order to allow him to survive in space, warning him of possible pitfalls: "Don't do that!" And then there is the message of a god, Socrates himself attesting to the role it played in what one might call his vocation. One of his disciples had the idea, a rather ludicrous idea it must be said, to go consult the god at Delphi, Apollo. The god up and answered, "There are several wise men, one of whom isn't bad, that's Euripides; but the wisest of them all, the crème de la crème, is Socrates." Following which, Socrates said to himself, "I must carry out the god's oracle. I didn't realize I was the wisest, but since he said so, I must be." Socrates presents the shift in his path toward public life in those terms. He is, in a word, a madman who believes 105 he is in the god's ordained service. He is a messiah and, what's more, finds himself in the company of chatterboxes.

There is no other guarantor of the Other's words than those very words, and no other source of tragedy than this very fate, which may seem to us in a certain sense pretty damn insignificant. All of this leads him to yield to the gods the better part of the ground about which I was speaking to you last time, that of the reconquest of reality [réel], the philosophical conquest – in other words, scientific conquest.

In this respect, if I tell you that the gods belong to reality [les dieux sont du réel], it is not in order to be paradoxical, like certain people have told me. You had a lot of fun, they said, in surprising us when you asked, "What are the gods?" Everyone expected you to say they are symbolic, and you had a good laugh in telling us they are real. Well, that is not at all the case. I'm not the one who invented this. To Socrates' mind, manifestly, the gods were real and real alone.

And this reality [réel], once we've given it its due, is nothing as regards the principle of Socrates' behavior, which aims only at truth. He is prepared to obey the gods on occasion, provided that one defines this obedience to him. Is this to obey them, or rather to ironically fulfill his responsibility to beings who also have their necessity? In fact, we sense no necessity here which does not recognize the supremacy and the necessity inherent in the deployment of truth – in other words, in science.

What might surprise us is the seductive power of such a severe discourse, which is attested to us here and there in one or another of the dialogues. Even when repeated by children or women, Socrates' discourse exercises an amazing [sidérant] charm, that's the word for it. Thus spoke Socrates – a force is transmitted that raises up those who approach him at the simple rustling of his words, Plato's texts always say, and certain say upon mere contact with him.

Observe furthermore that he does not have disciples but, rather, close friends. There are curious onlookers as well, not to mention the enthralled – santons as they are referred to in Provençal tales – people who are transported. Other people's disciples also occasionally come knocking at his door.

Plato is none of the above. He is a latecomer who is much too young to have been able to see anything but the end of the phenomenon. He was not one of the friends who were there during the last moments. And that ultimately accounts, let it be said in passing, for the style of testimony to which he holds fast every time he speaks of 106 his strange hero: "So and so heard it from so and so who was there, during such and such a visit when they had such and such a debate." In one case, he says he had the recording on the brain at first hand, and in another case, at second hand.

Plato is a very unusual kind of witness. One might say that he lies and on the other hand that he is truthful even when he lies, for in his very investigating of Socrates, it is Plato's own question that shows through [se fraye son chemin].

Plato is completely different from Socrates. He does not go about barefoot. He is no errant philosopher, nor does any god speak to him or call him. Indeed, it seems to me that the gods don't mean much to him. Plato is a master, a true master, a master from the time when the city was falling apart, carried away by the democratic winds that were a prelude to the great imperial forces – a sort of Marquis de Sade, but funnier.

Naturally, no one can ever imagine the nature of the powers the future holds in store. The great tumblers [bateleurs] of the world tribe – Alexander, Seleucus, and Ptolemy – all such mystical military men were still unthinkable. What Plato saw on the horizon was a communitarian city, as thoroughly revolting to his way of thinking as it is to ours. A well-organized stud farm [haras] for everyone, that is what he promises us in a pamphlet, which has always been the bad dream of all those who cannot get over the ever greater discord between society and their sense of the good. It is called the Republic, and everyone has taken it seriously, believing that it was what Plato truly wanted.

There are several other misunderstandings and mythical lucubrations. The myth of Atlantis, for example, seems to me rather to echo the failure of Plato's political dreams, and it is not unrelated to the venture of the Academy. But perhaps you will think that my paradox should be better corroborated, and this is why I will move on.

What Plato wants, in any case, is the Thing, to prágma.

Plato took up at a literary level the torch of the wise men from the century before. The Academy was a city, a refuge reserved for the best and brightest; and what we know of what he dreamt about during his trip to Sicily is situated in the context of that enterprise, whose horizon certainly went quite far. Curiously enough, such a dream came to him in the same places where his adventure echoes Alcibiades' dream, Alcibiades having clearly dreamt of a Mediterranean empire whose center would be Sicily. Plato's dream 107 bore the mark of higher sublimation. It is a sort of utopia of which he thought he could be the leader. In the case of Alcibiades, all of that obviously sinks to a lower level, and perhaps would go no further than the height of masculine elegance. But it would be to disparage this metaphysical dandyism not to see the range of which he was capable.

I think there are good reasons to read Plato's texts from the perspective of what I call his dandyism, and to see his writings as the outer trappings. I would go so far as to say that he tosses us, we dogs, little good and bad scraps of an often rather infernal sense of humor. But it is indisputable that he has been understood otherwise. The fact that Christian desire, which has so little to do with all these adventures, the fact that a desire whose crux or essence is the resurrection of bodies – read Saint Augustine to see the place this occupies – the fact that Christian desire saw itself in Plato, according to whom the body must dissolve in a supra-terrestrial beauty and be reduced to an extraordinarily decorporalized form, is a sign of utter and complete misunderstanding.

The delusional nature of the return of such a discourse in a context that is contradictory to it leads us precisely to the question of transference. What else could this be but Plato's fantasy, already asserting itself as a transference phenomenon? Don't imagine that these are but general considerations, for we are going to home in as closely as possible on them.

How did the Christians – to whom a god, reduced to the symbol of the Son, had given his life as a sign of love – let themselves be fascinated by the speculative inanity (recall the term I used earlier) offered up as fodder by the most disinterested of men, Socrates? Mustn't one recognize therein the effect of the only palpable convergence between the two creeds – the Word presented as an object of adoration?

One cannot deny that love has, in Christian mysticism, produced rather extraordinary fruits and follies, according to the Christian tradition itself. In contrast to that, it is important to delineate the scope of love in the transference produced around this other, Socrates, who was merely a man who claimed to know something about love, but who left only the most simply natural proof thereof.

Which is the fact that his disciples teased him for losing his head now and then for a handsome young man, and as Xenophon tells us, to have once, though it didn't go very far, touched the naked 108 shoulder of the young Critobulus with his shoulder. Xenophon tells us what resulted therefrom: it left Socrates sore – nothing more, but nothing less either. This is not insignificant for such a tried and true cynic – for we can already see in Socrates all the facets of the cynics. The anecdote proves how violent his desire was, but it also shows that love is a somewhat instantaneous function for him. In any case, it allows us to realize that to Plato these love affairs were sheer foolishness.

The mode of ultimate union with to prágma, the Thing, is certainly not to be sought in the meaning of effusive outpourings of love, in the Christian sense of the term. The reason why the only person who speaks of love suitably in the Symposium is a clown [pitre] – you will see what I mean by this term – need be sought nowhere else.

2

To Plato, that's all Aristophanes is: a clown. Comic poets are clowns, to Plato's way of thinking.

Aristophanes, who is, believe me, hardly one of the hoi polloí, is also an obscene character. Need I remind you what you find when you open any one of his comedies? The least of the things shown on the stage is the following, for example, something found in his play entitled Thesmophoriazusae: Euripides' relative disguises himself as a woman to expose himself to Orpheus' fate – in other words, to be ripped to shreds by the assembly of women in Euripides' stead. Given that women at that time removed their body hair, as they still do today in the Orient, the hair on his ass is burned before us onstage, and I will spare you the rest of the details.

His plays go beyond anything you can see nowadays except on the stage of a music hall in London, and that is saying a lot. The jokes are better, but are no more distinguished for all that. The term "Bugger" [cul béant] is repeated ten times in a row [The Clouds, 1080–1100] to designate the group from which it is appropriate to choose the people that today, in our languages, we would call the candidates most apt to play all the progressive roles, for Aristophanes has it in for them in particular.

109 In short, shouldn't the fact that, to say the best things about love, Plato chooses a character of this type – and what's more, one who played a role of which you are aware in slandering Socrates – get the old brain in gear?

I am going to immediately illustrate what I mean by emphasizing that Plato has him say the best things about love. Even as stuffy a scholar, careful and measured in his judgments, as Léon Robin – the academic who established the edition that I have before me – can sometimes be, even he could not fail to be struck by this. So much so that it made him cry, "Aristophanes is indeed the first to speak of love like we speak of it, and says things that get us choked up."

Aristophanes makes the following rather sophisticated remark, the kind of remark one does not expect from a buffoon, but this is precisely why Plato has him say it. "No one," he says, "would think it is ἡ τῶν ἀφροδισίων συνουσία (he ton aphrodisíon sunousía)" – it has been translated by "shared enjoyment of love" [communauté de la jouissance amoureuse], a translation that seems abominable to me, but Léon Robin provided a much better one in his translation in the Pléiade edition, "the sharing of sexual enjoyment" [partage de la jouissance sexuelle] – "no one would think [. . .] mere sex is the reason each lover takes so great and deep a joy in being with the other," in Greek, οὕτως ἐπὶ μεγάλης σπουδῆς (hoútos epí megáles spoudés) [192c]. It is the same σπουδή (spoudé) that we saw last year in Aristotle's definition of tragedy, and it means solicitude, care, and eagerness, but also seriousness. In fact, people who love each other have a funny seriousness about them.

But let us leave aside this psychological observation to designate wherein lies the mystery. Aristophanes tells us that it is something altogether different that their soul manifestly desires, something it is unable to express, but that it divines nevertheless, and that it proposes in the form of an enigma. "Suppose two lovers are lying together, and Hephaestus," more commonly known as Vulcan, the character with the anvil and hammer, > stands over them with his mending tools, asking, "What is it you human beings really want from each other?" And suppose they're perplexed, and he asks them again: "Is this your heart's desire, then – for the two of you to become parts of the same whole, as near as can be, and never to separate, day or night?

> 110 Because if that's your desire, I'd like to weld you together and join you into something that is naturally whole, so that the two of you are made into one. Then the two of you would share one > life, as long as you lived, because you would be one being, and by the same token, when you died, you would be one and not two in Hades, having died a single death. Look at your love, and see if this is what you desire: wouldn't this be all the good fortune you could want?"

>
> Surely you can see that no one who received such an offer would turn it down; no one would find anything else that he wanted. Instead, everyone would think he'd found out at last what he had always wanted: to come together and melt together with the one he loves, so that one person emerged from two. [192d–e]

This is what Plato has Aristophanes say, but that's not all. You know that Aristophanes tells some rather tall tales, which he himself claims to lie somewhere between the laughable and the ridiculous, depending on whether people laugh at what the comedian intended, or at the comedian himself. It is clear that Aristophanes makes people laugh, and that he goes beyond this, into the realm of the ridiculous. Is Plato going to have Aristophanes make us laugh at love? What we see here already attests to the contrary.

Nowhere, not at any moment of the other speeches in the Symposium, is love ever taken as seriously or as tragically as it is by Aristophanes. Here we are at the same exact level where we moderns situate love – after courtly love's sublimation which I spoke to you about last year, and after what I might call the romantic confusion concerning this sublimation – namely, the narcissistic overestimation of the subject, of the subject assumed to reside in the beloved object.

At Plato's time we aren't there yet, thank God, apart from this strange Aristophanes, but he is a buffoon. Rather we are at the stage of an in some sense zoological observation of imaginary beings, which derives its value from what it evokes in real beings and from what certainly can be held therein to be derisory.

We are dealing here with beings cut into two, like hard-boiled eggs sometimes are, bizarre beings like the ones we find on the sandy sea floor – plaice, sole, and flounder – which seem to have everything necessary, two eyes and paired organs, but which are so flattened out that they seem to be but half of a complete being.

The first behavior that follows the birth of beings born from such 111 a partition – which is the bedrock of what turns up here all of a sudden, in a light we find so romantic – is a panic-stricken destiny which makes each of these beings seek first and foremost its other half, and then – sticking to that other half tenaciously and, so to speak, hopelessly – perish beside its other half due to its inability to come together with it. This is what Aristophanes depicts in his long, detailed discussion in an extremely colorful way, projecting it onto the level of myth. Such is the image of love relationships forged by the sculptor that the comic poet proves to be here.

Is it here that we must conclude that there is something laughable in Aristophanes' words and that we have managed to put our finger on it? Of course not. But this is nevertheless inserted in a piece that irresistibly brings to mind what we might see even nowadays in a circus arena, if the clowns entered, as they sometimes do, hugging, attached two by two, coupled stomach to stomach, and took a few turns around the arena in a great twirling of four arms, four legs, and two heads. In and of itself, it is something that would go very well with the way of fabricating the kind of chorus that produces, in another genre, The Wasps, The Birds, and even The Clouds, about which we will never know how far things went when they were performed.

But here, what kind of ridiculousness is in question? Is it simply the in itself rather joyful character of this clownish image, as I called it?

Here I will go off on a bit of a tangent, and I will ask you to forgive me if it takes us rather far afield, for it is essential.

3

I am not the only one who knows how to read a text, for Léon Robin was also struck by something, to such an extent that he extraordinarily emphasized it – namely, the spherical nature of the people invented by Aristophanes.

It is difficult not to see this, for this sphericalness or circularity, this σφαῖρα (sphaíra), is repeated with such insistence. We are told 112 that the back and the flanks, πλευρὰς κύκλῳ ἔχον (pleurás kúklo échon) [189e], are "all continuous in a very round way." We must imagine that, as I said earlier, as two wheels connected to one another which are nevertheless flat, while here it is round.

It is round, and this bothered Léon Robin, who did not hesitate, though not without a footnote, to change a comma that no one has ever challenged, saying, "I did it this way because I don't want people to emphasize the sphere so much, for the cut is more important." Far be it from me to try to diminish the importance of this cut, which we will return to later. But it is difficult not to see that we are faced with something very unusual here, the crux of which I will immediately reveal: what is derided here, what is cast in this ridiculous form, is the sphere itself.

Naturally, that doesn't make you laugh, because spheres don't mean anything to you. But remember that for many centuries it wasn't that way.

You are only familiar with the sphere as a fact of psychological inertia known as the "whole form" [bonne forme]. A number of people, Ehrenfels and others, have realized that shapes have a certain tendency toward perfection – a tendency, in other words, to become like spheres when we are not sure what they are. The idea is that spheres are what give the optical nerve the most pleasure. This is very interesting, but only begins to scratch the surface of the problem, for let me point out to you in passing that the notion of Gestalten, which is so unthinkingly used as a foundation, merely pushes the problem of perception back a notch. If there are such whole forms, perception must consist in rectifying them in the direction of partial [mauvaises] forms – namely, true forms. But enough on the dialectic of whole forms.

Spherical shapes have an entirely different meaning here than in this factual observation [objectivation] whose interest is limited to psychology. In Plato's work, and well before him, this shape, Sphaíros, in the masculine, as Empedocles also says – there isn't enough time for me to read the verses – is a being who is "self-identical on all sides, without limits, σφαῖρος κυκλοτερής (sphaíros kukloterés), which takes the form of a ball, reigns in its royal solitude, full of its own contentment, and of its self-sufficiency." The sphaíros that haunted ancient thought was the shape taken, at the center of Empedocles' world, by the phase of unification [rassemblement] characteristic of what he calls, in his metaphysics, Philíe or Philótes, love, which he elsewhere calls σχεδύνη Φιλότης (schedúne Philótes), love which unites, agglomerates, assimilates, and agglutinates. To agglutinate is κρῆσις (krésis), the krésis of love. 113

It is quite curious to see Freud write that love is a pure and simple unifying force, with limitless powers of attraction, opposing it to Thanatos – whereas he also gives us, in a discordant way, such a different notion, and one which is so much more fruitful: the love/hate ambivalence.

We find this sphere everywhere. I was talking to you last week about Philolaos. He situates this sphere at the center of a world in which the earth has an eccentric position and, as you know, this was already suspected at Pythagoras' time. Yet it is not the sun that occupies the center but the spherical central fire, to which the face of the inhabited earth always turns its back. In relation to this fire, we are like the moon in relation to our earth, which is why we do not feel it. It seems that it was in order that we not be wiped out by [rayés par] the central shining [rayonnement] that Philolaos invented this harebrained lucubration of the anti-earth, which already puzzled people in Antiquity, including Aristotle himself. What need could there have been for this strictly invisible body, which was assumed to harbor within itself all powers opposed to those of the earth, and which at the same time played the role of firebreak? It's something to analyze, as they say.

All of this is merely designed to introduce you to the dimension – to which, as you know, I attribute great importance – of the astronomical or Copernican Revolution. And in order to make this as clear as possible, let me repeat that it is not the so-called geocentricism dismantled by the said canon Copernicus that is important, which is why it is, indeed, quite false and pointless to call the astronomical revolution Copernican. In his book On the Revolutions of the Heavenly Spheres, he provides a figure of the solar system that resembles ours, that resembles those in our seventh-grade textbooks where we see the sun at the center and all the stars revolving around it in orbits. But this was hardly a new schema. Everybody in Copernicus' time – I'm not the one who discovered this – knew that in Antiquity a man named Heraclides and another known as Aristarchus of Samos had come up with the same diagram. This is perfectly well attested to in the historical record.

Copernicus is merely a fantasy on the part of history. It would have been different if his system had been not closer to the image 114 that we have of the real solar system, but truer – in other words, less encumbered than the Ptolemaic system of imaginary elements that have nothing to do with the modern symbolization of the stars. But the fact is that the Copernican system is nothing of the kind, since it is chock full of epicycles.

What are epicycles? They are an invention that no one could believe in. People didn't believe in the reality of epicycles. Don't imagine that they were dumb enough to think that we find in the sky what you see when you open up your watch: a series of little wheels. But they did have the idea that the only imaginable motion was circular motion. Everything one sees in the sky is very hard to interpret, for the little wandering planets play all sorts of irregular tricks [entourloupettes] among themselves and the point was to explain the zigzags. So people were only satisfied when each element of their circuit could be reduced to a circular motion.

What is odd is that they didn't manage to do a better job of it. One might think that, in theory, if we combine enough circles on top of turning circles, we could manage to account for anything. It turned out to be impossible, because the more closely people observed the heavenly bodies, the more things remained to be explained – if nothing else, once the telescope appeared, their variation in size. But in any case, Copernicus' system was just as replete as Ptolemy's with this imaginary superfluity that weighed it down and encumbered it.

Over Christmas vacation you must read, and – you will see that it is possible – for pleasure, how Kepler began with the elements of the same Timaeus that I am going to speak to you about, in other words, from a purely imaginary – with the accent that this term has in the vocabulary that I use with you – conception of the universe. His universe was entirely regulated by the properties of the sphere, defined as the shape that bears within itself the virtues of self-sufficiency, such that it can combine in itself the eternity of place and eternal motion.

Kepler's speculations are of this type. They are, moreover, refined, because he stupefies us by bringing in the five perfect solids that can be inscribed within a sphere – as you know there are only five of them. This old Platonic speculation, which had already been superseded 30 times over, came back at this turning point of the Renaissance at which Plato's manuscripts were reintegrated into the 115
Western tradition, and literally went to the head of this character whose personal life, in the context of the revolution of the peasants, and then of the Thirty Years' War, is really quite weird. Well, the said Kepler, who was seeking the celestial harmonies, managed – through prodigious tenacity, in which one can clearly see the game of hide-and-seek characteristic of an unconscious formation – to give the first take on what the birth of modern science really consists of. It was in seeking a harmonic relationship that he arrived at the relationship between the speed of a planet in its orbit and the area of the surface covered by the line that links the planet to the sun. In other words, he perceived simultaneously that the planetary orbits are ellipses.

Alexandre Koyré wrote a beautiful book that is called From the Closed World to the Infinite Universe, which was published by Johns Hopkins University Press and was recently translated into French. And I was wondering what Arthur Koestler, who is not always the best inspired author, had done with Kepler. I assure you that The Sleepwalkers, which everyone is talking about, is his best book. It is phenomenal, marvelous. You don't even need to know elementary mathematics; you will understand everything through his biographies of Copernicus, Kepler, and Galileo. Koestler manifests some partiality for Galileo – Koestler was a communist, after all. He says so himself.

Be that as it may, it is absolutely true that Galileo never paid the slightest attention to what Kepler had discovered. The brilliant step he made in his invention of modern dynamics is to have found the exact law of gravity. In spite of this essential step, and despite the fact that it was regarding geocentricism that he ran into all kinds of trouble, the fact remains that he was just as behind the times as everybody else, just as reactionary, just as wedded to the idea of perfect circular motion as the only motion possible for the heavenly bodies. To put it in a nutshell, Galileo did not even get as far as what we call the Copernican Revolution, even though we know it was not started by Copernicus. You see how long it takes truths to clear a pathway for themselves when faced with a prejudice as solid as the perfection of circular motion.

I could talk to you about this for hours, for it is very amusing to consider why it is so, and to see what the properties of circular 116 motion truly are and why the Greeks made the circle into a symbol of the limit, πεῖραρ (peírar), as opposed to the ἄπειρον (ápeiron). Curiously enough, it is precisely because it is one of the things that is most likely to lapse into the apeiron. I should cut this sphere – which, as you know, served in the usual symbol for infinity [∞] – down to size, reduce it to a point, and infinitize it for you.

There is a lot to say. Why does this shape have the finest virtues? To answer this question would take us to the heart of problems concerning the function and value of intuition in mathematical construction.

Prior to all of the exercises that allowed us to disexercise the sphere, it continued to work its charms on dupes because mental φιλία (philía) stuck to it, and dirtily, like a strange kind of glue. This was the case for Plato at least, and I refer you to his Timaeus and his long discussion of the sphere there in which he depicts it for us in great detail. This corresponds curiously, like an alternating strophe, to what Aristophanes says of his spherical beings.

On the one hand, in the Symposium, Aristophanes tells us that these beings have feet – small members that point and turn. But on the other hand, in the Timaeus, Plato, with a striking accent since he is discussing geometry, feels the need to observe in passing that the sphere has everything it needs inside itself. It is round, it is full, it is content, it loves itself, and above all it needs neither eyes nor ears since it is by definition the envelope of everything that can be alive. By virtue of this, it is the living being par excellence, and this gives us moreover the intellectual dimension in which biology could develop – we must take the notion that this form is what essentially constitutes the living being as an extremely strict imaginary spelling out [épellement].

Thus the sphere has neither eyes nor ears, neither feet nor arms [33b], and it is left with but one motion, the perfect motion: revolving around itself in a circle. The six [other] forms of [motion] – toward the top, toward the bottom, to the left, to the right, forward, and backward [– are excluded (34a–b)]. On the basis of a comparison of the Symposium and the Timaeus – and of the two-step mechanism that consists in having the person who is for Plato the only one worthy of speaking of love clown around – we see that in 117

Aristophanes' discourse, Plato seems to be having a good time by turning his own conception of the world and of the world soul into a comical exercise.

Aristophanes' discourse derides Plato's sphaíros [sphere] as it is articulated in the Timaeus.

We don't have much time left and there would be plenty to add. But to show you that the astronomical reference is sure and certain in this context, I will nevertheless supply proof, for it might seem to you that I'm simply having a good time. The three types of sphere that Aristophanes imagined – the one that is all male, the one that is all female, and the one that is male and female, the androgynes as they're called (beings of each type have a pair of genitals) – have origins. And what are these origins? They are stellar. The males come from the sun, the all-women come from the earth, and the androgynes from the moon – confirming, moreover, in this way the lunar origin, as Aristophanes tells us, of those who have a propensity for adultery, for it is tantamount to having a composite origin [190a–b]. So much for the astronomical element.

Well, doesn't something show its face here that reveals the mainspring of our fascination with the spherical shape?

It is the shape that one is not supposed to mess with or contest. For centuries it left the human mind in error, in the error of refusing to think that, in the absence of any action or foreign impulse, a body is either at rest or in uniform rectilinear motion. A body at rest was supposed to not be able to have, apart from rest, anything other than circular motion, and all of dynamics was ruled out. Now, doesn't the incidental illustration that is furnished by Plato, who one can also call a poet, show us that what is at stake in shapes in which nothing sticks out or can be latched onto, has its foundations in the imaginary structure? But what is our attachment to such shapes due to, insofar as it is affective, if not to the Verwerfung [foreclosure] of castration?

This is so true that we find it in Aristophanes' discourse. These beings, split in two like pear halves, die, at a time x that is not specified since it is a mythical time, in a futile attempt to fuse anew. They are doomed to vain efforts to procreate in the earth, and I will skip the whole mythical discussion as it would take us too far afield. How is their problem to be resolved? Aristophanes speaks to 118 us here exactly like little Hans does: their genitalia – which are in the wrong place, because they are where they were when the beings were round, that is, they are on the outside – are unscrewed and screwed back onto the stomach, just like the faucet in Hans' dream as reported in Freud's case history.

It is unique and astonishing to see in Plato's work that the possibility of amorous relief is connected to something that is indisputably related, to say the least, to an operation involving the subject's genitalia. Whether we place this under the heading of the castration complex or not, it is clear that the text stresses the shift of the genitalia to the front side [191b]. This does not merely mean that the genital organ now has the possibility of serving as a copula, allowing junction with the beloved object, but that it is literally printed over [en surimpression] this object, almost superimposed on it. This is the only point at which the function of the genitals is betrayed or translated. Since we know that Plato's grasp of tragedy – he gives us a thousand proofs of this – did not go much further than Socrates', how can we fail to be struck by the fact that here, for the first and only time, he brings into play the genital organ as such in a discourse concerning a serious matter, that of love?

This confirms what I told you was essential to the mainspring of comedy, which is always, in the end, a reference to the phallus. And it is no accident that Aristophanes is the one who talks about it. He is the only one who can do so. But Plato does not realize that in having him speak of it, he has delivered to us – to those of us here – the linchpin that shifts the entire discourse that is to follow into another register.

This is where we will pick up the thread next time.

December 21, 1960

VII

THE ATOPIA OF EROS

AGATHON

119

The commandments of the second death.
The signifier and immortality.
The analyst's desire.
The tragedian's macaronic fancy.

Let me pause briefly before leading you into the great enigma of transference love.

I have my reasons for occasionally pausing: it is important that we understand each other and that we not lose our bearings.

1

Since the beginning of this year I have felt a need to remind you that, in everything I have taught you, I have done nothing but point out that Freud's doctrine situates desire in a dialectic.

On this note, I must stop to remark that we are taking the road less traveled by. For I have already stated hereby that desire is not a life function, in the sense in which positivism defines life. Desire is caught up in a dialectic because it hinges – I have already said how it hinges, in the form of metonymy – on a signifying chain. The latter is, as such, both constitutive of the subject and that by which the subject is distinct from individuality taken simply as hic et nunc [here and now]. Keep in mind that this hic et nunc is what defines individuality.

Let us make an effort to delve into what individuation or the instinct of individuality is, inasmuch as individuation requires each individual, or so we are told in psychology, to conquer anew all of 120 real structure, whether by experience or learning. This is no small task, and one cannot conceptualize it without the presupposition that it is at least already prepared for by an adaptation or a whole set of adaptations. The human individual, as knowledge, is taken to be the flower of consciousness at the end of an evolutionary process.

I profoundly doubt that. Not that I consider it to be a fruitless direction or a dead end. I doubt it insofar as the idea of evolution gets us intellectually used to all sorts of elisions that are highly debilitating for reflection, especially as concerns our ethics as analysts. In any case, it seems essential to me to re-examine these elisions, and to indicate or reopen the gaps left in the theory of evolution insofar as it always tends to cover them over in order to make our practice [expérience] easier to conceptualize. If evolutionary theory is true, one thing is nevertheless certain, which is that evolution is not, as Voltaire said in another context, as natural as all that.

As for desire, it is in any case essential that we examine its conditions. The latter are given to us by our practice, which overturns the whole problem of givens. Indeed, what we find is that the subject keeps an articulated chain outside of consciousness, making it inaccessible to consciousness. It is a demand, and not a pressure, malaise, imprinting, or any other term you might try to use to characterize it as primitive – that is, as definable in terms of instincts [tendanciellement]. On the contrary, a trace is traced out there, so to speak, that is encircled by a line [trait], isolated as such, and raised to an ideographic power, let's say, on the condition that it be emphasized that we are not dealing with an index that can be attributed to anything isolated whatsoever. Rather, it is always linked to a concatenation, on one line, with other ideograms that are themselves encircled by the function that makes them signifiers. This demand constitutes a constant, albeit latent, claim upon the subject that is inaccessible to him. It is a statute or set of specifications that must be met. It is not the modulation that would result from some sort of phonetic inscription of the negative recorded on film or tape but, rather, a trace that goes into effect once and for all. It is a kind of recording, but only if you emphasize the term "record," with its 121 connotation of classification in a file. It is a kind of memory, but only in terms of the meaning this word takes on in the realm of electronic machines.

Well, it was Freud's genius to have designated the medium of this chain. I think I have sufficiently shown you – and I will show it to you again, above all in an article I felt I needed to rewrite on the basis of what I said at the conference in Royaumont, and which will be published – that, in speaking of the id, Freud designated the death drive itself as the medium of this chain, insofar as he emphasized the lethal character of repetition compulsion.

Death. What Freud articulated as a tendency [tendance] toward death, as the desire of an unthinkable subject who presents himself in the living being in which it speaks [ça parle], is responsible for the eccentric position of desire in man, which has always constituted a paradox for ethics. This paradox is altogether unsolvable, it seems to me, from the perspective of evolutionary theory. How could desires – in what one might call their transcendental permanence, namely, the transgressive character that is fundamental to them – be neither the effect nor the source of what they constitute, that is, a permanent disorder in a body assumed to be subject to the statute of adaptation, regardless of the impact its effects are acknowledged to have?

Here, as in the history of physics, people have up until now merely tried to save the appearances. And I think I have helped you realize the import, and have given you ample opportunity to assess the importance, of what is meant by "saving the appearances" when it comes to epicycles in the Ptolemaic system.

Don't imagine that the people who taught this system for centuries – with the proliferation of epicycles it required, from about 30 to about 75 depending on the accuracy demanded of the system – truly believed in epicycles. Not for a minute did they believe that the heavens were made like little armillary spheres. They manufactured them with their epicycles, and I saw some recently in a hallway at the Vatican – quite a nice collection – showing the movements of Mars, Venus, and Mercury. A certain number of epicycles must be placed around each little ball in order for it to mimic a planet's movements, but no one ever seriously believed in them. Saving appearances simply meant accounting for what one saw in accordance with a theoretical requirement: the bias in favor of the perfection of the circle.

Well, it is more or less the same when one tries to explain desires 122 by the system of needs, whether individual or collective. And I submit that no one in psychology – and by that I mean the psychology that runs through the entire moralist tradition – believes that any more, no more than anyone ever believed in epicycles, even at the time when people were working on them. In both cases, saving appearances means nothing but the following: trying to reduce to forms that are assumed to be perfect and necessary to the foundations of deduction, what can in no way – not with any good reason at least – be thus reduced.

I am trying to ground with you the basic topology of desire, its interpretation, and – in short – its rational ethics. The "between-two-deaths" – which is not so difficult to grasp, because it simply means that, for humankind, the two borders related to death do not overlap – grew out of this topology over the course of the last year.

The first border – whether linked to the fundamental time period [échéance] we call old age, aging, or decline, or to an accident that cuts the thread of life – is that at which life effectively ends and comes undone. Hence it is obvious, and has always been obvious, that man's situation is characterized by the fact that this border does not overlap with the second death, which can be most generally defined by saying that in it man aspires to annihilate himself in order to have his being inscribed [in history]. The hidden contradiction or rub is that man aspires to destroy himself in the very act of becoming immortal.

You will find this point throughout [Agathon's] speech, as well as in the others. You find myriad traces of it in the Symposium. I attempted to illustrate it for you last year by showing you the four corners of the space in which tragedy is situated. There is not one tragedy that is not shed light on thereby, precisely because an aspect of tragic space has been stolen [dérobé], to use that word, from poets in the course of history – in the seventeenth century, for example.

Consider any of Racine's tragedies and you will see that, in order for there to be any semblance of tragedy, the space of the between-two-deaths must in some way be invoked. If something resembling tragedy subsists in Andromachus, Iphigenia, or Bajazet – need I 123 remind you of the plot? – it is because the two deaths are always there, regardless of how they may be symbolized. What lies between Hector's death and the death that is hanging over Astyanax's head is but the sign of another doubling [duplicité]. The hero is always placed in imminent danger of death but faces it in order to be remembered by posterity, which is a derisory form of the problem. This is what is signified by the two terms we continually encounter that refer to the twofold nature [duplicité] of the lethal function.

True enough. But while this may be necessary to maintain the framework of tragic space, we must still figure out how it is inhabited. I would simply like to clear away in passing the cobwebs that obstruct a direct view, in order to incite you to look at Racine's tragedies, pinnacles of Christian tragedy, which remain, through all their lyrical vibrations, so rich in poetic resonance.

Take Iphigenia for example. Everything that takes place in the play is irresistibly funny, you can see for yourselves. Agamemnon is fundamentally characterized there by his terror of the conjugal scene – "There, those are the cries I was afraid of hearing" [Act IV, Scene 5] – while Achilles appears in an unbelievably superficial position.

Why? I will try to indicate why a little later, in terms of Achilles' relation to death, a traditional relation for which he is always one of the first cases cited by Socrates' most intimate circle when they exhibit their moralism. The history of Achilles, who deliberately prefers a death that will make him immortal to a refusal to fight that would spare his life, is mentioned everywhere, including in the Apology, where Socrates talks about it in order to define what his own conduct will be before his judges [28c–d]. We find echoes of it even in Racine's tragedies, cast in another light, which is far more important. It is one of the commonplaces which, in the course of the centuries, ceaselessly sound, echoing ever more loudly with a resonance that is increasingly hollow and bombastic.

What is lacking in tragedy when it is pursued beyond the range of limits that gave it its place in the living, breathing world of Antiquity? There is some kind of shadow, obscurity, or occultation 124 related to the commandments of the second death.

There is no trace of these commandments in Racine, because by his time we are no longer in a context in which the Delphic oracle can make itself heard. The playwright gives us mere cruelty, vain contradiction, and absurdity. The characters talk on and on, dialoguing and soliloquizing, saying nothing more, in the end, than that there has surely been some sort of misunderstanding somewhere.

This is not at all the case in ancient tragedy. The commandment of the second death is ever present there. Being present there in a veiled form, it can be formulated and acknowledged as linked to the debt that accumulates without there being a guilty party and that is paid by a victim who does not deserve the punishment. It is, in short, the "he did not know" that I wrote for you at the top of the Graph of Desire, on the enunciation line that is fundamental to the topology of the unconscious. This is what is already achieved in ancient tragedy, or rather prefigured – I would say, were it not an anachronistic word – in relation to Freud, who immediately recognized it as being related to the raison d'être he had just discovered in the unconscious.

Freud recognized his discovery and his field in the tragedy of Oedipus, but it was neither because Oedipus killed his father nor because he wanted to sleep with his mother. A very amusing mythologist, Robert Graves – who has compiled a vast collection of myths in a work of no renown, but which is very useful and highly practical, two small volumes that were published by Penguin Books, in which he has gathered all of ancient mythology – thinks he is being clever concerning the Oedipus myth. "Why didn't Freud," he asks, "seek out his myth among the Egyptians, where the hippopotamus is said to sleep with its mother and crush its father? Why didn't he call it the hippopotamus complex?" He thinks he has, thereby, given Freudian mythology a fine punch in the gut.

But this is not why Freud chose Oedipus. Many heroes other than Oedipus kill their fathers and want to sleep with their mothers. The reason Freud found his fundamental figure in the tragedy of Oedipus lies in the fact that "he did not know" he had killed his father and was sleeping with his mother.

The fundamental terms of our topology have now been recalled to mind. This reminder was necessary to continue our analysis of the 125 Symposium, in order that you perceive why it is of interest that it is now Agathon, the tragic poet, who gives a speech on love.

But I must prolong this pause a little longer to clarify my remarks on the subject of what, little by little, through the Symposium, I am proposing concerning the mystery of Socrates.

2

I told you last time that for a while I had the feeling that I was killing myself over the mystery of Socrates. It does not seem to me to be unsituable. It is precisely because I believe, on the contrary, that we can situate it perfectly well that we are justified in beginning with this mystery in our research this year.

What is the mystery of Socrates? I will remind you of it in the same annotated terms that I have just rearticulated for you, so you can compare it with Plato's texts, which are our firsthand documents. Since I have noticed that, for some time now, it is no longer in vain that I recommend certain readings to you, I will not hesitate to invite you to supplement the Symposium – which almost all of you have now read – with the Phaedo, which will give you a fine example of Socratic method and suggest why it is of interest to us.

I would say that the mystery of Socrates – and one must look at this firsthand document in order to make it shine anew in all its originality – is the instituting of what he calls science, epistéme.

You can verify what it means in the text. It is quite obvious that it has neither the same meaning nor the same accent in the Phaedo as it has for us, since there was not at the time even the slightest beginning of what has since been articulated for us under the heading of "science." The best formulation you can give for the instating of this science – in what? in consciousness – in a position, in an absolute dignity, or more precisely in a position of absolute dignity, is to say that it involves nothing other than what we can express in our vocabulary as the promotion of the signifier itself to a position of absolute dignity. What Socrates calls science is what is necessarily imposed on every interlocution as a function of a certain manipula-126 tion or internal coherence that is linked, or that he believes to be linked, to the sole, pure, and simple reference to the signifier.

As you will see, in the Phaedo Socrates is pushed as far as he can go by the disbelief of his interlocutors who, however constraining his arguments may seem, do not altogether agree, no more than anyone would, with his assertion that the soul is immortal. What he refers to in the final analysis, and in a less and less convincing way, at least to us, are properties such as even and odd. It is on the basis of the fact that the number three cannot in any way be qualified as even and on other such points that he bases his demonstration that the soul cannot be said to be destructible, as it is at the very crux of life [103d–106d]. You will see to what extent what I call the privileged reference to the signifier, which is proposed as a sort of cult or essential rite, accounts for everything that the emergence of Socrates in the midst of the Sophists contributes that is new, original, decisive, fascinating, and seductive – there is historical testimony of this.

The second term I will extract from the testimony that has been handed down to us is as follows: thanks to Socrates, his total presence, his destiny, his death, and what he asserts before dying, it appears that this promotion [of the signifier to a position of absolute dignity] is consistent with the effect I showed you, which is to abolish in a man, totally it seems, what I would call, borrowing Kierkegaard's terms, fear and trembling. Fear and trembling before what? Not the first, but rather the second death.

Socrates does not hesitate on this score. He claims that it is in this second death – embodied in his dialectic by the fact that he raises the coherence of the signifier to an absolute power, to the power of being the sole ground of certainty – that he, Socrates, will indubitably find eternal life.

On the condition that you not read anything more into what I am going say, I will take the liberty of tracing out tangentially, as a sort of parody, the appearance of Cotard's syndrome. Socrates, the indefatigable questioner, seems to me to overlook the fact that his mouth was flesh, and it is in this sense that his assertion is coherent, though not his certainty. Don't we almost find ourselves faced here with an apparition that is foreign to us, with a manifestation that I 127 would qualify – to use our jargon in order to make myself perfectly clear and progress quickly – as akin to the psychotic core? I am thinking of the way, the very exceptional way, I assure you, Socrates implacably unfolds his arguments, which are not really arguments, but also posits before his disciples, the very day of his death, the assertion, perhaps more affirmative than any ever before heard from him, that he, Socrates, is serenely leaving this life for a truer, immortal life. He does not doubt but that he will join those who still exist for him, let us not forget it, the Immortals. The notion of the Immortals cannot be eliminated or removed from his thought. It is in terms of the antinomy between the Immortals and the mortals, which is absolutely fundamental in ancient thought, and no less, believe me, in ours, that his living, real-life testimony takes on its full value.

Let me thus summarize. This indefatigable questioner – who is not a speaker, who keeps his distance from rhetoric, metrics, and poetics, who eliminates metaphor, who lives entirely in the game, not of the finessed [forcée] card, but of the forced question, and who derives all of his sustenance from it – generates before our eyes and develops throughout his life what I will call a formidable metonymy. Its result, which is historically attested as well, is a desire that is embodied in an assertion of immortality, an immortality that is, I would say, fixed – sad "immortality, all black and gold" [immortalité noire et dorée], wrote Valéry – a desire for infinite discourses.

Indeed, while he is sure he will join the Immortals in the next world, he is also, he says, more or less certain he will be able to continue his little verbal exercises for all eternity with interlocutors worthy of him: those who came before him and all those who will come to join him later [Apology, 40d–41c]. Admit it: this conception, as satisfying as it may be for people who like allegorical painting, is nevertheless a fancy which singularly smacks of delusion. To argue about even and odd, the just and the unjust, the mortal and the immortal, hot and cold, and about the fact that hot cannot allow cold within itself without weakening, without retiring in its essence of hot to one side, as is explained at length in the Phaedo [103c] as the main reason for the immortality of the soul – to debate about that for all eternity is a very odd conception of happiness.

Let us put things in perspective. One man thus experienced the question of the immortality of the soul. I would go even further:
128 the soul as we still handle it today and are still weighed down by it, the notion or figure of the soul that we have – which is not the conception that developed in the course of all the waves of the traditional legacy – the soul we deal with in the Christian tradition has as its internal brace, frame, or truss the by-product of Socrates' delusion of immortality. We are still living off it.

What I would simply like to conjure up before you is the energy behind Socrates' assertion concerning the immortality of the soul. Why is that? It is obviously not for the import that we can give it now, for it is quite obvious that after several centuries of exercise and even of spiritual exercises, the rate, so to speak, of belief in the immortality of the soul – among all of those here before me, whether believers or nonbelievers – is quite tempered, as one says that a scale is tempered. No, that is not the point. If I ask you to reflect on the postulation of the immortality of the soul at that time, on certain grounds, by a man who, in his wake, astonished his contemporaries by his discourse, it is in order to get you to wonder about the following, which is quite important: for this phenomenon to have occurred, for a man – who has, over Nietzsche's Zarathustra, the advantage of having existed – to have acceded to this same "Thus spoke . . . ," as they say, what must Socrates' desire have been?

This is the crucial question that I think I can raise here, and all the more easily since I have at length described for you the topology that gives it its meaning.

Open any of Plato's dialogues to a passage related directly to Socrates as a person, and you can check the well-founded nature of what I am telling you about the forthright, paradoxical position of his assertion of immortality, and about what it is founded on – namely, his idea of science insofar as I situate it as the pure and simple raising of the function of the signifier in consciousness to an absolute value. To what does the position he introduces correspond? To what atopia? As you know, I am not the one who applied this term, atopia, to Socrates. To what atopia of desire?

Atopos refers to a case that is unclassifiable or unsituable. Atopia, you cannot put it anywhere. That's the point. This is what Socrates' contemporaries were whispering about him.

Doesn't this atopia of desire about which I am raising a question, 129 coincide to me, to us, in a certain way with what I might call a certain topographical purity? For it designates the central point at which, in our topology, the space of the between-two-deaths is found in a pure state, emptying out the place of desire as such. Desire is no longer anything but its place there, insofar as it is no longer anything for Socrates than a desire for discourse, revealed discourse, discourse that is forever revealing. Hence the atopia of the Socratic subject, assuming that such a purified place of desire was never occupied by any man before him.

I will not answer this question, confining myself to raising it. It is plausible and, at the very least, it gives us a first landmark by which to situate the question, one that we cannot eliminate once we have raised it. And, after all, I am not the one who first raised it – it was already posed as soon as we realized that the complexity of the topic of transference could in no way be limited to what takes place in the subject known as the patient, he who is analyzed. Consequently, the question arises of articulating, in a slightly more sophisticated way than has ever been done up until now, what the analyst's desire must be.

It does not suffice to speak of training catharsis or of purification, so to speak, of the bulk of the analyst's unconscious. Such a notion remains terribly vague. Analysts must be credited with the fact that, for some time now, they have not been satisfied with it. We must realize, not in order to criticize them, but rather in order to understand the obstacle at hand, that we don't have at our disposal even the slightest sketch of what one could nevertheless articulate so easily, in the form of a question, concerning what must be attained in someone so that he may be an analyst. People say that he must come to know a little bit more about the dialectic in his unconscious. But what exactly does he know about it in the final reckoning? And, above all, how far does what he knows about it have to go concerning the very effects of knowledge? I will simply raise the following question: what must remain of his fantasies? You know that I can go further still and say of his fantasy, assuming that there is one fundamental fantasy. If castration is what must be accepted at the end of an analysis, what role 130 must the scar of castration play in the analyst's Eros?

These are questions that are more easily raised than answered. Which is why people do not raise them. And, believe me, I would not raise them either in a void, for the simple purpose of sparking your imagination, if I did not think that there must be a method – a method that broaches this from a different angle or even proceeds indirectly or in a roundabout fashion – by which to shed some light on these questions that we obviously cannot for the moment answer utterly and completely. All I can say for the time being is that it does not seem to me that what is called the doctor–patient relationship – with all it brings with it by way of presuppositions, prejudices, and molasses attracting swarms of flies – allows us to make much headway in this direction.

We must thus try to articulate and situate what the analyst's desire should be, and what it is fundamentally. And we must do so in accordance with the markers that can, on the basis of an already sketched out topology, be designated as the coordinates of desire. We cannot find appropriate landmarks by referring to articulations of the situation for the therapist or the observer, nor in any of the phenomenological notions of "situation" being elaborated around us. For the analyst's desire is not such that it can be explained by reference to a dyad. It is not the relationship to the patient that can, through a series of eliminations and debarments, give us the key thereto. Something more intrapersonal is at stake.

Nor is this to say that the analyst must be a Socrates, a virtuous person [un pur], or a saint. Explorers like Socrates, the virtuous, and saints can, no doubt, give us several indications concerning our field. But they do not go far enough – upon reflection, all of our science, I mean experimental science, is related to this field. Yet it is precisely because they are the ones who do the exploring that we can perhaps define, in terms of longitude and latitude, the coordinates the analyst must be able to attain simply in order to occupy the place that is his, defined as the place he must offer up as vacant to the patient's desire in order for the latter to be realized as the Other's desire.

It is in this respect that the Symposium is of interest to us and that it is useful terrain to explore. This is due to the privileged place that testimony about Socrates occupies in it, inasmuch as this text is sup- 131 posed to show him grappling with the problem of love right before our very eyes.

I believe I have said enough to justify why we are approaching the problem of transference through a commentary on the Symposium. I felt it was necessary to recall these coordinates to mind before we enter into what occupies the central or almost central place in this famous dialogue – namely, Agathon's speech.

3

Is it Aristophanes or Agathon who occupies the central place? Why bother to try to decide? The two of them certainly occupy the central place, since everything that was demonstrated before turns out, apparently, to be already remote and devalued when their turns come, and what comes afterward is no other than Socrates' speech.

Concerning the speech by Agathon, the tragic poet, one could say a great many things – not simply for the sake of erudition – that would lead us into details about and even into a history of tragedy, of which I gave you a brief sketch a bit earlier. What is of importance is not that, but rather to get you to see its role in the economy of the Symposium.

As you have seen, Agathon's speech takes up five or six pages in the French translation by Robin, published in the Guillaume Budé collection. I will begin with its pinnacle, and you will see why. Let me remind you that I am here less in order to provide you with an elegant commentary, than to lead you to what the Symposium can or should provide us.

The least one can say of Agathon's speech is that it has always struck readers for its extraordinary sophistry, in the modern, everyday, pejorative sense of the word. His sophistry here consists in saying that Love "does no wrong to gods or men, nor they to him." Why? Because "if anything has an effect on him, it is never by violence," for everyone knows that "violence never touches Love." Thus "the effects he has on others are not forced, for every service we give to Love," so we are told, "we give willingly. And whatever one person agrees on with another, when both are willing, that is right and just; so say the laws that are kings of society" [196b–c].

132 Morality – love is what is at the very core of the laws of the city, and so on and so forth. As love is the strongest of all desires, irresistible passion, it is tempered with moderation, for moderation is what regulates desires and pleasures. Love must thus, by all rights, be identified with moderation.

Manifestly, a bit of fun is being had here. Who is having fun? Is it simply we the readers? We would be wrong to think that we are alone. Agathon certainly does not play a secondary role here, if only for the fact that, at least according to the givens of the situation, he is Socrates' beloved. Let us give Plato the benefit of the doubt by believing that he is having a bit of fun as well with what I will now call – and I will justify it better a little later – the tragedian's macaronic discourse. But I am sure, and you too will be sure as soon as you read it, that we would be wrong not to realize that it is neither simply us nor Plato having a bit of fun here. As opposed to what commentators have said, it is altogether out of the question that Agathon not know perfectly well what he is doing.

Things go so far and he gets so carried away that, at the pinnacle of his speech, Agathon says to us, "I am suddenly struck by a need to say something in poetic meter" [197c].

He expresses himself in the following terms – εἰρήνην μὲν ἐν ἀνθρώποις (eirénen men en anthrópois) [peace among people] – which means that love puts an end to all the ruckus [rififi]. Quite an unusual conception. It must be admitted that up until this idyllic modulation, one hardly suspected any such thing.

But to spell it out for you letter by letter, he tops it all off by saying, πελάγει δὲ γαλήνην (peláge de galénen), which means that everything has stopped, a flat sea [no waves or wind]. We must keep in mind what a flat sea meant in Antiquity – it meant that nothing was going right, that the ships were blocked at Aulis, and when that happened in the middle of the deep blue sea, people were bothered by it, almost as bothered as when that happened to them in bed. To evoke peláge de galénen concerning love makes it quite clear that a bit of fun is being had here. Love is what makes you break down, it's what leads to a fiasco.

This is not all – afterward, Agathon says, there is no more wind among the winds. He goes on – love, there is no more love, νηνεμίαν (nenemían), ἀνέμων (anémon) [stillness, without wind]. It sounds, moreover, like the forever comic verses of a certain tradition, like the following two verses by Paul-Jean Toulet:

133 Sous le double ornement d'un nom mol ou sonore,
Non, il n'est rien que Nanine et Nonore.

This is the sort of realm we are in here. And we have κοίτην (koíten) in addition, which means in bed, beddy-bye, no more wind in the sails, all the winds have gone to sleep. Then we have ὕπνον τ' ἐνὶ κήδει (húpnon t'ení kédei). Strangely enough, love brings us "sleep amidst our worries," as one might translate it at first glance, but look closely at the meaning of these cadences and of κῆδος (kédos).

This Greek term is quite rich in connotations, which allow us to reassert the value of what Émile Benveniste once – with no doubt a great deal of goodwill toward me, but perhaps nevertheless missing something essential in that he did not follow Freud – articulated concerning the ambivalence of signifiers for our first issue of La Psychanalyse. Kédos does not simply mean worry, but also kinship. ὕπνον τ' ἐνὶ κήδει (húpnon t'ení kédei) [regard for another] sketches it out for us as [in the SiRonga proverb]: "A relative by marriage is an elephant's shank," as one finds it in Lévi-Strauss' work. This húpnos, peaceful sleep, t'ení kédei, in relation to in-laws, seems to me to be worthy of crowning verses that are indisputably designed to wake us up in case we have not yet understood that Agathon is making fun of something.

Moreover, from this moment on, he literally lets loose, and tells us that love is what liberates us, alleviating us of "the belief that we are strangers to each other." Naturally, when one is possessed by love, one realizes that we are all part of one big happy family, and it is truly from that moment on that one feels all warm inside and at home, and so on and so forth. This goes on line after line [197c–d] – I will leave you the pleasure of spending your evenings savoring it.

Do you agree that love clearly "moves us to mildness" and "removes from us wildness," that it spreads "kindness" and is incapable of "meanness"? Agathon provides here an enumeration on which I would like us to dwell at length. Love is said to be the father of Τρυφή (Truphé), Ἁβρότης (Habrótes), Χλιδή (Chlidé), Χάριτες (Chárites), Ἵμερος (Hímeros), and Πόθος (Póthos). One can, as a first approximation, translate – well-being, delicateness, languidness, graciousness, ardor, and passion. It would take us more time than we have here to carry out the twofold task of finding the French equivalent for the Greek terms, and to compare them with 134 the headings of kind deeds and honesty in courtly love, as we discussed them last year. It would thus be easy for you to see that it is impossible to be satisfied when Léon Robin relates Agathon's list to the Carte du Tendre, as one could to the virtues of the knight in the Minne that he does not even mention.

Taking text in hand, I could show you that not one of these terms lends itself to such a parallel. Truphé, for example, which people willingly translate as "well-being," is, by most authors, and not just the comic authors, used with the most unpleasant connotations. In Aristophanes, for example, the word designates what is suddenly introduced by a woman or wife into the peace enjoyed by a man – her unbearable pretensions. The woman known as τρυφερά (trupherá) is an unbearable snob, one who does not for a single second stop telling her husband that her father and her family are better than his. And so on and so forth. Every one of these terms is habitually and for the most part conjoined or juxtaposed by Antiquity's authors – whether tragedians or even poets like Hesiod in this case – with αὐθαδία (authadía), which signifies one of the most unbearable forms of hubris and smugness.

I merely wish to point these things out to you in passing. Let us move on. Love "cares well for good men, cares not for bad ones. In pain, in fear, in desire or speech," etc. Such translations signify absolutely nothing, for we have in Greek ἐν πόνῳ, ἐν φόβῳ [. . .], ἐν λόγῳ (en póno, en phóbo [. . .], en lógo), which means, "in deep trouble, in fear [. . .], in discourse." And κυβερνήτης, ἐπιβάτης (kubernétes, epibátes) is the one who is at the helm. It is also the one who is ready to guide. In other words, they're having quite a fine time. Póno, phóbo, pótho, and lógo are all jumbled up here [197d–e]. The point is always to produce an ironic effect, and even disorientation. This, for a tragic poet, has no other meaning than to stress that love is what is truly unclassifiable, blocking every important situation. Love is what is never in its place and is always inopportune.

Whether or not this conception can be defended is not the issue and, strictly speaking, it is certainly not the acme of what the 135 Symposium teaches us about love. What is important is that it is the tragic poet who gives the only speech about love that is openly and completely derisory. To seal the well-foundedness of this interpretation, it suffices to read Agathon's conclusion. "This, Phaedrus, is the speech I have to offer. Let it be dedicated to the god, part of it in fun, part of it moderately serious, as best I could manage."

The speech itself is affected, so to speak, by its connotation as jesting speech, the speech of a jokester. This is all Agathon as such – in other words, as he who is being celebrated here, let us not forget, for his triumph at the tragedy competition, the day after his victory – has the right to say about love.

There is nothing here that should throw us off. In every tragedy situated in its full context, in other words in the context of Antiquity, love always figures as a marginal incident and drags behind, so to speak. Rather than being what directs and runs on ahead, love merely lags behind in tragedy. This is the exact term that you will find in Agathon's speech – love lags behind what he compares it to, strangely enough, in one passage: Áte.

I pointed out the function of Ἄτη (Áte) in tragedy last year. Áte means mischief [195d], the thing that has arisen as an obstacle and can never be exhausted. It is the calamity that lies behind every tragic adventure and that – as the poet tells us, for it is to Homer that people refer here – "gets around only by running on the heads of men with its feet which are too tender to touch the ground" [Iliad, XIX, 91–4]. Thus Áte moves rapidly and indifferently, striking and forever dominating, making heads bow down and driving men crazy. Oddly enough, Agathon mentions Áte in order to tell us that Love must, like Áte, have very delicate feet since it can only walk on the heads of men. Confirming yet again the fanciful nature of Agathon's speech, he makes a number of jokes on this score about the fact that, after all, skulls are perhaps not as soft as all that [195e].

Our entire experience of tragedy confirms the analysis we are making of the style of this speech. Owing to the Christian context, [the idea that one has an] ultimate destiny is purged [vidé], as are the closed and incomprehensible nature of the fatal oracle and the inex pressibility of the commandment as regards the second death. It is 136 inasmuch as this commandment can no longer be sustained – since we find ourselves faced with a god who is unable to give senseless orders and who removes death's cruel sting – that love appears. Love takes their place, filling up this emptiness [vide].

Racine's Iphigenia offers us the finest illustration of this, embodying this change in some sense. We had to reach a Christian context for Iphigenia to no longer suffice as a tragic figure, and for it to be necessary to double her with Eriphilia. And rightly so, not simply so that Eriphilia could be sacrificed in Iphigenia's stead, but because Eriphilia is the only one who is truly in love. Her love is depicted as terrible, horrible, evil, and tragic in order to restore a certain depth to tragic space. It is also because every time this love – with which the play is quite concerned, with Achilles primarily – manifests itself as love pure and simple, and not as dark love [amour noir] or jealous love, it is irresistibly comic.

In short, we find ourselves at a crossroads at which, as will be recalled in the final conclusions of the Symposium, it is not enough, in speaking of love, to be a tragic poet. One must also be a comic poet.

It is at this point that Socrates responds to Agathon's speech. To appraise how he does so, it was necessary, as you will see in what follows, to articulate it with all the stress that I felt I needed to give it today.

January 11, 1961

137

VIII

FROM EPISTÉME TO MÝTHOUS

From love to desire.
The limits of Socratic knowledge.
Socrates "diocesed."
Masculine desirable, feminine desiring.
Love as metaxú.

We have now reached the point in the Symposium at which Socrates is going to take the floor and give an épainos or enkómion. The two terms are not exactly equivalent, as I mentioned in passing some time ago, but I didn't want to dwell on their difference as it would have taken me off on quite a tangent.

In praising love, we are told by Socrates himself, and his word cannot be disputed in Plato's work, that if he knows anything, if there is anything about which he is not ignorant, it is about matters of love. Let us not lose sight of this in all that takes place.

1

Last time I emphasized, in a way which I believe was convincing enough, the strangely derisory character of Agathon's discourse.

Agathon the tragedian speaks of love in a way that gives you the feeling he is playing the fool in his macaronic speech. The impression he gives us at every instant is that he's pulling our leg a bit. I stressed – both in the content and body of his arguments, on the one hand, and in his detailed elocutionary style itself – the exceedingly provocative nature of the short verses he comes up with at one point, and how disconcerting it is to see the theme of the Symposium 138 culminate in such a speech. My reading of his speech is not new, although the function I give it in the unfolding of the Symposium perhaps is. The derisory character of his speech has always given pause to those who have read it and commented upon it. So much so that the German scholar from the beginning of the century – whose name, Wilamowitz-Moellendorff, the day I mentioned it, made you laugh, though I don't know why – says, following thereby in the footsteps of almost all those who came before him, that Agathon's speech is characterized by its Nichtigkeit, its vacuousness.

It is thus quite odd that Plato put this speech in the mouth of the person who immediately precedes Socrates, and who is, let us not forget, Socrates' beloved at the moment of the symposium.

There is a sort of interlude even before Agathon takes the floor. Socrates says something like, "After all we have just heard, and if now Agathon is going to add his speech to the others, how am I going to be able to speak?" [194a]. Agathon, for his part, apologizes, and announces some hesitation, fear, and intimidation too, about speaking before an audience that is, let us say, so enlightened, so intelligent, so ἔμφρονες (émphrones) [sensible, 194b]. And here a debate begins with Socrates, who questions Agathon in more or less the following terms: "Are you, then, embarrassed to show yourself to be possibly inferior only in front of us? Would you be serene about putting forward less well-assured ideas in front of others, in front of a crowd or throng?" [194b–d]. Here, by goodness, we don't know very well what we're getting into. The direction could be rather risqué. Is he trying to get at some sort of aristocratism of dialogue? Or, as seems more likely, for all of Socrates' practice attests to it, is the point, rather, to show that even an ignoramus or slave is capable of revealing in himself the seeds of sure judgment and truth when appropriately questioned?

As they proceed in this direction, Phaedrus interrupts: "Agathon, don't let Socrates get you going. He knows nothing more pleasurable," he says expressly, "than to speak with the one he loves, and once we get started in such a dialogue, we'll never see the end of it" [194d]. On that note, Agathon commences his speech, after which Socrates finds himself in a position to correct him.

It is all too easy for Socrates to do so. His method immediately proves to be brilliantly superior, and effortlessly brings out what has just dialectically exploded in Agathon's speech. The procedure 139 is such that it can only be a refutation or annihilation of Agathon's speech, revealing its ineptitude and vacuousness, which commentators, namely the one I mentioned earlier, think Socrates is loath to take too far for fear of humiliating his interlocutor. This would, in their view, explain why Socrates stops short, and proceeds instead by means of she who will go down in history as but a prestigious figure, Diotima, the stranger from Mantinea. If Socrates has Diotima speak in his stead, if he has himself instructed by her here, it is supposedly so as not to put himself any longer in the position of grandmaster in relation to Agathon, to whom he has dealt a decisive blow.

According to this view, Socrates gives the floor to an imaginary character who instructs him in order to attenuate the distress he has caused Agathon.

I beg to differ with this view. If we examine the text more closely, we cannot say that this is its precise meaning. At the very point where people try to show us that Agathon admits he got off track – "It turns out, Socrates, I didn't know what I was talking about in that speech" [201b] – the impression we are left with in listening to him is rather that of someone who replies something like, "We are not on the same level, I spoke in a way that had a meaning and an underside; we might even go so far as to say that I spoke by enigma" – don't forget αἶνος (aínos) and αἰνίττομαι (ainíttomai), which take us to the very etymology of the word "enigma" – "I adopted a certain tone in saying what I said."

Furthermore, we find in Socrates' reply that there is a certain way of conceptualizing the kind of praise that involves enveloping the object of praise with all that is best. Socrates denigrates this approach for a moment, but did Agathon really adopt it? On the contrary, it seems that in the very excessive quality of his speech, there was something that was simply asking to be heard. In short, if we understand Agathon's answer in what I think is the right way, we may have the impression for an instant that Socrates, by introducing his critique, dialectic, or mode of interrogation here, ultimately finds himself in a pedantic position.

It is clear that there was something ironic in what Agathon said. Socrates, who tramples over everything with his hobnailed boots, changes the rules of the game. And actually, when Agathon retorts, 140 Ἐγώ, φάναι, ὦ Σώκρατες (Egó, phánai, O Sókrates) and so on – "I'm not going to argue or debate with you, but I agree; go to it in your own way, using your own modus operandi" [201c] – we have the impression of someone withdrawing here and saying to Socrates, "Let us now shift to another register, to another way of speaking." But we cannot agree with the commentators, even with the one whose translation I have before me, Léon Robin, that this constitutes a sign of impatience on Agathon's part.

To determine whether or not Agathon's speech can be bracketed from this truly paradoxical game, from this sophistic tour de force, we need but take seriously – which is the right way to go about it – what Socrates says about it himself. To avail myself of the French term that is most apt here, I would say that Agathon's is a speech that shocks [sidère] or dumbfounds [méduse] him. This is expressly stated in the text, for Socrates puns on the name Gorgias and the Gorgon's head [198c]. Agathon's speech, which closes the door to the dialectical game, fascinates Socrates and turns him, as he says, to stone. Such an effect should not be neglected.

Socrates, naturally, shifts things to the level of his method, as it is presented to us by Plato. This involves his method of questioning, his way of questioning, and also of articulating and dividing the object – that is, his way of operating in accordance with this diaíresis thanks to which the object is presented for examination and situated in a certain way whose register we can locate. The Socratic method thus promises at the outset a development of knowledge that will constitute progress. But the import of Agathon's speech is not annihilated for all that. It is situated in another register, yet it remains exemplary and plays an essential role in the progress of what is shown to us by way of the succession of eulogies concerning love.

It is probably significant, and rich in instruction, suggestions, and questions for us, that it is Agathon the tragedian who turns love into a comical romancero, so to speak, and that it is Aristophanes the comedian who speaks of love in the sense of passion, with an almost modern accent. Socrates' intervention comes as a kind of rupture or break, but one that does not discredit or annihilate what was just stated in Agathon's speech. Can we consider meaningless or as merely antiphrastic the fact that Socrates emphasizes only the fact that it was καλὸν λόγον (kalón lógon), a fine speech [198b]? What is ridiculous and can give rise to laughter is often evoked in the text that precedes this, but Socrates in no wise seems to tell us this is 141 the case when he makes his shift in register. At the very moment at which he introduces the wedge that his dialectic rams into the topic to contribute what one expects from the Socratic light, we have the sense of a discordance, and not of a comparison designed to altogether annul what was formulated in Agathon's speech.

With Socrates' questioning, with what is articulated as being Socrates' own method – by which, if you will allow me this Greek pun, the erómenos, the beloved, becomes ἐρωτώμενος (erotómenos), the questionee – a topic is raised that I have announced several times since the beginning of my commentary: the function of lack.

Everything Agathon says, for example, about the beautiful – that it belongs to love and that it is one of love's attributes – succumbs to Socrates' questioning: "Is the love about which you spoke love of something? Does loving and desiring something mean having it or not having it? Can one desire what one already has?" [199e–200a].

I will skip over the details regarding the way this question is articulated. Socrates casts it and recasts it with an acuity that, as usual, turns his interlocutor into someone he can handle and manipulate.

This is precisely the ambiguity of Socrates as a questioner – he is always the master, even when this may in many cases seem to us, his readers, to be an easy way out. It is, moreover, of little import to know what, in this case, must or can be rigorously developed. What concerns us here is the testimony that constitutes the essence of Socrates' questioning, and also what Socrates introduces, wants to produce, and conventionally speaks about.

We are told that his adversary is unable to refute the conclusion that "such a man or anyone else who has a desire, desires what is not at hand and not present, what he does not have, and what he is not, and that of which he is in want; for such are the objects of desire and love" [200e]. The text is certainly weakly translated: ἐπιθυμεῖ (epithumeí) means he desires, τοῦ μὴ ἑτοίμου (tou me hetoímou) is strictly speaking "what is not ready to wear," τοῦ μὴ παρόντος (tou me paróntos), what is not there, ὃ μὴ ἔχει (ho me échei), what he does not have, ὃ μὴ ἔστιν αὐτὸς (ho me éstin autós), what he is not 142 himself, and οὗ ἐνδεής ἐστι (hou endeés estí), that which he is lacking or essentially lacks.

This is what is articulated by Socrates in what he brings to this dialogue. It concerns something which he says is not situated at the level of word play, by which the subject is captured, captivated, transfixed, and fascinated, and it is in this respect that his method is distinguished from that of the Sophists. He makes the progress of the discourse he develops – with no concern for elegance, so he tells us, using everyday words – reside in the exchange, dialogue, or consent obtained from the person with whom he is speaking. Such consent is presented as the springing forth or necessary emergence of knowledge that his interlocutor already has.

This is, as you know, the linchpin of the whole Platonic theory of the soul, its nature, consistency, and origin. All of this knowledge is already and has forever been there in the soul, and it suffices to pose the right questions to re-evoke and reveal it. This attests to the pre-existence of knowledge, which is why we can but presuppose that the soul partakes of an infinite anteriority. The soul is not merely immortal – it has always been in existence. This is what paves the way for reincarnation and clears the way for metempsychosis. It is, no doubt, what accompanies the development of Platonic thought at the level of myth, which is not that of dialectic.

Something should strike us in this regard. Having introduced what I earlier called the wedge of the function of lack as constitutive of love relations, Socrates goes no further when speaking in his own name. To ask why he substitutes Diotima's authority for his own is to raise a good question.

Yet to say that it is in order to spare Agathon's pride is to answer this question a bit too easily. If things stand as we are told, Plato could simply execute an altogether elementary judo or jiu-jitsu move, since Agathon expressly says, "Please excuse me, I didn't know what I was saying; my concern lies elsewhere." It is not so much Agathon as Socrates who is in a pickle here. Since we cannot in any way assume that Plato intended to show Socrates to be pedantic or heavy-handed, after Agathon's assuredly lighthearted speech, were it only for its amusing style, we must surely conclude that if Socrates hands the floor over to someone else in his speech, 143 it is for some other reason than because he himself cannot continue without offending Agathon.

This other reason can be immediately situated – it is due to the nature of the affair or thing, to prágma, that is at stake.

2

We can suspect, and what follows confirms it, that Socrates is necessarily led to proceed in this manner because they are speaking of love.

Let us note, indeed, the point on which his question bears. The function of lack, to which he gave its own efficacy, is quite patently a return to the desiring function of love: the substitution of ἐπιθυμεῖ (epithumeí), he desires, for ἐρᾷ (erá), he loves. We can point in the text to the moment at which, asking Agathon whether he thinks love is or is not the love of something, he substitutes the term "desire" for the term "love" [200a].

One might legitimately object, in the name of the very method which is that of Socratic knowledge, that the way love is related to desire is not, strictly speaking, articulated here as a substitution. We have every right to remark that the substitution is carried out a bit quickly here. Which is not to say, however, that Socrates errs in this context, since it is clearly around the articulation of love-Eros and desire-Eros that the entire dialectic developed in the dialogue as a whole in fact revolves. The thing nevertheless needs to be pointed out in passing.

Let us note again that it is hardly accidental that we find thus isolated what is, strictly speaking, Socrates' presentation. Socrates goes so far that what, last time, I called his method – which is to bring to bear the effect of his questioning on what I call the coherence of the signifier – becomes manifest and visible in the very flow of his speech. Consider the way in which he poses his question to Agathon: εἶναι τινὸς ὁ Ἔρως ἔρως, ἢ οὐδενός (eínai tinós ho Éros éros, e oudenós), "Is Love such as to be love of something or of nothing?"

[199d]. As the Greek genitive, like the French genitive, has its ambiguities, "something" can take on two meanings here, and these two meanings are articulated in a heavy-handed, almost caricatural way, 144 in the distinction that Socrates draws – τινὸς (tinós) can mean being someone's descendant. "I'm not asking," he says, "if he is born of some mother or father" [199d], referring to the whole theogony that was discussed earlier on in the dialogue. The point is not to know from what Love descends, from whom, from what god, it comes – "my kingdom is not of this world," as it is said. The point is, rather, to know, at the level of the questioning of the signifier, what love as a signifier is correlated with.

To the first way of understanding the question [199d], Socrates opposes an example that we cannot help noticing. It is the same thing, he says, to ask regarding "Father," "When you say father, what does that imply?" It is not a question of a real father – that is, what he has by way of a child – but rather of the fact that, when one speaks of a father, one necessarily talks about a son. The father is, by definition, father of a son insofar as he is a father. "You'd tell me, of course, if you wanted to give me a good answer," as Léon Robin translates the Greek, "that it's of a son or a daughter that a father is the father" [199d]. Here we are in the specific realm of Socrates' dialectic, which consists in questioning the signifier as to its coherence as a signifier. Socrates is very nimble and sure-footed on this turf. This is what allows the rather quick substitution I mentioned earlier between Eros and desire to occur. To his mind, this is a form of marked progress that is made possible, he says, by his method.

If he yields the floor to Diotima, isn't it because, concerning love, the Socratic method itself can go no further? Everything shows this to be true, and Diotima's speech itself does so as well.

Why should we be surprised by this? If the initium [beginning] of the Socratic approach constitutes a step forward compared to that of his contemporaries, the Sophists, it is because this knowledge – the only certain knowledge, as Socrates tells us in the Phaedo – can be asserted on the sole basis of the coherence of discourse that involves dialogue and that revolves around apprehension of the necessity of the law of the signifier. Need I remind you that what is involved when one speaks of even and odd is a domain entirely enclosed within its own register? I think that I have taken enough pains in my teaching here and given you enough exercises to have shown you that even and odd owe nothing to any other experience than to that of the play of signifiers themselves. There is nothing even or odd, in other words countable, other than what has already 145 been raised to the function of a signifying element or seed of the signifying chain. One can count words or syllables, but one can only count things on the basis of the fact that words and syllables are already counted.

We are clearly at this level when Socrates situates himself outside of the confused world of the debate among the physicists who preceded him, and outside of the discussion of the Sophists who exploit, at various levels, what I might call, in an abbreviated way – and you know that I only resolve to do so with all kinds of reservations – the magical power of words. Socrates, on the contrary, asserts that knowledge resides within the play of the signifier. He posits at the same time that this knowledge, which is entirely transparent to itself, is what constitutes its truth.

Now, haven't we taken a step forward in the same realm that leads us to disagree with Socrates? Socrates' no doubt essential step ensures the autonomy of the law of the signifier, and prepares for us the field of the word that allowed him to criticize all human knowledge as such. But the novelty of psychoanalysis, assuming that what I have been teaching you about the Freudian revolution is correct, is precisely the fact that something can find sustenance in the law of the signifier, not only without involving knowledge but by explicitly excluding it, by constituting itself as unconscious – in other words, as necessitating the eclipse of the subject at the level of knowledge, in order to subsist as an unconscious chain, as constituting what is fundamentally irreducible in the subject's relationship to the signifier.

This is why we are the first, if not the only, people not to be necessarily surprised that the specifically Socratic discourse, that of ἐπιστήμη (epistéme), knowledge transparent to itself, cannot be pursued beyond a certain limit concerning a particular object, when this object – assuming that it is the one on which Freud was able to shed new light – is love.

Whatever the case may be, whether you follow me or you do not follow me here, it is clear that in a dialogue like Plato's Symposium – which over the ages has, as you know, lost little of its strength, constancy, or interrogative power, retaining all the perplexity that has developed around it – we cannot remain satisfied with an explanation as pitiful as the following, that if Socrates has Diotima speak in his stead, it's simply in order to avoid excessively ruffling 146
Agathon's feathers.

If you will allow me an equally ironic comparison, imagine that I have been asked to expound the whole of my doctrine concerning analysis, whether verbally or in writing, it makes little difference, and in doing so, at a particular turning point, I give the floor to Françoise Dolto. You would say, "There must be some reason for it. Why is he doing it?" Assuming, of course, that if I give her the floor it is not in order to have her say something stupid. That would not be my method and, moreover, I would have a hard time putting stupid words in her mouth.

Socrates has far less of a hard time with this, as you will see: Diotima's speech is full of glaring gaps. This allows us to easily understand why Socrates does not take responsibility for it. Moreover, Socrates points out these gaps with a whole series of responses that are – it's quite striking, and it suffices to read the text to see this – increasingly amused. His replies are at first quite respectful, and then more and more of the kind, "You think so?" and then, "So be it, let us go as far as the point to which you are dragging me," and in the end, it becomes clearly, "Knock yourself out, my dear girl, I'm listening, go on" [204c, 206e, 208b].

Here I cannot fail to point something out that seems not to have struck commentators. Aristophanes introduces a term concerning love which is transcribed quite simply in French by the word "dioecisme," which qualifies the Spaltung or division of the round primitive being, that is, of the derisory sphere in Aristophanes' image, whose value I talked about [two classes back]. He uses this word in comparison with a practice that was common in the context of community relations, relations of the city, the mainspring of all politics in Greek society. This dioecism consisted, when one wanted to finish off an enemy city, and this is still done in our times, in dispersing its inhabitants and placing them in what were called relocation camps. This happened shortly before the moment at which the Symposium came out, and it is even one of the landmarks that allows us to date it. For it seems that there is something anachronistic here, as the event to which Plato alludes, namely, an initiative on the part of Sparta, took place after the supposed meeting narrated in the Symposium.

This dioecism is very telling to us. It wasn't at random that I used the term Spaltung earlier, which evokes the subjective split. Isn't it 147 insofar as something about love evades Socrates' knowledge that he himself disappears, "dioecizes," and has a woman speak in his stead? Why not say the woman who is in him?

Be that as it may, no one disputes the idea – and certain people have stressed it, Wilamowitz-Moellendorff for one – that there is a difference in register between what Socrates develops with his dialectical method, and what, in Plato's testimony, he presents us in the form of a myth. This is not the case here alone – these things are always clearly separated in Plato's texts. When one arrives, and in plenty of fields other than love, at a certain terminus regarding what can be obtained at the level of epistéme or knowledge, myth is necessary in order to go further.

It is quite conceivable to us that there is a limit to knowledge, assuming that the latter is solely what can be accessed by purely and simply bringing the law of the signifier into play. In the absence of far-reaching conquests based on experiments, it is clear that in many domains – and even in domains in which we have no need for such conquests – it is urgent to give myth the floor.

What is remarkable is the rigor of this shifting of gears to the level of myth. Plato always knows perfectly well what he is doing or having Socrates do. Everyone knows that they are speaking in myths, μύθους (mýthous). I am not talking about myths in the common meaning of the word, for μύθους λέγειν (mýthous légein) does not mean that but, rather, "what people say." And in all of Plato's work, in the Phaedo, the Timaeus, and the Republic, myths arise when Plato needs them in order to fill the gap in what can be assured dialectically.

On this basis, we will be able to see more clearly what might be called the headway made by Diotima's speech.

Someone who is here today once wrote an article entitled, if memory serves me well, "Un désir d'enfant." This article was entirely constructed around the ambiguity of the expression désir d'enfant, for it can mean either that the child is the one who desires or that someone desires to have a child. It's no accident that signifiers work in this way, and the proof thereof is that it is around this very ambiguity that Socrates' approach to the problem revolves. Indeed, what was Agathon saying in the final analysis? That Eros is 148 eros – that is, desire – of beauty, in the sense that, I would say, it is the god Beauty who desires. And what does Socrates retort? That a desire for beauty implies that one does not possess beauty.

One might be tempted to shy away from such verbal arguments, but they are not useless in nature, nor do they constitute a sort of needling or hand waving. The proof thereof is that it is around these two terms that Diotima's whole speech develops.

3

To clearly highlight the continuity between Diotima and himself, Socrates tells us that Diotima commenced her dialogue with him at the same level and with the same kinds of arguments that he used with Agathon.

The stranger from Mantinea is presented to us as a priestess and magician. Let us not forget that at this turning point in the Symposium, the arts of divination are spoken of at length – in particular, the way of having one's wishes fulfilled by the gods and of influencing natural forces. Diotima is highly knowledgeable in all such matters of γοητεία (goeteía), sorcery, or "mantic," as the Count of Cabanis would have said. Goeteía is a Greek term and is found in the dialogue. We are thus told something about her to which surprisingly little attention has been paid, which is that she was successful through her artifices in delaying the plague for ten years, in Athens to boot. It must be admitted that this familiarity with the powers of the plague should give us pause for thought and help us situate the stature and approach of the person who is going to speak to us about love.

Things are thus introduced at this level, and Diotima goes on by responding to Socrates, who is, on this occasion, pretending to be naive or feigning that it is all Greek to him. He asks her the following question, "So, if love is not beautiful, is it ugly?" [201e]. Indeed, this is where his method leads, a method said to be one of more or less, yes or no, presence or absence. This is what is specific to the law of the signifier: whatever is not beautiful is ugly. This is, at least, what is rigorously implied by following Socrates' ordinary way of questioning. To which the priestess is in a position to answer, "Watch your tongue! Do you really think that, if a thing is not 149 beautiful, it has to be ugly?" [201e]. Diotima then recounts for us the myth of the birth of Love, and it is worth our while to dwell upon it.

This myth is found only in Plato's work. Among the innumerable mythical narrations of the birth of Love found in the literature of Antiquity, and I took the time to look through a number of them, there is no trace of anything that resembles what is enunciated here. Plato's is nevertheless the myth that has remained the most popular. It thus seems that someone, who owes nothing to tradition in this regard, to be explicit, a writer of the era of the Aufklärung like Plato, is altogether capable of forging a myth, a myth that must have been enthusiastically handed down through the ages for it to function as such. Can anyone be unaware of the fact that Love is the son of Πόρος (Póros) and Πενία (Penía) since Plato first said so?

The translator whose work I have before me, simply because it is placed opposite the Greek text, translates Póros with some relevance as Expedient. If that means Resource, it is certainly a valid translation. Astuce [cunning, ruse] is too, since Poros is the son of Μῆτις (Métis), which means something closer to invention than to wisdom. Opposite him we find the female character who will be the mother of Love, Penía, namely Poverty, even Abject Poverty. She is characterized in the text as ἀπορία (aporía) – namely, she has no resources. She herself is aware that she has no resources. The word "aporia," as you know, is the one that serves us concerning philosophical argumentation: it refers to an impasse, something that makes us throw in the towel, having exhausted our resources. So we have the female Aporia opposite Poros, the Expedient, which seems rather enlightening.

What is so nice about this myth is the way Aporia engendered Love with Poros. At the moment at which this happened, it was Aporia who was awake, who had her eyes wide open. She had, we are told, come to the festivities in honor of the birth of Aphrodite and, like any self-respecting Aporia in this hierarchical era, she remained on the steps near the door. Being Aporia – in other words, having nothing to offer – she did not enter the banquet hall. But the great thing about parties is precisely that things happen at them that overturn the ordinary order of events. Poros falls asleep. He falls asleep because he is drunk, and this is what allows Aporia to get herself knocked up by him, and to have this kid named Love, whose date of conception thus coincides with Aphrodite's date of birth. 150
This is why, we are told, love always has some obscure relationship with beauty, which is what is in fact at stake in the remainder of Diotima's speech. Love and beauty are connected owing to the fact that Aphrodite is a beautiful goddess.

Things are stated quite clearly here: masculinity is desirable, femininity is active. This is, at any rate, how things present themselves at the moment of Love's birth.

If I trot out in this regard the formulation that "love is giving what you don't have," there is nothing artificial about it and it's not simply in order to rehash one of my old stock phrases. It is obvious that this is what is at stake here, as the poor Aporia, by definition and structure, has nothing to give above and beyond her constitutive lack or aporia. The expression "giving what you don't have" is literally written out in section 202a of the text of the Symposium: ἄνευ τοῦ ἔχειν λόγον δοῦναι (áneu tou échein lógon doúnai). It is the exact same formulation, although it is proffered here as regards discourse – in particular, as regards the fact that [one can have a correct opinion or judgment] without having a reason or worthwhile explanation to give for it.

This is said at the moment at which Diotima is led to say what love belongs to. Well, love belongs to a zone, to a form of affair, thing, prágma, or praxis that is at the same level and of the same quality as δόξα (dóxa). In other words, there are discourses, behaviors, or opinions – those are the translations we provide for the term dóxa – that are true without the subject being able to know it. Dóxa might well be true, but it is not epistéme; it is one of the stock tenets of Platonic doctrine to distinguish the field of dóxa from that of epistéme. Love as such is part of the former field. It lies between epistéme and ἀμαθία (amathía) [ignorance], just as it lies between the beautiful and the ugly. It is neither the one nor the other. This might well remind us of Socrates' objection, an objection which is no doubt trumped up, that if love is lacking in beauty, it must be ugly. Yet it is not ugly. The whole domain exemplified by dóxa, to which we constantly return in Plato's work, shows that love is, to use Plato's term, μεταξύ (metaxú) – that is, between the two.

But that's not all. We cannot remain satisfied with such an abstract, even negative, definition of what is in-between. It is here that Diotima brings in the notion of the demonic as the intermediary between immortals and mortals, between gods and men. This notion is essential here, in that it confirms what I told you we should 151 think concerning what the gods are – namely, that they belong to the field of the real. The gods exist – their existence is in no wise disputed here. The demonic, daemon, or δαιμόνιον (daimónion) – and Love is far from the one example – is that by which the gods convey their message to mortals, whether they are asleep or awake.

Something strange that does not seem to have attracted much attention either is who this "whether they are asleep or awake" concerns? The gods or men? I assure you that in the Greek text there is room for doubt. Everyone translates it commonsensically – as related to men – but it is in the dative, which is precisely the case of the theoí in the sentence, such that it is another little enigma upon which we will not dwell for long. Let us simply say that this myth situates the demonic order where our psychology speaks of animism.

This should incite us to rectify our overly cursory idea of the notion a primitive person would have of the animistic world. What we are told in passing is that it is the world of messages that we would call enigmatic, which means – but only to us – messages in which the subject does not recognize his own contribution. If the discovery of the unconscious is essential, it is because it has allowed us to extend the field of messages we can authenticate, in the only proper meaning of the term, insofar as it is grounded in the domain of the symbolic. In other words, many of the messages that we believe to be opaque messages from reality [réel] are merely our own. This is what we have reclaimed from the world of the gods. Here, at the point at which we have arrived in the Symposium, this has not yet been reclaimed.

Next time, we will continue to examine Diotima's myth from end to end, and having given it a thorough working over, we will see why it is doomed to leave opaque the object of the praises that constitute the rest of the Symposium. The only field in which the elucidation of its truth can develop is the one that follows Alcibiades' entrance.

Far from being a mere add-on, a null and void part, or one which must simply be rejected, Alcibiades' entrance is essential. It is only in the action that develops afterward between Alcibiades, 152

Agathon, and Socrates that we can effectively delineate the structural relationship in which we can recognize what the discovery of the unconscious and the practice of psychoanalysis – namely, the experience of transference – finally allow us as analysts to be able to express dialectically.

January 18, 1961

153

IX

EXIT FROM THE ULTRA-WORLD

The fascination with beauty.
Identification with what is supremely lovable.
Socrates' "he did not know."
It takes three to love.
The object of unique covetousness.

Last time we got as far as the point where, in speaking of love, Socrates has Diotima speak in his stead.

I underscored the astonishing substitution that occurs at the dialogue's acme or point of maximum interest, placing a question mark next to it. Socrates has just provided the decisive turning point by showing lack to be at the heart of the question of what love is. Love can, in effect, only be articulated around lack, owing to the fact that love can but lack what it desires. I showed you that Socrates' questioning, with its ever triumphant and magisterial style, is the crux of his dialectic insofar as he brings it to bear on the coherence of the signifier. It is at the point at which he distinguishes epistéme, science, from every other kind of knowledge that, strangely enough, he ambiguously yields the floor to she who, in his stead, expresses herself through myth. I pointed out to you that the Greek term for myth is not as narrow as it is in our language, due to the distance we have placed between myth and science: μύθους λέγειν (mýthous légein) is both a precise story and discourse – in a word, it is what people say. This is what Socrates defers to in letting Diotima speak.

I briefly highlighted the relation between this substitution and the dioecism whose form and essence Aristophanes had already outlined as being at the heart of the problem of love. By an odd division, it is perhaps the woman in Socrates, I said, that he allows to speak at this point.

The set or succession of forms, the series of transformations – in the sense the latter term takes on in combinatories – [in Diotima's speech] is expressed in a geometrical demonstration. And it is in the 154 transformation of figures as her speech proceeds that we will try to find the structural landmarks which, for us and for Plato who is our guide here, provide the coordinates of the dialogue's theme – namely, love.

1

Examining Diotima's speech, we see something develop in it that makes us slip further and further away from the original notion Socrates introduced in his dialectic by positing the term "lack."

What Diotima questions us about, what she leads us toward, is already sketched out in the question she asks at the point at which she takes up Socrates' speech, "What is he who loves lacking in?" Here we find ourselves immediately drawn into the dialectic of good things [biens], concerning which I ask you to recall my Seminar last year on ethics. "Why does he who loves love these things?" [204d–e]. He loves them, she continues, in order to enjoy them. Then she stops and a backward movement begins.

Is the dimension of love thus going to be said to arise from all good things [biens]? Diotima here refers to something as worthy of note as what I accentuated as being the original function of creation as such: ποίησις (poíesis). When we speak of poíesis, she says, we are talking about creation, but don't you see that the use we make of it is more limited when we are referring to poetry and music? The name for the whole serves to designate the part [205c]. Similarly, every aspiration toward good things is a sort of love, but in order for us to speak of love, strictly speaking, something must be made more specific. This is how she introduces the theme of the love of beauty. Beauty specifies the direction in which the call or attraction to possession, to the enjoyment of possessing, to the constitution of a κτῆμα (ktéma) arises. This is the point to which Diotima leads us in order to define love.

In the course of her speech, a moment of surprise or a jump is clearly emphasized. In what sense is this good thing [bien] related to beauty or specified especially as beauty? It is here that Socrates 155 attests, in one of his replies, to the fact that he marvels at sophistic discourse, that he is shocked by it, as I mentioned last time. Diotima proves here that she has the same priceless authority as that with which the Sophists exercised their fascination, and Plato warns us that in this sense she expresses herself exactly like them [208b].

What she presents is the following: beauty has nothing to do with having, with anything that can be possessed, but rather with being, and specifically with mortal being.

What is characteristic of mortal being is that it perpetuates itself through reproduction. Reproduction and destruction, such is the alternation that rules the realm of what is perishable. Such is also the feature that makes it an inferior order of reality – at least this is how it is described in the Socratic view, as much by Socrates as by Plato. It is precisely because the human realm is afflicted with this alternation of generation and corruption that it finds its eminent rule elsewhere, higher up, in the realm of essences – which is afflicted by neither generation nor corruption – that of the eternal forms, participation in which alone assures that what exists is grounded in being.

And beauty? In the movement of generation, which is the mode by which what is mortal reproduces itself, approaching thereby the permanent and the eternal, its fragile mode of participating in the eternal – in this very movement or distant form of participation, it is beauty that helps us, as it were, get over the difficult hurdles. Beauty is the mode of a kind of giving birth – which is not painless, but which involves the least pain possible. It is the painful escape route of all that is mortal toward what it aspires to: immortality. Diotima's whole speech articulates the function of beauty as being first and foremost an illusion, a fundamental mirage, by which perishable and fragile beings are sustained in their quest for permanence, which is their essential aspiration.

One finds therein almost shameless occasion for a whole series of slippages that amount to so many dissimulations. Diotima introduces first, as being of the same order, the constancy whereby the subject recognizes himself as always being the same in his life, his short life as an individual, despite the fact that there is not a single detail of his carnal reality, from his hair right down to his bones, 156 which is not the locus of perpetual renewal. The underlying theme is that nothing is ever the same, everything is in flux, everything changes, and yet something recognizes itself, affirms itself, tells itself that it is always itself. This is what Diotima refers to significantly in order to tell us that the renewal of beings via generation is analogous, and in the final analysis, of the same nature. The fact that beings succeed one another by reproducing the same type – in other words, the mystery of morphogenesis – is the same as what sustains the form in its constancy.

Here we see a prime reference to death, and a pinpointing of the function of the mirage of beauty as that which guides the subject in his relationship to death, insofar as he is both outstripped and directed by immortality. It is impossible, in this respect, for you not to be reminded of what I tried to broach last year concerning the function of beauty as a defense, where beauty intervenes as a barrier at the limit of the zone I defined as lying between-two-deaths. If there are two desires that captivate man, on the one hand in relation to eternity, and on the other in relation to reproduction, complete with the corruption and destruction it involves, beauty is designed to veil his desire for death insofar as it is unapproachable. This is clear even at the beginning of Diotima's speech.

We find anew here the ambiguous phenomenon that I brought out concerning tragedy. Tragedy evokes or approaches the desire for death which, as such, hides behind the evocation of Áte, the fundamental calamity around which the tragic hero's fate revolves; and tragedy is also, for us, insofar as we are called upon to participate in it, the culminating moment in which the mirage of tragic beauty appears.

This is the ambiguity around which I told you the slippage in Diotima's whole speech occurs. I will leave you to trace it yourselves through all its developments. The desire for beauty [désir de beau] – desire insofar as it attaches itself to this mirage and gets caught up in it – is what corresponds to the hidden presence of the desire for death. The desire that comes from beauty [désir du beau] is what, reversing this function, makes the subject choose the trace or appeals [appels] of what the object offers him, or at least certain objects. It is here that the slippage occurs in Diotima's speech that turns beauty – which was not, strictly speaking, a medium, but rather a transition or passageway – into the very goal that is sought. In remaining, so to speak, the guide, the guide becomes the object(ive) or rather takes 157 the place of the objects that can be its prop. And this transition is explicitly indicated in her speech.

But this transition is distorted [faussée]. Diotima goes as far as possible in developing functional beauty, beauty in its relation to the aim of immortality, and does not eschew paradox, since she specifically evokes the tragic reality to which we referred last year. She goes so far as to raise a question, which is not without eliciting some cynical smiles: "Do you actually believe that those who prove themselves capable of the most beautiful acts, like Alcestis" – about whom I spoke last year concerning tragedy's between-two-deaths – "insofar as she accepted to die in Admetus' stead, did not do it so that people would talk about it, so that discourse would forever immortalize her?" [208d]. This is where Diotima stops, saying, "While you have been able to follow me thus far, I don't know if you will be able to go as far as époptie," evoking thereby the dimension of the mysteries [209e–210a].

She then resumes her speech in this other register, wherein what was but a transition [or guide] becomes a goal. Developing the theme of what we might call a Platonic Don Juanism, she shows us the ladder that proposes itself at this new phase, which develops in an initiation-like vein – we see objects dissolve, in a progressive climb, into pure beauty, beauty in itself, unadulterated beauty [211d–e]. Diotima abruptly shifts to a theme that certainly seems to no longer have anything to do with that of reproduction, and that moves from love, not only for a handsome young man, but for the beauty in all beautiful young people, to the essence of beauty, and then from the essence of beauty to eternal beauty. She thus takes a very lofty perspective, to the point of grasping the play, in the world order, of the reality that revolves around the fixed plane of the stars, which is, as I have already indicated, that by which [human] knowledge joins up with that of the Immortals in Plato's perspective.

I think I have sufficiently made you sense the dissimulation by which, on the one hand, beauty – at first defined and encountered as a bonus along the path of being – becomes the goal of the pilgrimage, while, on the other hand, the object – at first presented as the prop of beauty – becomes the transition toward beauty.

158 To return here to my own terminology, one might say that the dialectical definition of love, as it is developed by Diotima, intersects with what I have tried to define as the metonymic function in desire. What is at issue in her speech is something beyond all objects that resides in the movement of a certain aim and a certain relation – that of desire – through all objects and toward an unlimited perspective.

On the basis of numerous clues, one might believe that this is the last word of the discussion in the Symposium. This is basically what we have long been used to taking as Plato's view of Eros.

Erastés, erón, the lover, is led toward a distant erómenos, by all the erómenoi, all that is lovable, all that is worthy of being loved. It is a distant erómenos or erómenon, for his quest can also have a neuter goal. The problem then is what is signified by and what can continue to signify – beyond this outstripping, this marked jump – that which presented itself at the beginning of the dialectic as ktéma, the goal of possessing.

The step we have made no doubt adequately indicates that the aim is no longer to be situated at the level of having, but rather at the level of being, and also that this progression or ascesis involves a transformation or becoming of the subject: a final identification with what is supremely lovable. In short, the further the subject goes in his aim, the more he is within his rights to love himself, so to speak, via his ideal ego. The more he desires, the more he himself becomes desirable.

Theologians point at this in order to tell us that Platonic Eros cannot be reduced to what Christian Agápe has revealed to us, inasmuch as in Platonic Eros, the loving person aims only at his own perfection – love aims only at its own perfection.

Now, the commentary that I am in the process of offering on the Symposium seems to me apt to show that this is not at all the case.

This is not where Plato leaves off, on the condition that we are willing to look beyond the immediate terrain and ask ourselves, first, what is signified by the fact that Socrates has Diotima speak in his stead and, second, what happens once Alcibiades arrives on the scene.

2

159

Let us not forget that Diotima first introduces love as not at all partaking of the nature of the gods, but rather of that of daemons, insofar as their nature lies between that of Immortals and mortals.

Let us not forget that, in order to illustrate it and ensure that its impact is felt, she supplies nothing less than a comparison with what, in Plato's discourse, lies midway between epistéme, science in the Socratic sense, and amathía, ignorance – namely, dóxa, true opinion [202a]. Dóxa is no doubt true, but the subject is unable to account for it – he does not know in what way it is true.

I highlighted in this context two statements that are very striking. The first, ἄνευ τοῦ ἔχειν λόγον δοῦναι (áneu tou échein lógon doúnai), characterizes dóxa as giving an answer without having one, echoing the formulation I myself have proposed here that love is giving what you don't have. The other formulation, which stands opposite the first, and which is no less worthy of being emphasized, is on the courtyard side, so to speak, looking out toward amathía. Dóxa, indeed, is not ignorance either, for how could what perchance hits the real and encounters what is, τὸ γὰρ τοῦ ὄντος τύγχανον (to gar tou óntos túngchanon), be absolute ignorance [202a]?

This is what we must perceive in what I might call the Platonic staging of the dialogue. Even though it is posited at the outset that the only matters about which Socrates knows anything are matters of love, he can only speak of them by remaining in the zone of the "he did not know." Even when knowledgeable, he himself cannot speak of what he knows and must have someone else speak who speaks without knowing.

This is what allows us to situate in its proper context, for example, the intangibility of Agathon's response, when he eludes Socrates' dialectic by saying to him quite simply, "Let's just say that I didn't know what I meant." This is why. This – in the extraordinarily derisory way I have brought out – is what makes for the import of Agathon's speech, the peculiar import it derives from the fact that these words are put in a tragic poet's mouth. The tragic poet, as I showed you, can speak of love only in a clownish way, just as 160 Aristophanes, the comic poet, has been given the job of bringing out the passionate aspects that we associate with the tragic landscape.

"He did not know." The myth Diotima introduces concerning the birth of Love takes on its full meaning here. Love is conceived while Poros is asleep, Poros being the son of Metis, Invention, the all-knowing and all-powerful, the most resourceful. It is while he is sleeping, at a moment at which he longer knows anything, that the encounter takes place through which Love is engendered. She who slips in, owing to her desire to produce this birth, Aporia, the feminine Aporia, is erastés, the originally desiring person in the veritably feminine position I have emphasized several times. She is quite precisely defined in her essence or nature, let me stress this, before the birth of Love, by what she is lacking – there is nothing erómenon about her. In the myth, Aporia, absolute poverty, is at the doorstep of the banquet of the gods being held the day of Aphrodite's birth. She is in no wise recognized, she has in herself none of the qualities [biens] that would give her the right to sit at the table of true beings [étants]. It is in this respect that she is prior to Love. The metaphor by which we always recognize that love is operating, even when it is hidden in the shadows, the metaphor whereby erón or erastés is restored to erómenon, is missing here due to the absence of erómenon at the outset. It is the logical time before the birth of Love that is thus described here.

On the other hand, the "he did not know" is absolutely essential. Allow me to highlight what came to me last night while I was trying to punctuate this structural, connecting moment.

It was the echo of the admirable poem from which I deliberately selected an example in order to try to demonstrate the fundamental nature of metaphor. The poem, "Booz Sleeping," would alone suffice, despite all the objections our snobbery might have against it, to make Victor Hugo a poet worthy of Homer. You will not be surprised at the following two verses which suddenly came to me, having known them forever:

Booz ne savait point qu'une femme était là,
Et Ruth ne savait point ce que Dieu voulait d'elle.

Booz did not know that a woman was there, and Ruth did not know what God wanted from her.

Reread the poem and you will see that it lacks none of the features that give the fundamental drama of Oedipus its eternal meaning and 161 weight, not even the between-two-deaths evoked several stanzas before these concerning Booz's age and widowhood.

Voilà longtemps que celle avec qui j'ai dormi,
Ô Seigneur ! a quitté ma couche pour la vôtre;
Et nous sommes encor tout mêlés l'un à l'autre,
Elle à demi vivante et moi mort à demi.

She with whom I slept has long since,
O Lord! left my bed for yours;
Yet we are still mingled with one another,
She half-living and I half-dead.

We have here the between-two-deaths and its relation to the tragic dimension evoked in it as constitutive of paternal transmission – nothing is missing in this poem. Which is why the metaphorical function is found throughout the poem. Everything is taken to extremes, right up to the aberrations, so to speak, of the poet, since he goes so far as to say what he has to say by forcing the themes he uses: "Comme dormait Jacob, comme dormait Judith" ("As Jacob slept, as Judith slept"). Yet it was never Judith who slept, it was Holofernes. But so what? Hugo is right all the same. What we glimpse in effect at the end of the poem is what is expressed by the wonderful image with which it concludes:

et Ruth se demandait, Immobile, ouvrant l'oeil à moitié sous ses voiles, Quel Dieu, quel moissonneur de l'éternel été Avait, en s'en allant, négligemment jeté Cette faucille d'or dans le champ des étoiles.

and Ruth wondered,
Lying motionless and half-opening her eye beneath her veils,
What God, what harvester of eternal summer,
Had, in departing, negligently thrown
This golden sickle into the field of stars.

The billhook [with which Cronus castrated Uranus] could not fail to be included at the end of this complete constellation that constitutes the paternity complex.

This digression, for which I beg your pardon, concerning the "he did not know," seems to me essential to make you understand what is at stake in Diotima's speech. Socrates can only locate himself in his knowledge here by showing that there can be no discourse on love but from the point at which he did not know. This is the mainspring of what is signified by Socrates' choice of this way of teaching at this precise moment in the dialogue.

But at the same time, we have proof that this is not what allows us 162 to grasp what takes place in love relations either. What allows us to is precisely what will follow – namely, Alcibiades' entrance.

3

The marvelous, splendid, oceanic unfolding of Diotima's speech ends without Socrates having, in sum, made any attempt to resist.

Significantly, right after her speech, Aristophanes raises his index finger to say, "Let me get a word in edgewise all the same." An allusion has been made to a certain theory, indeed to Aristophanes' theory, which the good Diotima has just nonchalantly kicked out of the way [205d–e]. This is significantly anachronistic, for while Socrates says that Diotima told him all of this some time before, it doesn't stop him from having her talk about the speech Aristophanes just made. Aristophanes has a thing or two to say in response, and for good reason. Plato indexes this point, showing that there is someone who is not content. Let us see, using my method, which is to stick to the text, whether what develops afterward does not bear some relation to this index, even if this raised index finger, which says it all, gets cut off. And by what? By Alcibiades' entrance.

Here, a change of scene takes place before our very eyes.

We must clearly indicate first of all into what world it suddenly casts us anew, after the great fascinating mirage. I say "anew," for this world is not the ultra-world, it is the world tout court, in which we know, after all, how love is experienced. Despite all these fine stories, as fascinating as they may seem, a bit of tumultuous ruckus – the entrance of a few drunkards – suffices to bring us back to reality [réel].

We are now going to see incarnated the transcendence by which we have seen played out, in a ghost-like way, the substitution of one for another. And if, as I teach you, it takes three to love, not just two, well, we are going to witness it here.

Alcibiades enters, and it is not unfitting that you see him emerge in the shape in which he appears, with his formidable countenance due not only to his officially drunk state, but also to the large quantity of garlands he is wearing that manifestly have an eminently exhibitionistic meaning in the divine position he assumes as a leader of men [chef humain] [212d–e].

163 Never forget what we are missing out on by no longer wearing wigs. Try to imagine what the learned as well as the frivolous agitations of seventeenth-century conversations might have been like when each of the speakers shook, with each of his words, his lionlike mane, which was moreover a magnet for filth and vermin. Picture to yourself the wig of the seventeenth century. From the perspective of its mantic effect, we are missing out on quite a bit.

Not Alcibiades, however, and he goes right to the only person whose identity he is able to discern given his inebriated condition. Thank God it is the man of the house, Agathon. He goes to lie down next to him, without realizing where that places him, namely, in the metaxú position, in-between, between Socrates and Agathon – in other words, precisely at the point at which we have arrived, where the debate swings between the game of he who knows and, knowing, shows that he must speak without knowing, and he who, not knowing, spoke no doubt like a birdbrain, but very well nevertheless, as Socrates himself emphasizes when he comments, "You said some very fine things." This is where Alcibiades seats himself, not without jumping up when he perceives that that damned Socrates is there too.

I will not take our analysis of what is contributed by the whole scene which begins with Alcibiades' entrance all the way today, although not for personal reasons. I will nevertheless sketch out the first outlines of what the scene introduces.

Well, let's say that there is a stage-like atmosphere to it. I will not accentuate the caricatural aspect of things. I spoke offhandedly of this symposium as an assembly of old faggots, given that they are not all characterized by the first flush of youth, yet they are not without being based on a certain model. Alcibiades is a real piece of work. And when Socrates asks to be protected from Alcibiades who does not allow him to look at anyone else, it is not because commentaries on the Symposium have been provided over the centuries by university professors, with all that implies both by way of nobility and universal missing the point – we are not going to let this make us overlook the fact that what is happening here is, strictly speaking, as I have already mentioned, scandalous in nature.

We must recognize that the dimension of love is in the process of showing itself to us in a way in which one of its characteristics certainly must be sketched out. First of all, it is clear that when this 164 dimension manifests itself in reality [réel], it does not tend toward harmony. The beauty toward which the procession of desiring souls seemed to climb certainly does not seem to structure everything into a kind of convergence.

Oddly enough, it is not clear, in love's manifestations, that you call on everyone else to love what you love, to join with you in the ascension toward erómenon. The first thing we see is that Alcibiades wants to keep Socrates – this eminently lovable man, since he is depicted as a divine personage right from the very first words of the dialogue – for himself.

You will tell me that you don't believe it, basing yourselves on all sorts of things that prove it. That's not the point. We are following the text, and this is what is presented in it. And not only is this what is presented in it, but it is this very dimension that is, strictly speaking, introduced here.

Is it a question of competition? If the word is taken in the sense and function I gave it when I articulated the transitivisms by which the object is constituted, insofar as it institutes communication between two subjects, no. Something of a different order is introduced here. The object of unique covetousness, so to speak, is introduced and constituted as such at the heart of love's action. One wants to shove aside the competition for this object that one is averse to even having shown.

Recall that this is how I introduced it in my discourse three years ago [Seminar V]. Remember that, in order to define object a in fantasy, I took the example, in La Grande Illusion by Renoir, of Dalio showing his little automaton, and the woman-like blushing with which he effaces himself after having set it in motion. Alcibiades' public confession is played out in this same dimension, accompanied by some kind of uneasiness of which Alcibiades himself is so well aware that he even mentions it in his speech [214d].

We are no doubt in the truth of wine – this is explicitly stated – in vino veritas. Kierkegaard takes up this point when he writes his own Symposium ["In Vino Veritas" in Works of Love] – but one must truly have gone beyond all the bounds of propriety to speak of love as Alcibiades does when he exposes what transpired between himself and Socrates.

165 What kind of object is there behind all of this that leads to such a vacillation in the subject himself?

I will leave you today with the function of the object, insofar as it is specifically indicated in the whole of this text, in order to present it to you next time.

What I will tell you will revolve around a word that is found in the text, and whose use in Greek allows us to glimpse the history and function, which I believe I have refound, of the object at stake here. This word is ἄγαλμα (ágalma), which, we are told, is what is hidden within the disheveled silenus known as Socrates.

I leave you today with the unexplored enigma of this word in the dialogue itself.

January 25, 1961

X

ÁGALMA

Ágalma and the master.
The fetish function.
The god trap.
From the partial object to the other.
A subject is an other.

I ended last time – at a sort of way-station along our path – on a word about which I said I would leave it with its full enigmatic value until this time: ágalma.

I didn't realize I had put it so well. For many of you the enigma was so complete that people asked, "What? What did he say? Do you know?" Anyway, to those who manifested this worry, someone in my household was able to provide the following response – which proves that in my home secondary school serves at least some purpose – that it means "ornament" or "jewelry."

Be that as it may, this response was but a first take on what everyone should know: ἀγάλλω (agállo) means to "bejewel" or "adorn," and ágalma does in fact signify "ornament" or "jewelry" at first glance. But the notion of jewelry is not as simple as it may seem and one realizes right away that it can take us quite far. Why bejewel oneself? And with what?

If we are at the crux of something now, many different avenues must lead us here. The fact remains that I selected the word ágalma as the pivotal point of my explanation. Rather than take it as an attempt on my part to find something extremely unusual, assume that in a text like the Symposium, to which we attribute the utmost rigor, something leads us to this crucial point.

168

1

The word ágalma appears at the very moment at which I told you the scene changes completely. After the eulogistic games regulated up until then by the topic of love, Alcibiades, the actor who changes everything, enters.

The proof that he changes everything is that he himself modifies the rules of the game, assigning himself the place of he who presides over the symposium. From now on, he says, we are no longer going to provide eulogies of love, but of the other, and namely, of the person to our right. That's already going very far. If love is to be involved here, it's love in action, and it is the relation of the one to the other that will have to manifest itself here.

I have already pointed out to you a remarkable fact that is manifested as soon as things take off in this direction, led by the experienced director whom we assume to be behind this dialogue. I must say that this assumption is confirmed by the incredible intellectual genealogy that stems from the Symposium, the second to last echo of which I mentioned last time, Kierkegaard's "In Vino Veritas" [in Works of Love], and the last, which I have already mentioned as well, Agape and Eros, by Anders Nygren, it too being dependent upon the structure of the Symposium. As soon as this experienced director brings into play the other, there has to be more than one – there are two others here. In other words, there have to be at least three in all. This remarkable fact does not escape Socrates in his response to Alcibiades. After Alcibiades' extraordinary avowal, public confession, or outburst that lies somewhere between a declaration of love and almost, as it were, a defamation of Socrates, the latter responds: "It is not for my benefit that you have spoken, but for Agathon's."

This allows us to realize that we are shifting to another register than the one I pointed out in Diotima's speech. What was at stake there was a dyadic relation. He who begins to climb toward love proceeds by the path of identification and of production, as it were, aided by the marvel of beauty. He finds in beauty his terminus and identifies it with the perfection of the labor of love. We see there a twofold relationship whose goal is identification with the 169 Sovereign Good – something that I called into question last year. Something else is suddenly substituted here for the theme of the supreme Good – the complexity or, more precisely, the triplicity that proposes to provide us with what I consider essential in the psychoanalytic discovery: the topology from which the subject's relation to the symbolic results at its core, insofar as the symbolic is essentially distinct from the imaginary and its capture.

This is our terminus, and I will articulate it next time in concluding what I want to say about the Symposium, which will allow me to bring out old models that I gave you of intrasubjective topology, insofar as Freud's second topography must be understood accordingly. What I am pointing out today is essential if we are to intersect that topology, in the sense that we have to intersect it regarding the topic of love. In question here is the nature of love and a position, an essential but forgotten or elided connection, of which we analysts have nevertheless provided the linchpin that allows us to bring out its problematic. What I have to say regarding ágalma today will revolve around this.

It is all the more extraordinary and almost scandalous that the fact that we have here a specifically psychoanalytic notion has not been better highlighted before. I hope to help you put your finger on it later and obtain your consent on this point.

Here is how ágalma presents itself in the text. Alcibiades speaks of Socrates and says that he is going to unmask him. As you know, Alcibiades goes into considerable detail regarding his affair with Socrates. What did Alcibiades try to do? I would say that he tried to get Socrates to manifest his desire to him. He knows that Socrates has some desire for him, but what he wanted was a sign thereof.

Let us leave that in abeyance for a moment. It is too soon to ask why. We are merely at the beginning of Alcibiades' speech, and at first glance, it doesn't seem essentially different from what has been said thus far by the others. Early on, in Pausanias' speech, the question was what we look for in love, and it was said that what everyone looks for in the other – an exchange of courtesies – is what he contains that is erómenon, desirable. The very same thing seems to be at stake now.

Alcibiades tells us, as a sort of preamble, that Socrates is someone whose amorous inclinations draw him to pretty boys [216d]. He is ignorant of everything, he knows nothing – at least apparently. On this subject, Alcibiades repeats the famous comparison with the 170 silenus that he mentioned when beginning his eulogy, and which is twofold in scope. First of all, there is Socrates' appearance, which is anything but beautiful. But, on the other hand, this silenus is not simply the image designated by that name. It is also a wrapper that looks like a silenus usually looks: like a container or way of presenting something. There must have been some small items in the industry of the time – little silenuses that served as jewelry boxes or packaging in which to offer gifts.

This is precisely what is involved. This topological indication is essential. What is important is what is inside. Ágalma may well mean ornamentation or ornament, but here it means above all gem or precious object – something that is inside. And it is with this that Alcibiades rips us away from the dialectic of beauty that had, up until then, served as the pathway, guide, or mode of capture along the pathway of the desirable. He makes the scales fall from our eyes regarding Socrates himself.

Let it be known, he says, that Socrates supposedly loves pretty boys; οὔτε εἴ τις καλός ἐστι (oúte ei tis kalós estí), but he couldn't care less whether one or the other of them is pretty, μέλει αὐτῷ οὐδέν (mélei autó oudén), he despises it on the contrary, καταφρονεῖ (kataphroneí), to an unbelievable extent, τοσοῦτον ὅσον οὐδ' ἂν εἷς οἰηθείη (tosoúton hóson oud an heis oietheíe), you can't even imagine how much [216d–e]. And in truth the goal he pursues – what is it exactly? I am underscoring it because it is in the text. It is expressly articulated at this point that it is not outward good things that he pursues, wealth, for example, about which everyone up until then – these are refined people, after all – has said this is not what we look for in others. It is not any of the other advantages either that may seem in some way to bring μακαρία (makaría), happiness, ὑπὸ πλήθους (hupó pléthous), to one and all [216e]. We would be completely mistaken to interpret this as if the point were to disdain the things that are considered good by the masses. What are dismissed here are precisely what was talked about up until this point: good things in general.

On the other hand, Alcibiades tells us, don't be fooled by Socrates' strange appearance – he pretends to be naive, εἰρωνευόμενος (eironeuómenos), questions, acts dumb to find out more, truly acts like a child, and spends his time bantering. But σπουδάσαντος δὲ αὐτοῦ (spoudásantos de autoú) – which is not "when he decides to be serious," as it is translated, but rather, "let's be serious, pay close 171 attention" – open this silenus up; ἀνοιχθέντος (anoichthéntos), partly open, I don't know if anyone has ever seen the ἀγάλματα (agálmata) that are inside [216e].

Alcibiades thus immediately calls into question whether anyone has ever been able to see what is at stake. We know that this is not merely an impassioned speech. It is the discourse of passion at its peak of trembling – namely, at a peak that is entirely contained in his preamble [origine], even before he explains himself. It is here, weighed down by everything he has to tell us, that he is about to let loose with a back kick. It is thus clearly the language of passion.

We immediately sense this unique, personal relationship. "No one has ever seen what is in question as I managed to. I saw it. I saw them, the agálmata that are already divine – χρυσᾶ (chrusá), they're wonderful, they're golden – totally beautiful, so utterly amazing that there was only one thing to do, ἐν βραχεῖ (en bracheí), and right away, as directly as possible: to do everything Socrates ordered" [216e–217a]; ποιητέον (poietéon) – what must be done, what becomes one's duty – is to do everything it pleases Socrates to command.

I don't think that it is pointless to articulate such a text step by step. You don't read Plato the way you read France-Soir or the International Journal of Psychoanalysis.

At stake here is something whose effects are surprising. On the one hand, no one tells us here what the agálmata, in the plural, are. On the other hand, they immediately lead to a subversion or falling under the spell of the commandments of he who possesses them. Doesn't this smack of the magic that I already pointed out to you regarding Che vuoi? It is truly this key, this essential razor's edge of the topology of the subject that begins with the question, "What do you want?" In other words, "Is there a desire that is truly your will?"

Alcibiades then goes on to say, since I thought Socrates was serious when he spoke of ἐμῇ ὥρᾳ (emé hóra) – it's translated as "the flower of my beauty" [or "my youthful bloom," 217a] – and the [account of the] whole seduction scene begins.

We won't go any further into it today. I will try to convey what makes the passage from the first moment to the next necessary – namely, why it is absolutely necessary that Socrates be unmasked. For the time being, I am simply going to dwell on these agálmata.

2

172

Give me enough credit to believe that this is not the sole text that made me curious about the meaning of ágalma. Not that there would be anything wrong with that, for the Symposium suffices to justify my interest in it, but I am going to tell you how it was.

Although I can't exactly date it, my first encounter with ágalma was one that, like all encounters, was unforeseen. The word struck me several years ago in a verse of Euripides' Hecuba, and you will easily understand why. It was shortly before I situated, here in this seminar, the function of the phallus in the essential place that analytic experience and Freud's doctrine show us it has in the connection between demand and desire, such that I did not fail to be struck in passing by the use of the term by Hecuba.

Hecuba says, "Where are they taking me, where are they deporting me to?" The tragedy of Hecuba is set at the moment of the capture of Troy, and Delos figures among the places that she envisions. Might she be deported to Delos, which is at once sacred and plague-stricken? As you may know, you didn't have the right to give birth there or to die there. And here, in her description of Delos, Hecuba alludes to an object there that was famous. The way she speaks about it indicates that it was a palm tree. This palm tree, she says, is ὠδῖνος ἄγαλμα δίας (odínos ágalma días); ὠδῖνος (odínos) means from pain, and Dias designates Leto here [verse 461]. Hecuba is referring to the birth of Apollo and the ágalma of the divinity's [Leto's] pain.

We encounter anew here the theme of giving birth, but it is somewhat different in this case, for here there is a trunk or tree, a magic object erected and preserved as a landmark throughout the ages. This cannot fail to remind us, at least we analysts, of the register or theme of the phallus, insofar as the fantasy of the phallus is here, as we know, on the horizon, situating this infantile object. And the fetish that it remains cannot but echo this signification for us.

It is clear that ágalma cannot be translated in any way, shape, or form by "ornament" or "jewelry" here, or even, as we often see in published texts, by "statue." In many instances, when θεῶν ἀγάλματα 173 (theón agálmata) is translated quickly, it seems that the latter works and that it is a question in the text of statues of the gods.

You see why I think it's a term whose signification should be pointed out. There is a hidden accent here that reminds us not to let ourselves be led down the path of banalization that tends to ever more completely efface the true meaning of texts. Whenever you encounter the word ágalma, pay close attention. Even if it seems to have to do with statues of the gods, look closely and you will see that it always has to do with something else.

I am not talking in riddles here. I am giving you the key to the question by saying that this term always emphasizes the fetishistic function of the object.

I am not giving a course on ethnology or even linguistics here and, on this subject, I am not going to take up the fetishistic function of round rocks at the center of a temple, the temple of Apollo, for example, for that is very well known. You very often see the god himself represented. What is the fetish of such and such a tribe, for example, from a bend in the Niger? It is something unspeakable and shapeless, on which enormous quantities of liquids of various origins can at times be poured, liquids that are more or less sticky and disgusting – the accumulated superimposition of which, running from blood to shit, constitutes the sign that there is something around which all sorts of effects revolve. Fetishes are in themselves very different from images or icons, insofar as the latter are intended to be copies.

The special power of the object remains at the root of the usage whose accent, even for us, is still preserved in the terms idol and icon. The term idol, in the use made of it by Saint Polyeuctus, for example, means, "It's nothing at all, it's something you smash on the ground." But all the same, if you say about someone, "That person is my idol," it doesn't simply mean that you turn him into a copy of yourself or himself, but that you make something else of him, around which something happens.

My goal here thus isn't to elaborate on the phenomenology of fetishes, but to show you the function this serves in its place. To do so, I can indicate to you that I tried, as far as I was able, to quickly look over the passages bequeathed to us by Greek literature where the word ágalma is used. If I don't read all of them to you, it's merely in 174 order to go more quickly. You should simply realize that it is from the multiple significations deployed that I am isolating the central function, the one that must be seen at the fringe of these uses. For in the type of teaching I provide here, we naturally don't believe that etymology consists in finding the meaning of a word in its root.

The root of ágalma is not easy to handle. Writers relate it to ἀγαυός (agauós), based on the ambiguous word ἄγαμαι (ágamai), "I admire," but also "I am envious" or "I am jealous of," which becomes ἀγάζω (agázo), "to bear with pain," which goes toward ἀγαίομαι (agaíomai), meaning "to be indignant." Writers looking for roots, I mean roots that bear meaning, which is absolutely opposed to the principle of linguistics, isolate γαλ (gal) or γελ (gel), the gel of γελάω (geláo), the gal which is the same as in γλήνη (gléne), pupil [as of the eye], and in γαλήνην (galénen), which I cited in passing the other day, the sea that shines because it is perfectly still. In short, the idea of sparkle [éclat] is hidden in the root. And Ἀγλαός (aglaós) [related to Ἀγλαία (Aglaía), the youngest of the three Graces or Charites], which means "shining" or "splendor," is there to provide us with a familiar echo. It doesn't run counter to what I have to say about it. I am mentioning it merely as an aside here, because it is simply an occasion to show you the ambiguities inherent in the idea that etymology takes us, not toward a signifier, but toward a central signification. For one could also take an interest, not in gal, but in the first part of the phonemic articulation, namely aga, which is truly the reason why ágalma interests us in its relation to ἀγαθός (agathós).

In such an etymological vein, you know that I don't balk at the import of Agathon's speech, but I prefer to go directly to the great fantasy in the Cratylus. You will see there that the etymology of Agathon is ἀγαστός (agastós), what is admirable. Lord knows why they need to go looking for agaston, what is admirable, in θοόν (thoón), what is quick. But that's the way everything is interpreted in the Cratylus [412c and 422a]. One finds some very nice things in the etymology of ἄνθρωπος (ánthropos), where there is articulated language [399a–c]. Plato truly was a very fine guy.

In truth, it is not in this direction that we must turn to establish the value of ágalma. Ágalma is always related to images, provided that you see that, as in every context, it is always related to a very specific type of image. I must select among the references. There are 175 some in Empedocles, in Heraclitus, and in Democritus. I'm going to take the most common ones, the poetic ones, the ones that everyone knew by heart in Antiquity. I found them in a line-by-line Greek/French edition of the Iliad and the Odyssey. There are, for example, two occurrences in the Odyssey.

The first is in Book III of the Telemachy. The context concerns sacrifices that are being made for the arrival of Telemachus. The suitors, as usual, go out of their way, and sacrifice a βοῦς (bous), which is translated by "heifer" – it is a member of the ox family – to the god. And they expressly call on a certain Laerceus, who is a jeweler, like Hephaestus, and he is given the job of making an ornament, ágalma, for the horns of the beast. I'll skip the practical details concerning the ceremony. What is important is not what happens afterward – whether it is a voodoo-type sacrifice or not – but what they are said to be expecting from ágalma. Ágalma, in effect, is involved here. It is said expressly. Ágalma is the golden ornament itself and it is sacrificed to the hunger of the goddess Athena. The goal here is that, having seen it, κεχάροιτο (kechároito) [verse 438], she be gratified – let's use this latter word since it is part of our vocabulary. In other words, ágalma appears as a kind of god trap. There are things that attract the eyes of those real beings known as the gods.

Another example can be found in Book VIII of the Odyssey. We are told what happened at the capture of Troy, the famous story of the big horse that contained the enemies and all the misfortunes to come in its belly, the horse that bore within itself the destruction of the city. The Trojans, who pulled it inside their city walls, question each other and wonder what to do with it. They hesitate. It seems quite clear that this hesitation was fatal to them, for there were two things they could have done. Assuming the wooden horse was hollow, they could have opened up the stomach to see what was inside. Or, having dragged it to the top of the citadel, they could have let it sit there to be what? Μέγα ἄγαλμα (Méga ágalma) [verse 509]. It's the same idea as earlier: it's a charm. It is also something that is as cumbersome [embarrassant] to the Trojans as to the Greeks. It is an uncanny object. In short, it is this well-known extraordinary object that is still at the center of a whole series of contemporary preoccupations – I needn't mention here the surrealist horizon.

For the ancients, ágalma is also something with which you can, in short, attract divine attention. I could give you a thousand examples of this.

In another spot in Euripides' Hecuba, the story is told of the sacri- 176 fice of Polyxena to appease the ghost of Achilles. It's very pretty, and we have here an exception that gives us the opportunity to awaken the erotic mirages in ourselves. It is the moment at which the heroine herself offers a bosom that is akin, we are told, to ágalma [verse 561]. Nothing says we have to confine ourselves to what that evokes – namely, the perfection of the breasts in Greek statuary. Given that they were not museum pieces at the time, I believe that it has to do rather with what we see indications of everywhere, in the use made of the word ágalma when it is said that, in the course of ceremonies in sanctuaries and temples, one hangs up, ἀνάπτω (anápto), agálmata. The magical value of the objects mentioned here is related, instead, to that of something we know very well, what we call "ex-votos." In short, for people who were much closer than we are to the original differentiation of objects, Polyxena's breasts were as beautiful as those found on votive offerings [ex-votos]. Indeed, the breasts of votive figures are made on a lathe or in a mold and are always perfect.

There are plenty of other examples, but we can stop here. It is enough to indicate that ágalma has to do with the meanings brillant [sheen] and galant [gallant], the latter coming from gal, meaning éclat [sparkle or gleam] in Old French. In a word, what is at stake here if not the function we analysts have discovered that is designated by the term "partial object"?

3

The function of the partial object is one of the great discoveries of psychoanalysis. And what we analysts must be most surprised by in this case is that, having discovered such remarkable things, our efforts are always designed to efface their originality.

Somewhere in Pausanias' work [Guide to Greece], it is said that the agálmata that are related in such and such a sanctuary to witches and were placed there expressly to stop Alcmene from giving birth, were ἀμυδρότερα (amudrótera), a tad effaced. Well, that's it, we too have effaced as much as we could the meaning of the partial object. We had a real find there, that of the fundamentally partial nature of the object insofar as it is the pivotal point, crux, or key of human 177 desire. It was certainly worth dwelling on for a moment. But no, nay, our first effort was to interpret it as pointing toward a dialectic of totalization, to turn it into a flat, round, total object, the only one worthy of us – the spherical object without feet or paws, the other as a whole person, in whom, as everyone knows, our love irresistibly finds its terminus and its completion.

Even though we took things in this way, we didn't tell ourselves that this other, as an object of desire, is perhaps the summation of a pile of partial objects, which is not at all the same as a total object. We didn't tell ourselves that what we elaborate on, what we have to deal with on the basis of the bedrock [fond] we call the id, is perhaps but a vast trophy of all these objects. No, on the horizon of our own ascesis or model of love, we placed something other [de l'autre]. And we weren't completely wrong to do so. But we have made that other into another to whom the bizarre function we call oblativity is addressed. We love the other for himself. At least, we do so once we arrive at our goal, at perfection. The genital stage sanctions all of this.

We analysts have clearly gained something by developing a certain topology of the relationship to the other, and we are not the only ones to have done so since there is a great deal of contemporary and variously personalist speculation about it as well. But it is still quite funny that there is something that we have left altogether by the wayside here. And we are certainly obliged to leave it by the wayside when we consider things from the particularly simplified perspective that assumes the problem to be resolved with the idea of a pre-established harmony – namely, that in short it suffices to love genitally in order to love the other for himself.

I didn't bring with me today an incredible passage regarding genital characterology found in a volume entitled La Psychanalyse d'aujourd'hui [Contemporary Psychoanalysis] because I have mentioned it elsewhere, in an article that will come out soon ["The Direction of the Treatment"]. I have been pointing out to you for a long time now the ridiculous nature of the kind of preaching we hear around this ultimate idealness. We need not dwell on it today, but, when we look at the textual sources, there is at least one question to raise on this point. If so-called oblative love is merely the homologue, development, or blossoming of the genital act itself – which 178 would suffice, I would say, to reveal its secret, key, or measure – an ambiguity nevertheless persists about whether we seek, regarding this other (to whom we devote our oblativity in this love which is all love, all for the other), to bring him jouissance, as seems to be self-evident in the fact that it has to do with genital union, or rather to perfect him.

As soon as a writer, who is even the slightest bit concerned with writing in a style that is accessible to a contemporary audience, wants to discuss ideas as highly moral and topics as old as that of oblativity, the first thing he does to rouse us is bring out a latent binary opposition. For, in the final analysis, terms like "oblativity" cannot be sustained in such a simplified or even abraded form except owing to what underlies them – namely, the altogether modern opposition between the subject and the object. And thus, it is around this opposition that such a writer is led to comment on this analytic theme: we take the other as a subject and not purely and simply as our object.

The object at stake here is situated as being valued for the pleasure, enjoyment [fruition], or jouissance it brings. It is taken to boil down what is unique in the other to an all-purpose function, insofar as he must be a subject to us. If we merely turn him into an object, he will be just any old object, an object like all the rest, an object that can be rejected or exchanged – in short, he will be profoundly devalued. This is the theme that underlies the idea of oblativity, as it is articulated when people make of it the necessary ethical correlate of access to true love, which would be adequately termed "genital."

Note that today I am less in the process of criticizing this analytic idiocy – which is why I don't feel the need to remind you of the texts that talk about it – than calling into question what it is based on, namely, the idea that the beloved or love partner would be in some way superior if he were, as we say in our existential-analytic vocabulary, considered as a subject.

I don't think that, after having given such a pejorative connotation to the fact of considering the other as an object, anyone has ever mentioned that to consider him as a subject is no better. Let us admit that one object is just as good as another [en vaut un autre], on the condition that we give the word "object" its original meaning, which aims at objects insofar as we distinguish them and can communicate about them. If it is deplorable that the beloved might ever 179 become an object, is it better for him to be a subject? To answer this question it suffices to note that if one object is no better than another [en vaut un autre], it's even worse in the case of the subject. For it is not simply another subject that he is equal to in worth [qu'il vaut] – a subject, strictly speaking, is an other [en est un autre].

Strictly speaking, the subject is someone to whom we can attribute what? Nothing other than the fact of being, like us, a being that is ἔναρθρον ἔχειν ἔπος (énarthron échein épos), that expresses itself in articulated language, that possesses the combinatory, and that can respond to our combinatory with its own combinations – someone we can thus bring into our calculation as someone who calculates like us.

I imagine that those of you who are trained in the method that I have inaugurated here are not going to contradict me on this point. It is the only sound definition of the subject, at least the only sound one for us, the only one that allows us to explain how a subject obligatorily enters into the Spaltung [splitting] determined by his submission to language.

On the basis of these terms, we can see how it is strictly necessary that there be in the subject a part where it [ça] speaks all by itself – in which respect the subject remains in abeyance. And we need to know – how can one ever forget this question? – what function is served by the fact that (in this elective, privileged relationship which is the love relationship) the subject with whom, among all others, we have a bond of love, is also the object of our desire. If one brings out the love relationship while holding in abeyance its anchor, pivotal point, center of gravity, or hook, it is impossible to say anything that is not simply a crock.

We must emphasize the correlative object of desire, for it is this – and not the object that is involved in equivalence, the transitivism of good things, or the transaction of covetous desires – that is the psychoanalytic object. The psychoanalytic object is the something that is the aim of desire as such, the something that emphasizes one object among all the others as incommensurate with the others. The introduction in analysis of the function of the partial object corresponds to this emphasis on the object.

I ask you to note, on this topic, that everything that makes metaphysical discourse seem weighty and noteworthy is always based on some ambiguity. In other words, if all the terms you use when you do metaphysics were strictly defined – each having an unequivocal 180 signification – if the vocabulary of philosophy triumphed, which is the eternal goal of professors, there wouldn't be any point in doing metaphysics any more because there wouldn't be anything left to say. You would notice then that mathematics is much better – there you can use signs with an unequivocal meaning because they don't have any meaning. This implies that when you speak in a more or less impassioned way about the relations between the subject and the object, it is because you are talking about the subject [metaphysically] as if it were something other than the strict subject I was talking about earlier. And you talk about the object, too, as something other than what I just defined – in other words, you talk about it as something that virtually verges on the strict equivalence of an unequivocal communication by a scientific subject. But if this object "impassions" you, it is because hidden inside it is ágalma, the object of desire. This is what makes it weighty; this is why it is important to know where this fabulous object is, what its function is, and where it operates in inter- and intrasubjectivity. This privileged object of desire culminates for each of us at the border or liminal point I have taught you to view as the metonymy of unconscious discourse. This object plays a role there that I tried to formalize in fantasy and to which I will return next time.

This object, however you talk about it in psychoanalytic work – whether you call it the breast, the phallus, or shit – is always a partial object. This is what is at stake inasmuch as analysis is a method or technique that has made headway in the field of desire, a field that was left behind, decried, and excluded by philosophy because it wasn't manageable, because it wasn't accessible to philosophy's dialectic.

If we are unable to point out, in a strict topology, the function of what this partial object signifies – which is both so limited and so slippery in its figure – if you don't see the interest of what I am introducing today with the term ágalma, which is the main point of analytic practice, well, it would be too bad. I wouldn't believe it for a minute, especially when I note that, regardless of the misunderstanding on which it is based, things are such that all the most modern work in psychoanalysis' dialectic revolves around the fundamental function of the object.

The only proof I need provide of this is that reference to the object as good or bad is considered to be a primordial given in the Kleinian 181 dialectic. I ask you to dwell on that for a moment.

In our theoretical work we use a pile of things, and especially a pile of identificatory functions – for example, identification with the person from whom we demand something when we call for love. If our call is rejected, what results is identification with the very person we addressed as the object of our love, with a striking shift from love to identification. This is the third type of identification about which you have to read a bit of Freud, his Group Psychology and the Analysis of the Ego, to see the tertiary function taken on by a certain characteristic object: the object insofar as it is the object desired by the other with whom we identify. In short, subjectivity is constructed in the plurality or pluralism of levels of identification that we call the ego-ideal, the ideal ego, and – something that has also been identified – the desiring ego.

But we still must figure out where the partial object is situated and functions in this articulation. Note simply that when we look for this object, ágalma, little a, the object of desire, in analytic theory as it is currently being developed by Kleinians, it is there right from the outset, before any dialectical development – it is already there as an object of desire. The weight or internal central core of the good or bad object figures in all psychology that relies for its elaboration on Freudian terms. It is this good object or bad object that Melanie Klein situates at the origin, at the beginning of beginnings, even prior to the depressive period. Isn't this sufficiently indicative all by itself?

I think I have done enough today in telling you that it is around this that, inside or outside of analysis, the division between two perspectives regarding love can and must be concretely drawn.

The one drowns, sends off course, masks, elides, and sublimates everything concrete in the experience of love, in an infamous ascension toward a supreme good [bien]. It is astonishing that in analysis we can still keep some vague threepenny glints of this with the term "oblativity," this sort of loving-in-God, so to speak, that is supposed to be at the basis of every love relationship. In the other perspective, and analytic work demonstrates this, everything revolves around 182 the privileged or unique point constituted somewhere by something we find in a being only when we truly love. But what is it? Ágalma – the object we have learned to discern in analytic practice.

I will try next time to situate this object in the threefold topology of the subject, the other with a lowercase o, and the Other with a capital O, and to reconstruct the point at which it comes into play.

And we shall see that it is only via the other and for the other that Alcibiades, like each and every one of us, wants to make his love known to Socrates.[12]

February 1, 1961

XI

BETWEEN SOCRATES AND ALCIBIADES

Why Socrates does not love.
"I am nothing."
Socrates' interpretation.
The revelation that is ours.

There are thus some agálmata in Socrates, and this is what aroused Alcibiades' love.

We are now going to return to the scene that stages Alcibiades addressing a speech to Socrates, to which Socrates responds by providing, strictly speaking, an interpretation of it. We will see in what respect his assessment can be corrected, but one could say that, structurally speaking, Socrates' intervention has, on the face of it, all the features of an interpretation.

Socrates' response is more or less as follows: "Everything you just said that was so extraordinary, so unbelievably impudent, everything you just revealed in speaking of me was in fact said for Agathon's sake" [222c–d].

To understand the meaning of the scene that unfolds between these two points – from Alcibiades' eulogy of Socrates to Socrates' interpretation and what follows thereafter – we must go back to an earlier moment in the text and examine it in detail. What is the meaning of what happens between Alcibiades and Socrates after Alcibiades' entrance?

1

As I told you, after Alcibiades' entrance, there are no more eulogies of Love, but solely of the person seated to one's right. What is important in the change is the following: the point is to make a eulogy, épainos, of another person and, in this dialogue, the action

184 [passage] of metaphor lies precisely herein. The eulogy of another person is substituted, not for the eulogy of Love, but for love itself, and this happens right from the word "go."

"Love for Alcibiades is no trifling matter to me," Socrates says, addressing Agathon, everyone knowing full well that Alcibiades was the love of Socrates' life. "Since I became enamored of him" – we will see the meaning that it is fitting to bestow upon these terms, Socrates here was the erastés – "he hasn't allowed me to say two words to anyone else – what am I saying, I can't so much as look at an attractive man but he flies into a fit of jealous rage. He yells; he threatens; he can hardly keep from slapping me around! Please, try to keep him under control," he says to Agathon. "The fierceness of his passion terrifies me!" [213c–d].

A short exchange then takes place between Alcibiades and Eryximachus and gives rise to a new agenda. Namely, it is agreed that each person will make a eulogy, each in his turn, of the person who is seated to his right. Épainos, the eulogy in question, has, as I told you, a symbolic function – more specifically, a metaphorical function. What it expresses has, indeed – from he who speaks to the person about whom he speaks – a certain function qua metaphor of love. To praise, epainein, has a ritual function here, which can be translated in the following terms: to speak highly of someone.

While we cannot exactly refer to Aristotle's Rhetoric, as it was written later than the Symposium, in Book 1, Chapter 9, of the Rhetoric, Aristotle distinguishes between épainos and enkómion. Up until now I have told you that I did not want to go into the difference between the two. We have nevertheless been led to it by the very nature of our endeavor.

What is specific about épainos can be seen very precisely in the way Agathon starts his speech. He begins with the nature of the object and only elaborates on its qualities afterward. This leads to a deployment of the object in its essence. Enkómion is difficult to translate into French, and the implied term κῶμος (kómos) is no doubt involved in some way. If we are to find some equivalent for it in French, it would have to be something like "panegyric." If we follow Aristotle, it's a question of braiding a wreath from the object's loftiest deeds – a point of view that goes beyond épainos' aim to get at one's essence, which is eccentric to it.

185 But épainos is not something that presents itself unambiguously at first. When it is decided that it is épainos that will be on the agenda, Alcibiades retorts that the remark Socrates made concerning Alcibiades' ferocious jealousy didn't have a word of truth in it. "The truth is just the opposite! He's the one who, if I dare praise anyone else in his presence, even a god, will most surely" – and here he uses the same metaphor we saw earlier – τὼ χεῖρε (to cheíre), "beat me up" [214d].

We find in Socrates' reply here a tone, style, malaise, and confusion, an uncomfortable, almost panicked response of the "shut up" kind. "Hold your tongue!" it has been translated quite accurately [214d]. "By Poseidon," Alcibiades responds – which is no small matter – "don't you dare deny it! I would never – never – praise anyone else with you around."

"Well, why not do just that, if you want?" says Eryximachus. "Why don't you offer an encomium to Socrates?"

"Should I unleash myself upon him? Should I give him," Alcibiades asks, "his punishment in front of all of you? In making a eulogy of him, must I unmask him?" This is how his speech later unfolds. Indeed, it is not lacking in worry either, as if it were both a necessity of the situation and also an implied facet of the genre that a eulogy might go so far as to make people laugh at the person in question.

Alcibiades thus proposes a gentlemen's agreement*: "Must I speak the truth?" he asks.

Socrates does not refuse this, replying, "By all means, go ahead" [214e].

"Nothing can stop me now," says Alcibiades. "But here's what you can do: if I say anything that's not true, you can just interrupt, if you want, and correct me; at worst, there'll be mistakes in my speech, not lies. But you can't hold it against me if I don't get everything καταριθμῆσαι (katarithmésai), in the right order [. . .]. It is no easy task for one in my condition to give a smooth and orderly account of your bizarreness (atopían)!" [214e–215a] – here once again we come across the term atopia. Then the eulogy begins.

I indicated the eulogy's structure and theme to you last time. Alcibiades' speech is assuredly laughable – γέλως, γελοῖος (gélos, geloíos) – beginning as it does by presenting things through a comparison that I already highlighted. This comparison shows up three times in his speech, each time with an almost repetitive insistence. Socrates is compared in it to the satyr's crude and derisory outer crust or envelope. One must in some sense open it up to see inside what Alcibiades calls, the first time, agálmata theón, translated as 186
"the statues of the gods" [215b]. The next time he once again calls them godlike and amazing [216e]. The third time, he uses the term ἀγάλματ' ἀρετῆς (agálmat' aretés): the marvel of virtue, the marvel of marvels [222a].

During his speech we find a comparison with the satyr Marsyas which, when it is presented, is taken quite far. Despite Socrates' protests, and he is certainly not a flautist [flûtiste], Alcibiades returns to the point and takes it still further. He doesn't simply compare Socrates to a box in the form of a satyr, to a more or less derisory object, but to the satyr Marsyas himself – and everyone knows from the legend that when Marsyas began to play, his song was irresistibly charming. The charm was so great that it aroused Apollo's jealousy, who had him skinned alive for having dared rival the supreme, divine music. The only difference, Alcibiades says, between Socrates and Marsyas is that Socrates is not a piper. He does not operate via music and yet the result is of the exact same order [215a–c].

Here we should refer to what Plato explains in the Phaedrus concerning the higher states, so to speak, of inspiration, as they are produced beyond the realm of beauty. There are different forms of going beyond that I will not take up here. Among the means used by those who are δεομένους (deoménous), who need the gods and initiations, there is the drunkenness brought on by a certain music that produces a state known as possession. Alcibiades refers specifically to this state when he says that it is what Socrates produces with his words. Although his words are unaccompanied, without musical accompaniment, he produces the exact same effect [215c].

When we listen to an orator, he says, even a first-rate orator, it has little effect on us. On the contrary, when it is you that we listen to, or even your words as related by another person, even if he is πάνυ φαῦλος (pánu phaúlos), a man of no consequence whatsoever, the listener, whether man, woman, or adolescent, is troubled, as if struck by a blow, and strictly speaking κατεχόμεθα (katechómetha) – we become possessed by them [215d].

This situates the experience that makes Alcibiades think that inside Socrates lies a treasure, an indefinable, precious object which will fix his resolve after having unleashed his desire. This object is 187 at the crux of what he says thereafter concerning his resolution and then his schemes designed to seduce Socrates. Let us dwell for a moment on this point.

Alcibiades had an experience with Socrates that was far from ordinary. Having made his decision, he knew he was treading on somewhat sure ground, for he knew that Socrates had long since been paying attention to what he calls his ὥρα (hóra) – we translate it as best we can – let's call it "sex appeal."* It seemed to Alcibiades that if Socrates would only deign to declare how he felt, Alcibiades would obtain from him precisely what was at stake – namely, what he himself defines as everything Socrates knows, πάντ' ἀκοῦσαι ὅσαπερ οὗτος ᾔδει (pánt' akoúsai hósaper hoútos édei) [217a]. He then provides us with the narrative of his seductive maneuvers. But can't we pause here a moment?

As Alcibiades already knows that he has captivated Socrates' desire, why can't he more truly presume that Socrates will comply with his wishes? Alcibiades already knows that he is Socrates' beloved, erómenos, so why does he need to have Socrates give him a sign of his desire? Socrates has never made a mystery of his desire in the past. His desire is recognized [reconnu] and, by dint of that very fact, known [connu], and thus one might think it is already avowed. What then is the meaning of these seductive maneuvers? Alcibiades spins his narrative with artfulness and detail, but at the same time with impudence and a challenge to his audience, which is so clearly felt to go beyond all limits that he introduces it with nothing less than the words that are spoken before the mysteries are revealed: "Cover your ears, you who are here" [218b]. This warning is addressed only to those who have no right to hear, and still less to repeat what is going to be said or how it is going to be said – that is, house slaves, who would be better off not hearing.

Socrates' behavior corresponds, after all, to the mysterious demand that Alcibiades makes. If, indeed, Socrates has always shown himself to be Alcibiades' erastés, it may seem in another register, in a post-Socratic perspective, that Socrates is demonstrating a great quality, which the French translator of the Symposium indicates in the margin with the term "temperance." But in this context, his temperance is not indicated as necessary. Perhaps Socrates proves that he is virtuous, but what relation could there possibly be between that and the subject in question if it is true that what we are being shown here concerns the mystery of love?

In other words, you see that I am trying to examine every facet of the situation that unfolds before us in the Symposium, in order to grasp the structure of this game. Let's immediately say that everything in Socrates' behavior indicates that his refusal to enter into the 188 game of love is closely related to the fact, posited at the outset as the point of departure, that he knows.

He knows the score in matters of love – that is even, as he says, the only thing he knows. I will propose that it is because Socrates knows that he does not love.

2

With this key in hand, let us give their full meaning to the words with which Socrates greets Alcibiades' invitation, after three or four scenes in which Alcibiades' attacks are shown to proceed with accelerating rhythm [217–219].

The ambiguities of the situation always verge on the γελοῖος (geloíos), the laughable or comic. Indeed, they are buffoonish scenes, these invitations to dinner, which end with a guy who leaves very early, very politely, after having made others wait for him, who returns a second time, and who escapes once again, and with whom the following dialogue takes place under the covers: "Socrates, are you asleep?"

"No, no, not at all," he replies [218c].

It must be said that, in order to arrive at its endpoint, what is at work leads us along paths that are well designed to situate us at a certain level.

Once Alcibiades has truly said his piece, and has gone so far as to tell Socrates, "This is what I desire, and I would certainly be ashamed before people who might not understand; I am explaining to you what I want" [218c–d], Socrates replies, "If you are right in what you say about me, you are already more accomplished than you think. If I really have in me the power to make you a better man, then you can see in me a beauty that is really beyond description and makes your own remarkable good looks pale in comparison. But, then, is this a fair exchange that you propose? You seem to me to want more than your proper share: you offer me the merest appearance of beauty" – what, in the Socratic perspective on science, is illusion, fallacy, and dóxa, which does not know its function – "and in return you want" truth. And in fact, for goodness' sake, that means nothing more than "gold in exchange for bronze" [218d–e].

189 But, says Socrates – and we must take things as they are said here – "you should think twice, ἄμεινον σκόπει (ámeinon skópei), because you could be wrong, and οὐδὲν ὤν (oudén on), I may be of no use to you [219a]. The mind's sight," he continues, "becomes sharp only when the body's eyes go past their prime – and you are still a good long time away from that." But pay attention – where you see something, I am nothing.

What is Socrates refusing here? What is he refusing even though he has already shown himself to be what he has, I would say, almost officially shown himself to be in all of Alcibiades' remarks, to the extent that everyone knows that Alcibiades was his first love? What Socrates refuses to show Alcibiades is something that takes on another meaning. If it is definable in the terms I have given you, it would be the metaphor of love.

It would be the metaphor of love, insofar as Socrates would admit to being the beloved, and I would say even more, would admit to being the beloved unconsciously. Yet it is precisely because Socrates knows that he refuses to be, in whatever sense, whether justified or justifiable, erómenos, desirable – what is worthy of being loved.

Why doesn't he love? Why is it that the metaphor of love cannot be produced, that there is no substitution of erastés for erómenos, that Socrates doesn't manifest himself as erastés at the place where erómenos was? Socrates can but refuse to do so because, to him, there is nothing in him that is lovable. His essence is οὐδὲν (oudén), emptiness or hollowness, and to use a term that was used later in neo-Platonic and Augustinian thought, κένωσις (kénosis) – this represents Socrates' central position.

This is so true that the term kénosis, emptiness or void – as opposed to the fullness of whom? of Agathon specifically – is present right at the beginning of the dialogue, when Socrates, after his long meditation in the foyer of the neighboring house, finally shows up at the banquet, sits down next to Agathon, and begins to speak. We think he is joking, that this is said in jest, but in a dialogue that is both as rigorous and austere in its unfolding as this one, can we believe that anything here is simply used as filler? Socrates says, "Agathon, you are the one who is full, and just as one makes a liquid move from a full vase to an empty one using a wick along which it flows, similarly I'm going to fill myself up" [175d–e]. This is, no doubt, said ironically, but it expresses something that is precisely what Socrates 190 presents as constitutive of his position, and what I have repeated to you many times. Here we hear the words from Alcibiades' very own lips – namely, that Socrates doesn't know anything except concerning matters of love. Cicero translates amathía as inscientia by forcing things a bit in Latin. Inscitia is brute ignorance, while inscientia is non-knowledge constituted as such, as empty [vide], as the attraction exercised by the void or vacuum [vide] at the center of knowledge.

I think that you get what I mean here, since I exposed to you the structure of substitution or actualized metaphor that constitutes what I call the miracle of the appearance of erastés at the very place where erómenos was. It is precisely because this is lacking here that Socrates can only refuse to give, so to speak, a simulacrum thereof. If he presents himself to Alcibiades as not being able to show him signs of his desire, it is insofar as he challenges the idea that he himself is, in any way, an object worthy of Alcibiades' desire, or of anyone else's for that matter.

Note thereby that the Socratic message, if it contains something that refers to love, certainly does not fundamentally begin from a center of love. Socrates is represented to us as an erastés, someone who desires, but nothing is further from his image than the radiant love which, for example, stems from Christ's message. Neither effusion, nor gift, nor mysticism, nor ecstasy, nor simple commandment flows from it. Nothing is further from Socrates' message than "Love thy neighbor as thyself," a formulation whose dimension is remarkably absent from everything he says.

This has always struck commentators, who, in their objections to the ascesis of Eros, say that what is commanded in this message is, "Love before all else in your soul what is most essential to you." This is only apparently the case, and the Socratic message, such as it is transmitted to us by Plato, does not make a mistake here, since, as you will see, the structure is preserved. It also allows us to more accurately glimpse the mystery hidden behind the Christian commandment precisely because it is preserved.

This is also why it is possible to provide a general theory of love, behind every manifestation that is a manifestation of love. This 191 may, at first glance, seem surprising to you, but keep in mind that once you have the key – I mean what I am calling the metaphor of love – you will see it everywhere.

I illustrated it for you with Victor Hugo's poem, but there is also the original book of the story of Ruth and Booz. If this story stands before us in a way that inspires us – except for those scoffers who see in it only a sordid story of an old letch and a washerwoman – it is because we take this inscience for granted: "Booz did not know that a woman was there." We also take for granted that Ruth is already the object Booz unconsciously loves. We categorically assume as well that "Ruth did not know what God wanted from her" and that the third party – the divine locus of the Other, insofar as the fate of Ruth's desire is inscribed in it – is what gives her nocturnal vigilance at Booz's feet its sacred character.

The whole mystery of the signification of love that the revelation of their desire takes on lies in the underpinning of inscience, in which the dignity of erómenos for each of the partners is already situated in a veiled anteriority.

3

Let us return to the Symposium to see what transpires.

Alcibiades does not understand. After having heard Socrates out, he says to him, "I really have nothing more to say. I've told you exactly what I think. Now it's your turn to consider what you think best for you and me" [219a]. He calls on him to, as we say, face up to his responsibilities.

To which Socrates replies, "We'll talk about all that. See you tomorrow. We still have a lot to say about it." In short, he situates things at the level of the continuation of a dialogue, leading Alcibiades down his own pathways. He thus makes himself absent to such an extent that Alcibiades' covetousness shows through.

Can we say that this covetousness is covetousness of what is best?

What counts is that it is expressed in terms of objects. Alcibiades does not say, "It's for my own good, or for my own misfortune, that I want what is incomparable, which lies in you – namely, ágalma." He says something more like, "I want it because I want it, whether it's for my own good or not." And it is precisely for this reason that Alcibiades reveals the central function of ágalma in the articulation 192 of love relations. It is also for this reason that Socrates refuses to respond at the same level.

Socrates' commandment is "concern yourself with your own soul, seek your own perfection." Through his attitude of refusal, severity, and austerity, through his noli me tangere, Socrates directs Alcibiades along the pathway of his own good. But is it even clear that we mustn't allow some ambiguity to subsist regarding this phrase, "his own good"? Isn't it the equating of the object of desire and "one's own good" that has been called into question since this dialogue by Plato resounded in the world? Shouldn't we translate it by the good such as Socrates, he who brings into the world a new discourse, traces out its path for those who follow him?

Observe that, in Alcibiades' attitude, there is something, I was going to say sublime, in any case absolute and impassioned, that verges on an entirely different character with another message – that of the Gospel, where we are told that he who knows that there is a treasure buried in a field, and we are not told what the treasure is, is capable of selling everything he has in order to buy that field and enjoy the treasure. This is the distance that separates Socrates' position from Alcibiades'. Alcibiades is a man imbued with desire [l'homme du désir].

But you will then retort, "Why does he want to be loved?" In truth, he already is and he knows it. The miracle of love has taken place in him insofar as he has become the one who desires. And when Alcibiades shows that he is in love, it is, as they say, no small potatoes. Because he is Alcibiades, he whose desires know no bounds, when he enters into the referential field that is for him the field of love, he shows a highly remarkable absence of fear of castration – in other words, a total lack of the famous Ablehnung der Weiblichkeit [repudiation of femininity]. Everyone knows that in Antiquity the most extreme kinds of virility were always accompanied by an utter and complete disdain for the possible risk of being called a woman, even by one's soldiers – which, as you know, happened to Caesar.

Alcibiades here throws a hissy fit in front of Socrates. He nevertheless remains Alcibiades at his own level. And this is why we must still, before moving on from Alcibiades' speech, grant full importance to the complement he provides his eulogy with – namely, the astonishing portrait designed to complete the impassive figure of 193 Socrates. Impassivity means that Socrates cannot bear being placed in the passive [position], as the beloved, erómenos. Socrates' attitude – what Alcibiades describes to us as his courage – is constituted by a profound indifference to everything that happens around him, even the most dramatic of events [219d–221b].

Once we arrive at the end of this speech, in which the demonstration that Socrates is a being like no other culminates, Socrates responds to Alcibiades as follows: "You give me the sense of having all your wits about you" [222c]. Whereas Alcibiades had expressed himself with the caveat, "I don't know what I'm saying." If Socrates, who knows, says that Alcibiades gives him the impression of Νήφειν μοι δοκεῖς (néphein moi dokeís), having all his wits about him, it means, "Although you are drunk, I can read something in you." What is it? Socrates is the one who knows it, not Alcibiades.

Socrates points out what is at stake when Alcibiades mentions Agathon.

Indeed, at the end of his speech, Alcibiades turns toward Agathon to tell him, "I warn you, don't let Socrates fool you! Remember my torments; be on your guard" [222b]. He says it to Agathon incidentally. And in truth, Socrates' intervention, insofar as I called it an interpretation, would have no meaning did it not bear on this "incidentally." "How casually you let it drop," he says, "almost like an afterthought, at the very end of your speech!" [222c]. What Socrates tells us is that Agathon was in fact present as an aim in all of Alcibiades' circumlocutions, and that it was around him that his whole speech revolved. "As if your speech" – this is how it should be translated, and not "your language" – "had but the following goal: to enunciate that I should be in love with you and no one else, and that for his part, Agathon should let himself be loved by you and by no one else" [222c–d].

"This," he says, "is κατάδηλον (katádelon), entirely transparent, in Alcibiades' speech." Socrates says quite plainly that he can read this in Alcibiades' apparent speech. And, more precisely, it is in "this drama of your invention," as Socrates calls it, this σατυρικόν σου δρᾶμα (satyrikón sou dráma), "that the silenus metaphor is perfectly transparent and we see things" [222d].

Let us try, in effect, to recognize its structure. Socrates says to Alcibiades, "What you want, in the final analysis, is to be loved by me and to have Agathon be your object." No other meaning can be given to this speech, if not the most superficial psychological meanings, such as the vague awakening of jealousy in the other person, and there is no question of that here. This indeed is what is at stake, and Socrates admits it, showing his desire to Agathon and asking him in sum what Alcibiades had at first asked of him. The proof 194 thereof is that if we consider all the parts of the Symposium as a long epithalamium [nuptial poem], and if what this whole dialectic leads to has any meaning, what happens at the end is that Socrates provides a eulogy of Agathon.

The fact that Socrates eulogizes Agathon is tantamount to responding to Alcibiades' demand. Not his past demand – his present one. When Socrates eulogizes Agathon, he pays Alcibiades back [il donne satisfaction à Alcibiade]. He pays him back for his just finished public declaration, his putting at the level of the universal Other what took place between them behind the veils of modesty. Socrates' response is as follows, "You can love he who I am going to praise because, by praising him, I will be able to transmit the image of you loving [aimant], qua image of you loving – that is how you will enter into the path of superior identifications traced out by the path of beauty."

But we must not misrecognize here that Socrates, precisely because he knows, replaces one thing with something else. It is neither beauty, nor ascesis, nor identification with God that Alcibiades desires, but rather this unique object, this special something he saw in Socrates and which Socrates turns him away from, because Socrates knows that he does not have it.

But Alcibiades still desires the same thing. What he is looking for in Agathon, make no mistake about it, is the same supreme point at which the subject is abolished in fantasy: his agálmata.

Socrates substitutes here his lure [leurre] for what I will call the lure of the gods. He does so quite authentically, insofar as he knows what love is. And it is precisely because he knows this that he is doomed to be mistaken – namely, to misrecognize the essential function of the targeted object constituted by ágalma.

Last night we heard about theoretical models [at a meeting of our Society]. It is impossible not to mention, in this regard, if only as a prop for our thought, the intrasubjective dialectic of the ego-ideal, ideal ego, and partial object, and not to recall the little schema of the spherical mirror I drew for you in the past.

In front of this mirror, the fantasy is created or arises of the real image of the vase hidden within the device. If this illusory image can be propped up and perceived as real, it is insofar as the eye adjusts to what the vase appears around – namely, the flower we have placed on top. I taught you to use these three notations – ego-ideal, ideal 195 ego, and a, the ágalma of the partial object – to grasp the reciprocal relations of the three terms in question every time something is constituted. What is this something? Precisely what is at stake at the end of the Socratic dialectic.

It concerns what Freud tells us is essential in falling in love – I introduced this schema in order to give it consistency – namely, the recognition of the basis of the narcissistic image, insofar as this image constitutes the substance of the ideal ego.

The imaginary incarnation of the subject is what is at issue in this threefold reference. Be so kind as to allow me to finally tell you what I've been meaning to say: Socrates' daemon is Alcibiades.

It is Alcibiades, in the sense in which we are told in Diotima's speech that love is not a god, but rather a daemon – namely, a daemon who sends mortals the message that the gods wish to convey to him.

Which is why we couldn't fail, regarding this dialogue, to bring up the nature of the gods.

4

I am going to be away for two weeks and will leave you with a reading assignment: De Natura Deorum [On the Nature of the Gods] by Cicero.

It's a book that did me a good deal of harm a long time ago: a well-known pedant, seeing me with my nose in it, thought it did not bode well regarding the direction of my professional interests.

Read it in order to get up to speed. You will notice that Cicero is not the lout people try to depict him as by saying that the Romans were people who were simply dragging their feet. He's a guy who articulates things that go right to the quick.

You will also see all sorts of exceedingly funny things in it, as, for example, that in Cicero's time, people went to Athens to look for traces of the great pin-ups of Socrates' day. People went there saying to themselves, "I'm going to meet guys like Charmides on every block." You will see that, compared with the stir created by these Charmides, our Brigitte Bardot wouldn't stand a chance. Even the little street urchins had eyes this big [expansive hand gesture].

196 We find some pretty funny stuff in Cicero's work. There is, in particular, a passage I cannot recite for you, but which is of the following type: when it comes to the pretty boys that philosophers have taught us it is good to love, you can look for them, there's certainly one here and there, but that's all. What does this mean? Did the loss of political independence have, as an irremediable effect, some sort of racial decadence, or simply the disappearance of the mysterious sparkle [éclat], the ἵμερος ἐναργής (hímeros enargés), the shine [brillant] of desire Plato speaks about in the Phaedrus? We will never know anything about it.

You will learn plenty of other things [from De Natura Deorum] as well. You will learn that it is a serious question to know where the gods are situated. The question has not lost its importance for us. If any of what I tell you here can serve you in some way, some day when there is a palpable slippage in your certainties, when you find yourself in a tough position – well, one of those things will be that I have reminded you of the real existence of the gods.

Why not then dwell on the scandalous objects that the gods of ancient mythology were? Without trying to reduce them to piles of files or to sets of themes, let us ask ourselves what it might have meant for the gods to act as you know they did, their most characteristic activities being theft, fraud, and adultery. I won't even mention impiety – that was their specialty.

In other words, the scandalous nature of ancient mythology frankly raises the question of what a god's love is. It reaches its height right at the outset in Homer's work. There is no way to behave more arbitrarily, unjustifiably, incoherently, or derisively than these gods do. Read the Iliad – they're always mixed up in men's affairs, intervening constantly. Yet we cannot think these stories were merely tall tales. I don't adopt this perspective, and no one can, not even the thickest Homais. No. They're there and that's all there is to it. What can it possibly mean that the gods only show themselves to men in this manner?

You have to see what happens when they take it into their heads to love a mortal woman, for example. Nothing will stop them until the mortal, out of desperation, turns into a laurel or a frog. Nothing 197 is further from the trembling one feels in one's being when in love than a god's desire, or a goddess' desire for that matter – I don't see why I shouldn't include them as well.

It took someone of Giraudoux's stature to represent the dimensions and resonance of the prodigious myth of Amphitryon. Even this great poet couldn't help but let Jupiter shine with something that might resemble a sort of respect for Alcmene's feelings, but that was clearly in order to make it plausible to us. For those who know how to hear, this myth remains the height of blasphemy, one might say, and nevertheless this was not at all how it was understood in Antiquity.

For here things go further than anything. Divine debauchery disguises itself as human virtue. When I say that nothing stops the Greek gods, I mean that they go so far as to make a mockery of even what is best. This is the whole key to the matter: the best ones, the real gods, take impassivity to the very point that I mentioned earlier – namely, to the point of being unable to put up with being called passive.

To be loved is to necessarily enter into the scale of the desirable; as we know, Christian theologians were at great pains to rid themselves of it. For if God is desirable, then He can be more or less desirable. There is thus a whole scale of desire. And what do we desire in God if not what is desirable? But, then, can there be greater degrees of God? The upshot being that it was precisely at the moment at which people tried to give God His most absolute value that people found themselves caught up in a vortex out of which they could only climb with great difficulty to preserve the dignity of the supreme object.

The gods of Antiquity didn't beat around the bush. They knew they could reveal themselves to men only in the guise of something that would cause a ruckus, in the ágalma of something that breaks all the rules, as a pure manifestation of an essence that remained completely hidden, whose enigma was entirely below the surface. Hence the daemonic incarnation of their scandalous exploits. It is in this sense that I say that Alcibiades was Socrates' daemon.

Alcibiades provides the true representation, unbeknown to himself, of what is implied by the Socratic ascesis. He shows that the dialectic of love as it was later elaborated in Christianity is there – believe me, it's not absent. For it was around this dialectic that a crisis developed in the sixteenth century, one that called 198 into question the long synthesis – and, I would add, the long equivocation – concerning the nature of love that was sustained and developed throughout the Middle Ages in an oh so very post-Socratic perspective.

I mean, for example, that the god of John the Scot is no different from Aristotle's god, insofar as he acts as erómenon. They cohere – it is through his beauty that god makes the world go round. What a gap there is between this perspective and the one that is opposed to it! But what I am trying to express is that it is not really opposed.

People opposed to it the perspective of agápe, insofar as it explicitly teaches us that God loves us insofar as we are sinners, loves us as much for our evil doings as for our good deeds. This is, in effect, the meaning of the shift that took place in the history of the amorous sentiments, and curiously enough, at the precise moment at which Plato's message reappeared in its authentic texts [in the West]. Divine agápe, insofar as it is addressed to the sinner as such, is the core and crux of Luther's position. But don't believe that this is something that was limited to heresy, to a local insurrection within Catholicism. It suffices to take a look, even a superficial one, at what followed, the Counter-Reformation – namely, the eruption of what was called Baroque art – to realize that it signifies nothing other than the exposing, or erection as such, of the power of the image in all its seductive glory.

After the long misunderstanding that had sustained the Trinitarian relation in divinity, from the knowing to the known, and ascending to the known in the knowing via knowledge, we can see in it the outlines of our own form of revelation – namely, that things go from the unconscious toward the subject who is constituted in his dependence, and ascend toward the core object that I call ágalma here.

Such is the structure that regulates the dance between Alcibiades and Socrates.

Alcibiades demonstrates the presence of love, but only insofar as Socrates, who knows, can be mistaken about its presence, and only accompanies him in being mistaken. The deception [leurre] is mutual. Socrates is just as caught up in the deception – if it is a deception and if it is true that he is deceived [leurré] – as Alcibiades is.

But which of them is the most authentically deceived, if not he who follows closely, and without allowing himself to drift, what is traced out for him by a love that I will call horrible?

Don't believe that she who was placed at the beginning of this 199 dialogue, Aphrodite, is a goddess who smiles.

A pre-Socratic by the name, I believe, of Democritus, says that Aphrodite was there all alone at the beginning. And it was even in this connection that the term ágalma appeared for the first time in Greek texts. Venus, as she is more commonly known, is born every day.

The birth of Aphrodite takes place every day, and to borrow a term from Plato himself – an equivocation that is, I believe, a true etymology – I will conclude my talk today with these words, καλημέρα (kaleméra), good day [bonjour], καλήμερος (kalémeros), good day and beautiful desire, based on the reflections I have contributed here about the relation of love to something that has always been called "eternal love." It should not be too burdensome for you to think about it if you recall that Dante [in the Inferno] explicitly places the words "eternal love" on the doors of Hell.

February 8, 1961

THE OBJECT OF DESIRE AND THE DIALECTIC OF CASTRATION

THE OBJECT OF DESIRE AND THE DIALECTIC OF CASTRATION

XII

TRANSFERENCE IN THE PRESENT

Decline of the Other.
Dignity of the subject.
Transference is not just repetition.
The true mainspring of love.
Socrates' interpretation.

I think most of you recall that we have arrived at the end of our commentary on the Symposium.

As I have, if not explained, at least indicated several times, this dialogue happens to have been historically at the origin, not only of what one might call an explanation of love in our cultural era, but also of the development of a function that is, on the whole, the deepest, most radical, and most mysterious of relations between subjects.

On the horizon of the commentary I proposed was the whole development of ancient philosophy right up until Christianity.

Ancient philosophy, as you know, did not simply promulgate a speculative position. Whole parts of the society were oriented in their practice by the speculation that stemmed from Socrates. It was not at all artificially or fictitiously that Hegel described positions like those of the Stoics and Epicureans as the antecedents of Christianity. Such positions were in fact experienced by a very large set of subjects as something that guided their lives in a way that was equivalent, prior, and preparatory to what the Christian position brought them afterward. The latter also involves a dimension that goes beyond speculation and that the Symposium itself has continued to mark deeply.

One cannot in effect say that the fundamental theological positions taught by Christianity were lacking in repercussions. They profoundly influenced each person's problematic, most notably the problematic of those people who found themselves, in the course of history, at the forefront, assuming, as they did, roles as examples in a variety of ways – whether because of what they said or because of their directive action. This is what we call sainthood. This can only be indicated here on the horizon, yet it suffices for our purposes.

It suffices because if it were from this point of departure that I wanted to fuel what I have to say here, I would have broached things from a later point. I chose instead the initial point constituted by the Symposium and provided a commentary on it because it harbors within it something altogether radical concerning the mainspring of love – indeed, it is subtitled "On Love" [in Léon Robin's French edition] and it clearly announces that its main topic is love.

1

I don't think it would be exaggerating to say that the point with which I concluded last time has been neglected heretofore by all commentators on the Symposium, and that in this respect my commentary marks a milestone in the history of the development of the dialogue's potential.

I believe I was able to perceive the last word of what Plato meant to tell us about the nature of love in the very scenario of what happens between Alcibiades and Socrates. This presupposes that in the presentation of what one might call his thought, Plato deliberately created room for enigma – in other words, his thought is not entirely patent, delivered up, or spelled out in this dialogue.

Now there is nothing excessive in asking you to go along with me on this, for the simple reason that, according to all ancient and especially modern commentators on Plato – it is not the case of just one of them – an attentive scrutiny of the dialogues shows that they quite obviously contain an exoteric as well as a hermetic element. The most peculiar forms of hermeticism, right up to and including the most typical pitfalls bordering on illusion [leurre], on difficulty produced for its own sake, have as their aim not to be understand-205 able to those who should not understand. This is truly fundamental in every one of Plato's exposés that has been handed down to us.

To admit this is also to admit what can always be risqué in making headway, going further, trying to break through, and guessing the deepest mainspring of what Plato tells us. But concerning the theme of love as it is presented to us in the Symposium, to which I have limited my attention here, it is difficult for us as analysts not to recognize the bridge that is standing there and the hand that is extended toward us in the articulation of the last scene in the Symposium – namely, the scene that unfolds between Alcibiades and Socrates.

I articulated and emphasized it to you in two stages. I showed you the importance, in Alcibiades' declaration, of the theme of ágalma: the object hidden within the subject, Socrates. I showed you that it is very hard not to take it seriously. In the form and articulation in which it is presented to us, Plato does not resort to metaphorical terms or pretty images when he tells us, roughly speaking, that Alcibiades expects a great deal of Socrates. A structure is revealed here, in which we can find anew what we are able to articulate as fundamental in what I will call the position of desire.

Apologizing to those of you who are recent arrivals here, I can assume that most of you are aware of the general outlines of my previous discussions on the position of the subject, outlines that are found in the topological summary we conventionally refer to here as the Graph.

Its general form is supplied by the splitting* or fundamental doubling of two signifying chains by which the subject is constituted. This requires that we admit that it has already been demonstrated that this doubling is, in and of itself, necessitated by the initial, inaugural, logical relationship between the subject and the signifier as such; and that the existence of an unconscious signifying chain stems from the sole position of the term "subject" qua determined as a subject by the fact that he props up the signifier [il est le support du signifiant].

Those for whom this is merely an assertion or proposition that remains to be demonstrated, should rest assured – we will come back to it. But for the purposes of our seminar this morning, I ask you to keep in mind that it has already been articulated here.

In relation to the unconscious signifying chain as constitutive of the subject who speaks, desire presents itself in a position that can only be conceptualized on the basis of the metonymy determined by 206 the existence of the signifying chain. Metonymy is the phenomenon that occurs in the subject as a prop for the signifying chain. Due to the fact that the subject undergoes the mark of the signifying chain, something is fundamentally instituted in him that we call metonymy, which is nothing other than the possibility of the infinite sliding of signifiers owing to [sous] the continuity of the signifying chain. Everything that at one time finds itself associated with the signifying chain – a circumstantial element, an aspect of activity, an element of the beyond [l'au-delà] or of the endpoint [terme] to which this activity leads – all of these elements can be taken as equivalent to each other under suitable conditions. A circumstantial element can take on the representative value of the endpoint of subjective enunciation – that is, the object toward which the subject heads or the subject's action itself.

Now it is precisely inasmuch as something presents itself as enhancing [revalorisant] this infinite sliding – this dissolving element that brings signifying fragmentation into the subject – that it takes on the value of the privileged object that puts a stop to the infinite sliding. An object can thus assume, in relation to the subject, the essential value that constitutes the fundamental fantasy. The subject himself realizes that he is arrested therein, or, to remind you of a more familiar notion, fixated. We call the object that serves this privileged function a. It is to the extent that the subject identifies with the fundamental fantasy that desire as such takes on consistency and can be designated – that the desire in question for us as well is rooted, by its very position, in Hörigkeit [bondage, sexual dependence]. In other words, to use our terminology, in the subject it stands for the desire of the Other with a capital O [abbreviated as A for Autre].

A is defined for us as the locus of speech, the locus that is always evoked as soon as there is speech, the tertiary locus that always exists in relations with the other, a, as soon as there is signifying articulation. This A is not an absolute other, an other that would be what we call, in our incoherent moral jargon, the other respected as a subject, as our equal, morally speaking. No, this Other, as I teach you to articulate it here, that is both necessitated and necessary as a locus, but at the same time constantly questioned as to what guaran-207 tees it, is a perpetually vanishing Other which, due to this very fact, places us in a perpetually vanishing position.

Now love itself is related to the questioning of the Other regarding what he can give us and what he can furnish by way of an answer. Not that love is identical to each of the demands with which we assail the Other, for love is situated in what lies beyond this demand, insofar as the Other can or cannot respond to us as an ultimate presence.

The whole problem is to perceive the relationship that links the Other to which the demand for love is addressed, to the appearance of desire. The Other is no longer in any way our equal – this Other to whom we aspire, love's Other – but something that represents, strictly speaking, its deposing [déchéance]. I mean that it is something like an object.

What is at stake in desire is not a subject but rather an object. Herein lies what one might call the terrible commandment of the god of love. The commandment is to make of the object it designates to us something that, first of all, is an object, and, second, an object before which we falter, vacillate, and disappear as subjects. For it is we as subjects who suffer from this deposing [déchéance] or depreciation.

What happens to the object is precisely the opposite. The terms

I am using here are not the most suitable, but so what? The most important thing is that you get it and that I make myself understood. This object is overvalued. And it is insofar as it is overvalued that it serves the function of saving our dignity as subjects – that is, of making us something other than subjects subjected to the infinite sliding of the signifier. It makes of us something other than subjects of speech, turning us into something unique, inestimable, and irreplaceable in the final analysis, which is the true point at which we can designate what I have called the dignity of the subject.

The equivocal nature of the term "individuality" lies not in the fact that we are something unique, like the body which is specific – this one and not that one. Individuality consists entirely in the privileged relationship in which we culminate as subjects in desire.

Here I am merely repeating once more the merry-go-round of truth on which we have been spinning since the beginning of this Seminar.

My goal this year is to show what the consequences of transference are at the very heart of our practice.

2

208

"How did it happen that we are coming to transference so late in the game?" you will ask me.

It is, of course, characteristic of truths to never show themselves completely. In short, truths are solids that are perfidiously opaque. They don't even have, it seems, the property we are able to produce in certain solids, that of transparency – they do not show us their front and back edges at the same time. You have to circumnavigate them [en faire le tour], and even do a little conjuring [le tour de passe-passe].

As for transference as we are broaching it this year – and you have seen how charmingly I have been able to lead you for a while in making you concern yourselves with love along with me – you must, all the same, have noticed that I approached it from a certain direction or angle, which not only is not the classic angle, but is not even the angle from which I had heretofore approached the topic with you.

Hitherto, I always remained reserved in what I asserted regarding transference, by telling you that one has to seriously distrust its appearances – namely, the phenomena that are most often designated with the terms "positive transference" and "negative transference." These terms are situated at the level of a simple collection, at the level of the everyday terms with which not only a more or less informed public, but even we analysts speak of transference.

I have always reminded you that we must begin with the fact that transference, in the final analysis, is repetition compulsion [automatisme]. Since the beginning of this year I have done nothing but lead you through the details of the movement in Plato's Symposium, where love alone is at work, and this was obviously designed to broach transference by another path. The goal now is to bring these two paths together.

The distinction [between transference and repetition compulsion] is so legitimate that one can find it in the work of other authors.

One reads very odd things in authors' texts, and one realizes that, lacking the proper reference points – that is, the guidelines I provide you with here – they arrive at things that are quite astonish-209 ing. I would be more than happy if someone who is a bit incisive would give us a short report here on this topic, which we could truly discuss. I could even say that I wish someone would do so, at this point in my seminar, for precise, local reasons I don't want to dwell on, but that I will come back to. It is certainly necessary that some of you mediate between my rather heterogeneous audience and what I am in the process of trying to articulate for you. It is obviously very difficult for me, without such mediation, to make enough headway regarding subject matter that leads toward nothing less than placing the function of desire – not only in the analysand but essentially in the analyst – at the forefront of what I am articulating this year.

One wonders for whom the risk is greater. Is it for those who, for one reason or another, know something about it? Or is it for those who can still know nothing about it? Whatever the case may be, there must nevertheless be a way of broaching the topic before a sufficiently prepared audience, even if not everyone present has undergone an analysis.

That said, let me draw your attention to an article by Herman Nunberg, published in 1951 in the International Journal of Psychoanalysis [32: 1–9], entitled "Transference and Reality." This article, like everything else that has been written on transference, moreover, is exemplary as regards the difficulties that arise and the sleight of hand one encounters when authors lack a sufficiently methodical, situated, and enlightened approach to the phenomenon of transference. In this short article, which is exactly nine pages long, the author goes, in effect, so far as to distinguish transference from repetition compulsion. They are, he says, essentially different. Which is going pretty far, and it is certainly not what I am teaching you. I will thus request that, for next time, someone prepare for us a ten-minute report on what seems to him to result from the structure of the statements made in this article and how we can correct it.

For the moment, let us highlight what is involved.

Transference was originally discovered by Freud as a process, let me stress this, that is spontaneous. And, as we are talking about the historical beginning of the appearance of this phenomenon, a spontaneous process that was worrisome enough to scare one of its most eminent pioneers, Breuer, away from the first analytic investigation.

Transference was very quickly noticed and linked to the most 210 essential facet of the presence of the past insofar as it is discovered by analysis. I am weighing my terms very carefully, and I beg you to record what I am retaining in order to establish the main points of the dialectic in question.

It was also very quickly agreed, at the level of an attempt that was confirmed thereafter by experience, that the phenomenon is accessible to interpretation.

Interpretation already existed at that time, showing itself to be one of the tools necessary to induce the subject to remember. People perceived that something other than the tendency to remember was at work. They didn't yet know very well what it was. But, in any case, it was there. Transference was immediately agreed to be accessible to interpretation and thus permeable, so to speak, to the action of speech.

This immediately raised a problem that still remains unsolved for us today, which is the following.

The phenomenon of transference is itself positioned in such a way as to sustain the action of speech. In effect, at the same time at which transference was discovered, it was discovered that if speech hits home [porte], as it always had before this was noticed, it is because transference is involved in it. The upshot being that until the present time – and in fact the question has always remained on the agenda, the ambiguity remaining intact – as things stand, nothing can eliminate the fact that transference, no matter how much it is interpreted, retains within itself a kind of irreducible limit.

The topic has been discussed and rehashed at length by the most qualified authors in the field. Let me mention to you in particular an article by Ernest Jones in his Papers on Psycho-analysis, "The Action of Suggestion in Psychotherapy," but there are countless others.

What indeed is at issue? Under the normal conditions of analysis – in the case of neurosis, that is – transference is interpreted on the basis of and using the instrument of transference itself. It is thus impossible for the analyst not to analyze, interpret, and intervene in the transference from the position bestowed upon him by transference itself. In effect, there remains an irreducible margin of suggestion, an ever suspect element, which is not related to what happens outside – one cannot know that – but rather to what the theory itself is capable of producing.

But, in fact, it is not such difficulties that thwart our progress in this area. We must nevertheless establish the limits – the theoretical 211 aporia – of the phenomenon. This is perhaps what will later allow us to go beyond it. Let us take careful note of the situation, and perhaps we can already perceive what paths will enable us to go beyond it.

The reality of transference is thus the presence of the past. Isn't there already something that stands out in this, allowing us to provide a more complete formulation? It is a presence that is a bit more than presence – it is a presence in action and, as the German [Übertragung] and French [transfert] terms indicate, a reproduction.

What is not brought out clearly enough in what is ordinarily said is in what respect this reproduction differs from a simple passivating of the subject. If the reproduction here is a reproduction in action, there is something creative in transference's manifestations. It seems to me essential to articulate this creative element. As always, just because I highlight it doesn't mean it is not already detectable in a more or less obscure way in what other authors have articulated.

If you read Daniel Lagache's landmark paper, you will see that this is the crux of the distinction he introduced between "repetition of need" and "need for repetition" which, in my opinion, remains a bit vacillating and murky as it does not take this last point into account. As didactic as this opposition may be, in reality it is not inclusive – it is not even truly at work for a single instant in what we experience in transference.

Consider first the need for repetition. There is no doubt about it, we can only formulate transference phenomena in the following enigmatic form: why must the subject eternally repeat a signification, in the positive sense of "signification," namely, what he signifies to us through his behavior? To call this a need is already to deflect what is at work. In this regard, to refer to an opaque psychological fact – as Daniel Lagache purely and simply does in his paper, namely, the Zeigarnik effect – better respects in the end what should be preserved that is strictly original in transference.

If, on the other hand, transference is the repetition of a need, a need that can manifest itself at one moment as transference and at another as need, it is clear that we arrive at an impasse, since we 212 also spend our time saying that it is but a shadow of a need, a need that has long since been outgrown, which is why its disappearance is possible.

We also arrive here at the point at which transference, strictly speaking, appears to be a source of fiction. In transference, the subject fabricates or constructs something. Thus it is impossible, it seems to me, not to immediately include the term "fiction" in the function of transference. What is the nature of this fiction? And, second, what is its object(ive)? And if fiction is involved, what is being feigned? And since it is a matter of feigning, feigning for whom?

If we don't immediately answer by saying "for the person one is addressing," it is because we cannot add "knowing full well that one is doing so" [le sachant]. It is because we have already distanced ourselves, due to the phenomenon, from any hypothesis of what we might globally [massivement] term "simulation."

Thus it is not for the person one is addressing insofar as one knows that one is doing so. But this is not because it is the contrary – namely, that it is insofar as one does not know it that one must believe that the person one is addressing has, for all that, suddenly evaporated or vanished. Everything that we know of the unconscious right from the outset, on the basis of dreams, leads us to the conclusion that there are psychical phenomena which occur, develop, and are constructed in order to be heard [entendus, which also means "understood"] – which occur, develop, and are constructed for the Other who is there even if one does not know it. Even if one is not aware that they are there in order to be heard, they are there in order to be heard, and by an Other to boot.

Stated differently, it seems to me impossible to eliminate from the phenomenon of transference the fact that it manifests itself in a relationship with someone to whom one speaks. This fact is constitutive. It constitutes a border, and enjoins us at the same time not to drown the phenomenon of transference in the general possibility of repetition constituted by the very existence of the unconscious.

Outside of analysis, there are of course repetitions that are linked to the constancy of the signifying chain in the subject. These repetitions must be strictly distinguished from what we call transference, even if they can, in certain cases, have analogous effects. It is in this sense that we can justify the distinction into which someone who is nevertheless quite remarkable – Herman Nunberg – allows himself to slip, from an entirely different direction, that of error.

I am now going to slip in here a segment of our exploration of 213 the Symposium for a moment, in order to show you its stimulating character.

3

Recall the extraordinary scene constituted by Alcibiades' public confession, and let us try to situate it in our terms.

I'm sure you sense the quite remarkable weight that is attached to this action, sensing too that there is something here that goes well beyond a pure and simple account of what happened between Alcibiades and Socrates. It is not neutral. The proof thereof is that before even beginning, Alcibiades takes cover by calling for secrecy, not simply in order to protect himself. He says, "Let those who are neither capable nor worthy of hearing, the slaves who are here, plug up their ears, for there are things that are better not heard when one is unable to understand them."

Before whom is he confessing? The others, all the others, those who, through their assembly, body, or council, seem to give the greatest possible weight to what might be called the Other as tribunal. And what constitutes the value of Alcibiades' confession before this tribunal? It is that he recounts his attempt to make Socrates into something completely submissive and subordinate to a value other than that of a relationship of one subject to another subject. He attempted to seduce Socrates, he wanted to make him, and in the most openly avowed way possible, into someone instrumental and subordinate to what? To the object of Alcibiades' desire – ágalma, the good object.

I would go even further. How can we analysts fail to recognize what is involved? He says quite clearly: Socrates has the good object in his stomach. Here Socrates is nothing but the envelope in which the object of desire is found.

It is in order to clearly emphasize that he is nothing but this envelope that Alcibiades tries to show that Socrates is desire's serf in his relations with Alcibiades, that Socrates is enslaved to Alcibiades by his desire. Although Alcibiades was aware that Socrates desired him, he wanted to see Socrates' desire manifest itself in a sign, in order to know that the other – the object, ágalma – was at his mercy.

Now, it is precisely because he failed in this undertaking that Alcibiades disgraces himself, and makes of his confession something 214 that is so affectively laden. The daemon of Αἰδώς (Aidós), Shame, about which I spoke to you before in this context, is what intervenes here. This is what is violated. The most shocking secret is unveiled before everyone; the ultimate mainspring of desire, which in love relations must always be more or less dissimulated, is revealed – its aim is the fall of the Other, A, into the other, a. And on top of all that, it seems in this case that Alcibiades failed in his undertaking, insofar as it was designed to make Socrates fall off his pedestal.

What could more closely resemble what one might call a search for truth? One might believe that this is the endpoint of such a search, not in its function as a sketch, abstraction, or neutralization of all elements, but, quite the contrary, in what it contributes by way of resolution value, or even absolution. It is quite different, as you see, from the simple phenomenon of a so-called unaccomplished task [the Zeigarnik effect].

A public confession made, right up to its very last words, with all the religious overtones we rightly or wrongly attach to confession – this is certainly what seems to be involved. But doesn't it also seem fitting that the homage rendered to the master should end with this brilliant [éclatant] testimony to Socrates' superiority? Wouldn't that underscore what some have designated as the apologetic value of the Symposium?

You are indeed aware of the accusations with which Socrates, even after his death, remained charged, in particular in a pamphlet by a man named Polycrates. Everyone knows that the Symposium was in part written in response to the lampoon – we have several quotes from others who were also involved [in his condemnation] – which still accused Socrates of having corrupted Alcibiades and many others, by having indicated to them that the door to the satisfaction of their desires was wide open.

Now what do we see? A paradox. A truth is brought to light here, which seems in some sense to be self-sufficient, yet everyone senses that a question remains intact: why all of this? To whom is all of this addressed? Who is being instructed at the moment the confession takes place? It is certainly not Socrates' accusers. What desire induces Alcibiades to thus air his dirty laundry in public? Isn't there a paradox here that is worth pointing out? As you will see by looking closely at the text, it's not so simple.

What everyone perceives to be an interpretation by Socrates is, 215 indeed, an interpretation. Socrates retorts to Alcibiades, "Everything you just did, and Lord knows it isn't obvious, was for Agathon's sake. Your desire is more secret still than all the unveiling you have just given yourself over to. It now aims at yet another. And I will designate that other – it is Agathon."

Paradoxically, what Socrates' interpretation reveals, what it puts in the place of what is manifested, is not something fantasmatic, arising out of the depths of the past, but which no longer has any existence. If we are to believe Socrates, it is quite clearly reality itself that, in the process of the search for truth, serves as what we could call a transference. So that you will understand me clearly, [I will provide an analogy:] it is as if someone came forward during Oedipus' trial to say, "Oedipus is pursuing his search for truth, which must lead to his own perdition, so breathlessly because he has but one goal and that is to run away with Antigone." Such is the paradoxical situation in which Socrates' interpretation places us.

There are, of course, myriad shimmering details. It is easy to see how pulling off such a brilliant act, showing what one is capable of, could serve to dazzle the ignorant. But nothing in all of that, Socrates tells us, holds up in the final analysis.

One can certainly wonder to what extent Socrates knows what he is doing when he says so. For in responding to Alcibiades, doesn't he seem to deserve Polycrates' accusation? Socrates – who is knowledgeable or learned in matters of love – designates to Alcibiades where his desire lies, and goes much further than simply designating it, as he, in some sense, vicariously plays this desire's game. Indeed, immediately afterward, Socrates is preparing to eulogize Agathon when suddenly, through a freezing of the camera, he is hidden, and we understand nothing due to the effect of the entrance of still more party crashers. Thanks to which the question remains unanswered. The dialogue can indefinitely go back over the same ground – we will never know what Socrates knew about what he was doing.

Or is it rather Plato who replaces him here? No doubt, since Plato wrote the dialogue, knowing a bit more about what Socrates knew, allowing centuries of readers to be misled concerning what he, Plato, designates to us as the true reason for love, believing instead that it lies in leading the subject to ladders which allow him to 216 ascend toward a beauty that is ever more confounded with supreme beauty. That being said, this is not at all what, in following the text, we sense we are obliged to conclude.

Insofar as we are analysts, we can say the following.

If, as seems to be indicated by his words, Socrates' desire is nothing other than to lead his interlocutors to γνῶθι σεαυτόν (gnóthi seautón) [know thyself], which is translated in an extreme manner, in another register, by "concern yourself with your soul," then we can imagine that this is to be taken seriously. On the one hand, in effect, and I will explain to you by what mechanism, Socrates is one of those to whom we owe it that we have a soul – I mean, he gave consistency to a certain point designated by Socratic questioning, with what it engenders by way of transference. But if it is true that what Socrates designates thusly is, unbeknown to him, the desire of the subject as I define it, and as Socrates effectively shows us that he makes himself into its accomplice – if this is so, and if he does so unbeknown to himself, we thus see Socrates in a place that we can understand completely, and we can understand at the same time how, in the end, he set Alcibiades ablaze.

For in its root and essence, desire is the Other's desire, and this is strictly speaking the mainspring of the birth of love, if love is what occurs in the object toward which we extend our hand owing to our own desire, and which, when our desire makes it burst into flames, allows a response to appear for a moment: the other hand that reaches toward us as its desire.

This desire always manifests itself inasmuch as we do not know. "And Ruth did not know what God wanted from her." But in order not to know what God wanted of her, it must still have been clear that God wanted something of her. If she knows nothing about it, it is not because no one knows what God wants of her, but because, owing to this mystery, God is eclipsed – yet He is always there.

To the extent to which Socrates does not know what he himself desires – it being the Other's desire – Alcibiades is possessed by what? By a love about which one can say that Socrates' only merit is to designate it as transference love, and to redirect him to his true desire.

These are the points that I wanted to establish anew today, in order 217 to continue next time with what I think I can substantiate, namely, how the final articulation of the Symposium – this apologue or scenario verging on myth – allows us to structure the situation of the analysand in the presence of the analyst around the position of two desires.

We can thus truly restore it to its veritable sense of a situation involving two people, a real situation with two people. We can at the same time precisely situate the often extremely precocious love phenomena that occur therein – which are so disconcerting for those who broach them – as well as the phenomena that become even more complicated insofar as they come later, in short, all the content of what occurs at the imaginary level. It is at this level that modern theorists thought, not groundlessly, they had to construct the whole theory of object relations, as well as that of projection – a term which is far from adequate – and, in short, the whole theory of what the analyst is to the analysand during analysis.

This cannot be conceptualized without correctly situating the position that the analyst himself occupies in relation to the analysand's constitutive desire, which is that with which the subject engages in the analysis – namely, "What does he want?"

March 1, 1961

219

XIII

A CRITIQUE OF COUNTERTRANSFERENCE

The unconscious is, at first, the Other's.
Desire in the case of the analyst.
The analytic game of bridge.
Paula Heimann and Money-Kyrle.
The latent effect linked to inscience.

Last time I ended, to your satisfaction so it seems, on a point regarding what constitutes one of the elements, and perhaps the fundamental element, of the subject's position in analysis. It was the question – which intersects for us the definition of desire as the Other's desire, a question that is, in short, marginal, but that thereby signals that it is fundamental to the position of the analysand in relation to the analyst, even if he does not formulate it to himself – "What does he [the analyst] want?"

After having gone that far, we are going to take a step back today, as I announced at the beginning of my talk last time, and start examining the ways other theorists generally manifest, in the evidence they provide of their praxis, the same topology as the one I am trying to ground here, inasmuch as it makes transference possible.

Attesting to it in their own way, they are not, in effect, obliged to formulate it in the same way I do. That seems obvious enough. As I wrote somewhere, one has no need for the blueprints of an apartment to bang one's head on the walls. I would go even further – for this operation, one can normally do perfectly well without the blueprints. But it's not true the other way around. As opposed to a primitive schema of reality testing, it is not enough to bang one's head on the walls to reconstruct the blueprints of an apartment, especially if one has this experience in the dark. An example dear to me is that of Théodore cherche des allumettes, a play which illustrates it for you quite amply.

220 This is perhaps a bit forced as a metaphor, though perhaps not as forced as it may still seem to you. It is what we are going to see put to the test, the test of what occurs in our times when analysts speak of transference.

1

When analysts speak about transference nowadays, what are they talking about? Let us go right to what is foremost in their minds today on this topic. The topic arises at the precise point around which you no doubt sense that I am centering it this year, namely, around the analyst. And to be quite frank, what the most advanced and most lucid theorists articulate best when they discuss it is "countertransference," as they call it.

I would like to remind you of some basic facts about it. It is not because they are basic that they are always expressed, and, while they go without saying, they go even better with saying.

Concerning countertransference, there is first of all the commonly held view. It is the view held by each of us who has at least considered the problem a little bit. It is the first idea that one comes up with about it, the first in the sense of the most common idea, but it is also the oldest approach to the topic, for the notion of countertransference has always been around in psychoanalysis. Since very early on – since the beginning of the development of the notion of transference – everything in an analyst that represents his unconscious insofar as it is, I would say, unanalyzed, has been considered detrimental to his functioning and operating as an analyst.

In the commonly accepted view, it is inasmuch as something has remained in the dark that this something becomes the source of uncontrolled and above all blind responses. This is what leads to an emphasis on the need for a training analysis to be taken quite far – I am using vague terms to begin with – because, as one author wrote somewhere, were one to neglect some corner of the analyst's unconscious, veritable blind spots would result therefrom. This could lead in practice to more or less serious or unfortunate events: nonrecognition, missed opportunities, badly timed interventions, and perhaps even mistakes. Such a view is, in fact, proposed, though I would place it in the conditional tense, in quotes, indicating my 221 reservations – it is a view to which I do not immediately subscribe, but which is widely endorsed.

Yet one cannot but relate this view to another, which is that one must, in the end, have faith in the communication of unconsciouses to best provide the analyst with decisive insights.

Thus it would not be owing as much to one's long experience as an analyst, or to extensive knowledge of what one is likely to encounter in patients' structures, that we could expect the most relevant interventions, the lion's spring that Freud mentions, which only happens once in the best of cases – no, it would be owing to the communication of unconsciouses. This purportedly gives rise to what, in analysis as it is currently practiced, goes furthest and deepest and has the greatest effect. There would be no analysis at all were any of the elements that supposedly attest to it to be lacking. The analyst is, in other words, presumed to be directly informed of what is going on in his patient's unconscious. The pathway by which this transmission occurs remains, nevertheless, quite problematic in the tradition. How can we conceptualize such a communication between unconsciouses?

I am not here to polarize antinomies or fabricate artificial impasses, even from a heuristic or critical standpoint. I am not saying that there is something unthinkable about this, or that it would be antinomical to define the model analyst both as he who, ideally, no longer has anything that is unconscious, but who at the same time has preserved a good deal of it. This would be to postulate an unfounded opposition.

To take things as far as they can go, one might theorize a reserve unconscious. It must be admitted that no one ever undergoes an exhaustive elucidation of the unconscious, regardless of how far his analysis is taken. If we accept the idea of an unconscious reserve, we can quite easily imagine that someone who is alerted to its existence by having undergone training analysis, knows, in some sense, how to play it like an instrument, like the shell of a violin whose strings he also possesses. It is certainly not a raw unconscious we find in him, but rather a supple unconscious, an unconscious plus experience of that unconscious.

After enumerating these reservations, we must still sense the legitimate necessity of elucidating the point of transition by which 222 this qualification is acquired, and by which what psychoanalytic doctrine claims to be fundamentally inaccessible to consciousness can be reached. Indeed, it is this very inaccessibility that we must always posit as the foundation of the unconscious. For it is not the case that it is accessible to men of goodwill – it is not. It is under strictly limited conditions that one can reach it, through a detour, the detour via the Other, and this makes analysis necessary and infrangibly eliminates the possibility of self-analysis. How can we situate the point of transition by which what is thus defined [as inaccessible] can nevertheless be used as a source of information included in a directive praxis?

To raise this question is not to erect a pointless antinomy. What tells us that the problem can be validly raised in this way, I mean in a way that it becomes solvable, is that things really and truly do present themselves like this.

To you who at least have the keys, something immediately makes the point of access recognizable, which is that there is a logical priority in what you hear – namely, that it is first of all in the form of the Other's unconscious that all experience of the unconscious is gained. It was through his patients that Freud first encountered the unconscious. And for each of us, even if this fact is elided, it is first of all as the Other's unconscious that the idea presents itself that such a thing might exist. Every discovery of one's own unconscious presents itself as a stage of ongoing translation of an unconscious that is first of all the Other's. The upshot being that one should not be so surprised that one can admit that, even in the case of an analyst who has gone very far in this stage of translation, translation can always begin anew at the level of the Other. This obviously reduces much of the import of the possible antinomy I mentioned earlier, while simultaneously indicating that the antinomy can only be proposed illegitimately.

What I am telling you about the relation with the Other is designed to exorcize, in part, the fear we may feel of not knowing enough about ourselves. We shall come back to this, for I do not intend to absolve you of all concern on this score – that is quite far from my intent. But once we have accepted the function served by the Other, the fact remains that we encounter here the same obstacle we encounter in ourselves in our own analysis when the unconscious is involved. Namely, the highly essential, not to say historically original, element of my teaching: the positive power of misrecognition in the illusions of the ego, in the widest sense of the term – that is, in imaginary capture. 223

It is important to note here that this domain, which is thoroughly mixed together with the deciphering of the unconscious in our experience of our personal analysis, occupies a position that must be said to be different when it comes to our relation to the Other. Here appears what I would call the Stoic ideal people have of analysis.

People first identified the feelings, roughly speaking, negative or positive, that the analyst may have about his patient, which give rise in him to effects that are due to an incomplete reduction of the themes of his own unconscious. But if this is true for him as concerns his self-regard [amour-propre] in relation to the other with a lowercase o within him, the latter being that by which he sees himself as something other than what he is – and this was glimpsed and discovered well before psychoanalysis came on the scene – it in no wise exhausts the question of what legitimately occurs when he deals with this other with a lowercase o, the imaginary other, outside of himself.

Let me spell this out. The path of Stoic apathy demands that we remain unmoved by the attempts at seduction – as well as by the punishments that may be meted out – by this other with a lowercase o found outside of us, insofar as he always has some power over us, whether great or small, if nothing else the power to burden us with his sheer presence. If the analyst deviates from the path of Stoic apathy, does this in and of itself mean that it is owing to some inadequacy in his training as an analyst? Absolutely not – at least in theory.

Accept this stage of my argument. That is not to say it is the place I will end up. Let me simply offer the following remark: we have no reason to posit that, in and of itself, the recognition of the unconscious places the analyst out of passion's range. This would be to imply that the total, overall effect, the entire impact of the sexual object – or of another object capable of producing some sort of physical aversion – always and essentially derives from the unconscious.

Why, I ask, would that be necessary to anyone other than those who make the serious mistake of identifying the unconscious as such with the total powers of the Lebenstriebe [life drives]? This is what radically distinguishes the import of the doctrine I am trying to articulate before you. There is, of course, a relationship between 224 the two. The point is to elucidate why this relationship can be established, why it is the tendencies of the life instinct that are thus offered up in this relationship to the unconscious. Note that it is not just any of those tendencies, but specifically those that Freud always and tenaciously designated as sexual tendencies. There must certainly be a reason why they are especially privileged, captivated, or captured by the mainspring of the signifying chain, insofar as it is the signifying chain that constitutes the subject of the unconscious.

That being said, at this stage of our investigation it is worth asking why an analyst, just because he is well analyzed, should be unaffected by the appearance of a hostile thought in the other presence there – and one must of course assume, in order for something of this kind to occur, that the presence not be that of a patient, but rather of a being who takes up space. The more we assume him to be imposing, full, and normal, the more legitimately all kinds of possible reactions can occur in his presence. Similarly, when the two are of opposite sexes, for example, why should love or hate reactions be excluded in and of themselves? Why should they disqualify the analyst from serving his function?

Formulating the question in this way, there is no other answer than the following – why indeed? Or better still: the better the analyst is analyzed, the more it will be possible for him to be frankly in love with – or frankly averse to or repulsed by – his partner, according to the most elementary modes of relations between bodies.

What I am saying may seem a bit excessive, in that it bothers us. If we feel that there must, all the same, be something to the requirement of analytic apathy, it must clearly be rooted elsewhere. But in that case it must be stated.

And I am equipped to state it.

2

If I could state it for you right away, if the path we have already traced out allowed me to convey it to you, I would of course do so. But part of the path remains to be traced out before I can give you a 225 strict, precise formulation.

Nevertheless, something can already be said about it, which might satisfy you up to a certain point. The only thing I ask of you is not to be too satisfied with it.

It is as follows – if the analyst achieves apathy, as in the general public's conception of him and in accordance with his deontological image, it is to the extent that he is possessed by a desire that is stronger than the other desires that may be involved – for example, the desire to get down to it [en venir au fait] with his patient: to take him in his arms or throw him out the window.

It happens. I dare say that I wouldn't expect much from someone who has never felt such desires. But apart from the very possibility of it happening, it should not become a regular thing.

Why not? Is it for the negative reason that one must avoid a type of total imaginary discharge of the analysis? No – and we need not develop that hypothesis any further, although it would be interesting – it is for the following reason, which I am bringing out here this year: the analyst says, "I am possessed by a stronger desire." He is grounded in saying so as an analyst, insofar as a change has occurred in the economy of his desire. And it is in this regard that Plato's texts can be mentioned.

Every now and then something encouraging comes my way. I have given you this year a long discourse or commentary on the Symposium, with which I am not dissatisfied, I must say, and it turns out that someone in my circle surprised me – and you should understand this surprise in the sense the word has in analysis, as something which is basically related to the unconscious – by pointing out that, in one of his footnotes, Freud quotes part of Alcibiades' speech to Socrates [SE X, p. 240 n. 2].

Freud could have sought out a thousand other examples to illustrate what he was interested in at that precise moment, which was the death wish involved in love. He had but to bend over to scoop up piles of such examples. Someone once hurled at me an ejaculation, like a heartfelt cry, "Oh, how I would love it if you were dead for two years!" One need not look to the Symposium to find such examples. Thus I feel it is not inconsequential that, at an essential 226 moment in his discovery of the ambivalence involved in love, Freud referred to Plato's Symposium. It's not a bad sign. It is certainly not a sign that we were barking up the wrong tree.

In Plato's Philebus, Socrates says that the strongest of all desires must be the desire for death, since the souls that are in Erebus remain there. The argument is worth whatever it is worth, but it takes on illustrative value here in relation to what I have already indicated to you concerning the direction in which the reorganization or restructuring of the analyst's desire can be conceptualized. It is at least one of the moorings or anchoring points of the question. Surely we cannot confine our attention to that alone.

Nevertheless, we can go further in the same vein, regarding the analyst's detachment from repetition compulsion, which a good personal analysis is supposed to bring about. There is something that must surpass what I will call the particularity of its detour, go a bit beyond, and involve the specific detour Freud articulates when he posits that it is conceivable that the fundamental repetition of the development of life may be nothing other than the long detour of a compact, abyssal drive. He calls the latter the death drive, it being a level at which there is no longer anything but ἀνάγκη (Anánke), the necessity of the return to the initial state of inanimate matter.

This is no doubt a metaphor. A metaphor that is expressed only by extrapolation – at which certain people balk – on the basis of what is brought out by our practice, namely, the action of the unconscious signifying chain insofar as it leaves its mark on every manifestation of life in subjects who speak. But it is nevertheless a metaphor or an extrapolation that is not without its why and wherefore. At least it allows us to imagine that it contains a grain of truth, and that there may in fact be some relation between the analyst and Hades – death – as one of my students wrote in the first issue of our journal, adopting a beautifully haughty tone.

Does he or doesn't he play with death? I myself have written that, in the game of analysis, which certainly cannot be understood as involving only two players, the analyst plays with a dummy [un mort]. Thus we find again the common requirement that there be in the other with a lowercase o something that is capable of playing the part of a dead man [un mort].

In his position in the game of bridge, the analyst as S has across 227 from him his own other with a lowercase o [a for autre in French], by which he is in a specular relationship with himself, insofar as he is constituted as an ego. If we locate here the designated place of the other who speaks and that the analyst hears – that is, the patient insofar as he is represented by the barred subject [$], the subject as unknown to him – the patient turns out to occupy i(a), the place of the image of his own little a. Let us call the set of them as follows: the image of little a squared, $i(a)^2$. We will then have here the image, or rather the position, of the Other with a capital O insofar as it is the analyst who occupies it.

In other words, the analysand has a partner. You should not be surprised to discover that the analysand's own ego is attached to the same place. He must discover the truth of this other – the analyst as Other with a capital O.

The paradox of the game of analytic bridge is the abnegation which, unlike what happens in an ordinary game of bridge, is such that the analyst must help the subject figure out what is in his partner's hand. In order to direct this bridge game of loser wins, in theory the analyst should not have to make his life more complicated by having a partner. This is why it is said that the analyst as i(a) must act as a dummy. Which means that the analyst must always know which cards were dealt to whom.

I think that you will appreciate the relative simplicity of this solution to the problem. It is a common, exoteric, explanation for the outside world. It is simply a way of talking about what everyone believes, and someone who showed up here for the first time would find plenty of reasons to be satisfied with it and could go back to sleep soundly, reassured about what he had always heard – for example, that the analyst is a superior being.

Unfortunately, it doesn't hold water.

It doesn't hold water, and this is attested to by analysts themselves. Not simply by deploring the situation, tears in their eyes, and saying, "We are never equal to the task." While such declamations still exist, we have, thank God, been spared them for some time now – that's a fact. I am not personally responsible for this. I am simply noting it for the record.

Indeed, for some time now, people have accepted the idea that in analytic practice the analyst must take into account, in his information and his maneuvering, the feelings, not that he inspires, but that 228 he himself feels in the course of an analysis – namely, what is known as his countertransference.

3

It is to the best of analytic circles that I am alluding, and to the Kleinian circle to be specific.

You can easily get a hold of what Melanie Klein wrote on the subject, or what Paula Heimann wrote in an article entitled "On Counter-transference."

But you need not seek out this conception, that everyone currently takes for granted, in any one particular article. People articulate it quite openly, and above all they basically understand what they are articulating. It is nevertheless taken for granted. What is involved?

Countertransference is no longer considered in our time to be in essence an imperfection. Which does not, however, mean that it cannot ever be one. While it is no longer considered to be an imperfection, the fact remains that something makes it warrant the name "countertransference," as you will see.

Apparently, countertransference is exactly of the same nature as the other phase of transference, around which I tried to center the question last time by contrasting it with transference conceptualized as repetition compulsion – namely, transference insofar as it is said to be positive or negative, which everyone takes to imply the analysand's feelings for the analyst. Well, the countertransference in question – concerning which it is agreed that we must take it into account, even if it is a matter of some debate what we must do with it, and you will see at what level – consists of the analyst's feelings in analysis, which are determined at every instant by his relations with the analysand.

Of all the articles that I have read, I am selecting one almost at random, though it is never completely at random that we select anything, and there is probably a reason why I want to tell you the title of this one. It is a good article, whose title contains the very topic we are talking about today, "Normal Counter-transference and Some Deviations," which came out in the International Journal 229 of Psychoanalysis in 1956. The author, Roger Money-Kyrle, apparently belongs to the Kleinian circle, and is associated with Melanie Klein through Paula Heimann.

Before turning to this article, let me say a word about the article by Paula Heimann, who tells us about certain states of dissatisfaction and worry she felt. According to her, they even involved a certain premonition. She found herself in a situation which one need not be an old experienced analyst to have experienced, for it is only too frequently encountered during the initial stages of an analysis. The fact that a patient may precipitously, in a way patently determined by his analysis, though he may not be aware of it, make premature decisions, enter into a long-term relationship, and perhaps even get married – Heimann is cognizant that this must be analyzed, interpreted, and, to a certain extent, countered. But in this particular case, she mentions an altogether bothersome feeling she has, which she takes to be, in and of itself, a sign that she is right to be especially worried [p. 82]. She shows in her article how it is this feeling that allows her to better understand things and make headway [p. 83].

Many other sorts of feelings can arise. Money-Kyrle's article mentions, for example, feelings of depression, a general decline in interest in things, "listlessness," and even a listlessness the analyst may feel about everything he comes into contact with. Money-Kyrle describes, for example, what resulted from a session in which it seemed to him that he was unable to adequately live up to what he calls a demanding superego.* It is not because the word "demand" is contained therein that you should remain at that level in understanding the particularly English emphasis. "Demand" is more than demande in French [which is often no stronger than "request" in English], it is a pressing exigency. The article is a good one to read because the author does not confine himself to description, but calls into question in this regard the role of the analytic superego. He does it in a way that will seem to you to present some kind of gap,* which only truly takes on its full importance if you refer to the Graph of Desire. It is beyond the locus of the Other that the bottom line represents the superego – a dotted line insofar as you dot it.

I am putting the rest of the Graph on the board so that you will realize in this regard how it can serve you, and in particular in understanding that everything should not always be attributed to the superego's severity, which is, in the final analysis, opaque. Such and such a demand can give rise to depressive effects and even more. 230
This occurs in the analyst insofar as there is continuity between the Other's demand and the structure known as the superego. You should understand that we indeed find the strongest effects of what is called the superego's hyperseverity when the subject's demand is introjected, passing as an articulated demand into he who is its recipient in such a way that this demand represents his own demand in an inverted form – for example, when a demand for love coming from the mother encounters in he who must respond to it his own demand for love addressed to his mother.

But I am merely indicating this here, as our path does not lead in that direction. It is but a tangential remark.

Let us turn to Money-Kyrle, an analyst who seems particularly agile and clever in recognizing his own experience. He highlights something that happened in his practice and presents it to us as an example. It seems to him to warrant communication, not as an example of an accidental blunder that was more or less well corrected, but as a procedure that can be integrated into analytic technique. He underscores a feeling he detected in himself that he considered to be related to the trouble he was having analyzing one of his patients.

It occurred during the picturesque break in English life known as the weekend, and what he had done with his patient the week prior seemed problematic to him and left him unsatisfied. He tells us that he fell prey, without at first seeing the link at all, to a kind of exhaustion – let us call a spade a spade. During the second half of his weekend, he found himself in a state he could only recognize when he formulated it to himself in the exact same terms his patient had used – a state of disgust bordering on depersonalization.

The patient was, in effect, at times subject to phases verging on depression and paranoid phenomena, which were nothing new to either the patient or the analyst. It was one of those states that had given rise to the whole dialectic of the week, accompanied by a dream that the analyst had lit up in responding to. Rightly or wrongly, he had the feeling that he had not given the right answer, his feeling being based in any case on the fact that his answer had made the patient complain bitterly. Starting at that point, the 231 patient had become exceedingly mean to him. Thus the analyst wound up recognizing in what he himself felt, exactly what, at the outset, his patient had described about the patient's own state.

The analyst in question, like the other members of his circle, which I am referring to on this occasion as the Kleinian circle, immediately conceptualizes what is going on as representative of the effect of projection of the bad object, insofar as the subject, whether in analysis or not, is likely to project it into the other. It is not taken to be problematic, in a certain analytic milieu, to provide such explanations, despite the almost magical degree of belief they presuppose. It must not, nevertheless, be for no reason whatsoever that people slip into them so easily. This projected bad object must be understood as having quite naturally an effect, at least when it is a question of he who is coupled with the subject in a relationship as tight and coherent as that of a longstanding analysis.

Having an effect, to what extent? The article tells you – to the extent that it stems here from the analyst's failure to understand his patient. Thus it constitutes a deviation from "normal countertransference," and the article focuses on the possible utilization of such deviations.

As the beginning of the article tells us, "normal countertransference" occurs through the cyclical rhythm of introjection by the analyst of the analysand's discourse, and projection onto the analy-sand of what is produced by way of imaginary effects in response to this introjection. The author considers these effects to be normal, and you will see just how far he goes. Countertransference is said to be normal when the introjected demand is completely understood. The analyst then has no problem situating himself in what clearly arises in his own introjection. He simply sees its consequences and has no need to even use them. What happens in this case, which is actually situated at the level of i(a), is completely under control. The analyst is not surprised by what occurs in the patient – namely, that the patient projects onto him – and is not affected by it.

It is only when the analyst does not understand the patient that he is affected and that a deviation from normal countertransference occurs. Things can even go so far that the analyst effectively becomes the patient of the bad object that is projected into him by his partner. That is what happens in this case: Money-Kyrle expe- 232 riences something altogether unexpected, and it is only a thought which comes to him outside of the analytic setting that allows him – and this is perhaps only because the occasion is favorable – to recognize the very state described to him by his patient.

I am simply repeating it to you, without taking responsibility for the explanation given. I am not denying it either. I am provisionally bracketing it in order to go step by step, in order to lead you to the precise perspective to which I need to lead you in order to articulate something.

According to this experienced analyst, if the analyst does not understand, he nevertheless becomes the receptacle of the projection in question. He senses these projections like foreign objects in himself, which places him in the odd position of being a garbage dump.

If such things occurred with many patients, you see what this could lead to. When one is unable to situate what gives rise to such events, which are presented in a disconnected manner in Money-Kyrle's description, problems can arise.

This direction in analysis wasn't born yesterday. Ferenczi had already raised the question of knowing to what extent the analyst should reveal to his patient what the analyst really feels. It would be, according to him, in certain cases, a means of giving the patient access to that particular reality. No one dares to go that far today, especially not in the school to which I am referring. Paula Heimann says, for example, that the analyst must be very severe in his log and everyday hygiene, always being ready to analyze what he himself may feel in that register, but that, in the end, it is his own business, his aim being to try to race against the clock – in other words, to catch up for having perhaps gotten behind in understanding* his patient.

Be that as it may, I am taking the following step with our author, Money-Kyrle, who, while not Ferenczi, is not as reserved as Paula Heimann. On the basis of this localized point, the identicalness of the state he felt to that recounted by his patient at the beginning of the [session], he goes so far as to talk about it with his patient. And he notes the effect thereof – an immediate effect, for he tells us nothing of the later effects – which is obvious jubilation on the part of the patient. The latter deduces nothing else therefrom than, "Oh, so you admit it! Well, I'm very happy to hear it, for when you inter 233 preted that state to me the other day" – and indeed, the analyst had interpreted it, in a rather vague and fuzzy way, as the analyst himself realized – "I thought that what you were saying was all about you and not in the least about me."

We thus find ourselves in the midst of a complete misunderstanding, and we are content with it. In any case, the author is content with it, for he drops the subject there. The analysis, he tells us, begins anew, providing him, and we can but take his word for it here, every subsequent possibility to interpret. This was the precise point of the talk he gave in 1955 at the Geneva Congress, the text of which is contained in his article.

What is presented to us here as a deviation from [normal] countertransference is simultaneously posited as an instrumental procedure that can be codified. In similar cases, we should at least attempt to correct the situation as quickly as possible by recognizing the effects on the analyst and, by means of qualified statements, offer the patient something which certainly unveils, in some respect, the analytic situation as a whole. People expect a new departure to result therefrom, which will undo what had hitherto seemed to be an impasse in the analysis.

I am not saying that I think this is an appropriate way to proceed. I am simply remarking that if something like a new departure can be brought about in this manner, it is certainly not due to some privileged position. What I would say is that, to the extent that there is any legitimacy to this approach, it is our categories that in every case allow us to understand it.

I am of the opinion that it is not possible to understand it outside of the register of what I have pointed to as the place of a, the partial object, ágalma, in desire, insofar as desire is itself determined within a broader relationship, that of the demand [exigence] for love. It is only through this topology that we can understand such an approach. Indeed, this topology allows us to say that, even if the subject is unaware of it, by the very presupposition – I would even say, the objective presupposition – of the analytic situation, little a, ágalma, is already functioning in the other. It follows that what is presented to us here as countertransference, whether normal or not, in fact has no reason to be specially qualified as such. What is at work is but an irreducible effect of the transference situation itself.

By the sole fact of transference, the analyst is situated in the posi- 234 tion of he who contains ágalma, the fundamental object involved in the subject's analysis, as linked and conditioned by the subject's vacillating relationship that I characterize as constituting the fundamental fantasy, inaugurating the locus in which the subject can be fixated as desire.

This is a legitimate effect of transference. There is no need to bring in countertransference, as if some aspect of the analyst himself were involved, and a faulty aspect to boot. But in order to recognize it, the analyst must know certain things. He must, in particular, know that his occupying the correct position is not contingent on the criterion that he understand or not understand.

It is not absolutely essential that he understand. I would even say that, up to a certain point, his lack of comprehension can be preferable to an overly great confidence in his understanding. In other words, he must always call into question what he understands and remind himself that what he is trying to attain is precisely what in theory he does not understand. It is certainly only insofar as he knows what desire is, but does not know what the particular subject with whom he is engaged in the analytic adventure desires, that he is well situated to contain within himself the object of that desire. This alone can explain certain of its effects that are, it seems, still so oddly frightening.

I read an article that I will reference more precisely next time, in which a guy who, despite a great deal of experience, wonders what one should do when, right from the very first dreams, and sometimes even before the analysis begins, the analysand himself clearly takes the analyst to be a love object. The response given by the author in question is a bit more reserved than that given by another who comes right out and says that, when things get off on that foot, there is no point going any further because there are too many reality elements.

Must we formulate things in such a way? If I allow myself to be guided by the categories we have produced, the very crux of the analytic situation is that the subject is introduced as worthy of interest and love, erómenos. The analyst is there for him. This is the manifest effect, so to speak. But there is a latent effect, which is related to his non-science or inscience. Inscience regarding what? Regarding the latent – I mean objective or structural – object of his desire. 235
This object is already in the Other, and it is inasmuch as this is the case that, whether he knows it or not, he is virtually constituted as erastés. By virtue of this sole fact, he fulfills the condition for the metaphor or substitution of erastés for erómenos, which in and of itself constitutes the phenomenon of love. It is no surprise that we see its blazing effects right from the beginning of analysis in the form of transference love.

There is not, however, any reason to consider this to be a contraindication against analysis. It is here that the question of the analyst's desire – and to a certain extent, the analyst's responsibility – arises.

In truth, for the situation to be, as lawyers say regarding contracts, "perfect," it is enough to assume that the analyst, unbeknown to himself, places for a moment his own partial object, ágalma, in the patient with whom he is dealing. This is, in effect, contraindicated, but it is impossible, as you see, to situate, at least as long as the situation of the analyst's desire has not been precisely spelled out.

It will suffice that you read the paper by the author to whom I am alluding to see that he is forced, by the logic of his own discourse, to raise the question of what interests the analyst. And what does he tell us? That two things are involved in the analyst when he conducts an analysis, two drives.* It is quite strange to see qualified as passive drives the two that I will mention to you – the reparative drive* which, he tells us verbatim, runs counter to the latent destructiveness in each of us, and, second, the parental drive.*

This is how an analyst in a school as well developed as the Kleinian school formulates the position the analyst must adopt. I am not going to avert my gaze or protest loudly. I think that those of you who are regulars at my Seminar can easily see the scandalous nature thereof. But, after all, it is a scandal in which we essentially participate, for we constantly speak as if that is what is at work, even if we are well aware of the fact that we must not act as parents to the analysand. It suffices to hear what we say when we speak of the field of the psychoses.

The reparative drive,* what does that mean? A whole raft of 236 things. It has myriad implications for our practice. But wouldn't it be worthwhile articulating, in this regard, in what sense this reparative drive must be distinguished from the abuses of therapeutic ambition, for example?

In short, what I am challenging is not the absurdity of such a notion, but on the contrary what justifies it. I give the author and the whole school he represents credit for aiming at something that effectively has a place in our topology. But it must for once be articulated, situated, and explained otherwise. How can experienced authors speak of parental and reparative drives in analysis, and at the same time say something which, on the one hand, must have a justification, but which, on the other, imperiously requires a veritable justification?

This is why, next time, I will rapidly summarize what I wound up presenting, in an apologetic manner, since the last time, to a philosophical group concerning the position of desire.

March 8, 1961

237

XIV

DEMAND AND DESIRE IN THE ORAL AND ANAL STAGES

Psychoanalysts and drives.
The gaping maw of life.
From the pole to the partner.
Bout-de-Zan.
Counterdemand.

For those of you showing up here out of the blue today, I will provide a brief road map.

In this year's Seminar, I first attempted to reformulate, in more rigorous terms than have hitherto been employed, what one might call the theory of love, by commenting on Plato's Symposium. It is in the context of what I managed to situate thanks to this commentary that I am now beginning to articulate the nature [position] of transference, in the sense in which I announced it this year – in other words, in what I called its "subjective disparity."

By which I mean that the positions of the two subjects present are in no way equivalent. This is why one cannot speak of the "analytic situation," but merely of a pseudo-situation.

In the last two classes, I broached the topic of transference as regards the analyst. This does not mean that I grant the term "countertransference" the meaning it is usually given, which is that of a sort of imperfection in the analyst's purification in relation to the analysand. On the contrary, by "countertransference" I mean the analyst's necessary involvement in the transferential situation, which is precisely why we must distrust this unsuitable term. For, in fact, countertransference simply concerns the necessary consequences of the phenomenon of transference itself, assuming we analyze it correctly.

I introduced the topic by highlighting the fact that countertransference is currently conceptualized rather broadly in analytic 238 practice. Indeed, people think that what we might call a certain number of affects, insofar as the analyst feels them in analysis, constitute an if not normal, at least normative, way of situating things in the analytic setting, and constitute part not only of the knowledge base at the analyst's disposal, but even of his possible interventions, in that he may communicate his feelings to the analysand.

I never said that I find this method legitimate. I noted that it has been introduced and promoted in practice, and that it has been received and accepted by a very broad swath of the analytic community.

This alone is sufficiently indicative. We shall endeavor for the time being to analyze how theorists who view the use of countertransference in this way legitimate it.

1

Theorists legitimate the use of countertransference by relating it to moments when the analyst does not understand [incompréhension]. It is as if his failure to understand the patient were in and of itself the criterion, watershed mark, or aspect that defines what obliges the analyst to shift to another mode of communication and to another instrument in order to get his bearings in the analysis.

It is around the term "understanding" [compréhension] that what I intend to show you today revolves, in order to allow you to hone in on what one might call, in our terms, the relation between the subject's demand and his desire. Let me remind you that I have foregrounded the following as the crux of the matter – whose repercussions [retour] I have shown to be necessary – namely, that what is at stake in analysis is nothing other than bringing to light manifestations of the subject's desire.

Where is understanding when we understand, when we think we understand? I posit that, in its surest and, I daresay, elementary form, our understanding of anything the subject tells us can be defined, at the conscious level, by the fact that we know how to respond to what he [l'autre] demands. It is insofar as we think we can 239 respond to his demand that we have the sense that we understand.

Concerning demand, however, we know a bit more than this first approximation. We know, for example, that demand is not explicit. It is even far more than implicit – it is hidden from the subject as if it had to be interpreted. Therein lies the ambiguity.

Indeed, we who interpret it respond to unconscious demand at the level of a discourse that to us is a concrete discourse. Therein lies the dodge [biais] or trap. We have always tended to slide toward an assumption that captivates us, which is that the subject should, in some sense, be content with what we bring to light through our response – he should be satisfied with our response.

We know, nevertheless, that some resistance is always produced at this point. All the stages of the analytic theory of the subject – namely, the theory of the various agencies in him that we deal with – have stemmed from the situation of this resistance, from the way we can qualify it, and from the agencies to which we attribute it. Yet, without denying the role played by the subject's various agencies in resistance, isn't it possible to go further?

The difficulty of the relations between the subject's demand and the response made to him is situated farther along, at an altogether original point to which I tried to bring you by showing you what results in the subject who speaks from the fact – this is how I expressed myself – that his needs must pass through the defiles of demand. At this early point, it turns out that everything that is a natural tendency in the subject who speaks must be situated both in a beyond and shy of demand.

In a beyond that is the demand for love. And in a shy of that we call desire, with what characterizes it as a condition, which we call its absolute condition owing to the specificity of the object it involves: little a, the partial object. I tried to show you that the latter is included right from the outset in the fundamental text on the theory of love, the Symposium, in the guise of ágalma, inasmuch as I also identified ágalma with the partial object in psychoanalytic theory.

Today we will put our finger on it again by briefly retracing what 240 comes first in analytic theory – namely, Triebe, drives and their vicissitudes. We can then deduce what stems from them concerning what is important to us: the drive* involved in the analyst's position.

You recall that it is on this problematic point that I left you last time, insofar as an author [Money-Kyrle], the one who addresses the topic of countertransference, calls the drives involved in the analyst's position the parental drive,* the need to be a parent, and the reparative drive,* the need to go against the natural destructiveness assumed to reside in every subject insofar as he is analyzable.

You immediately grasped the brazenness and audacity of proposing such notions. It suffices to dwell upon them for but a moment to perceive the paradox therein. If the parental drive* must be present in the analytic situation, how can one even dare speak of transference since the analysand truly has a parent sitting across from him? What could be more legitimate than the fact that he falls into the very same position in relation to the analyst as the one he occupied during his whole upbringing in relation to people around whom were constructed the fundamental situations that constitute for him the signifying chain and repetition automatisms?

In other words, how can we fail to perceive that we are heading straight for an obstacle which will allow us to find our bearings? For we have here a direct contradiction, since we also say that the transference situation, as it is established in analysis, is at odds with the reality of the analytic situation? Certain people imprudently qualify the latter as a situation that is exceedingly simple, related to the hic et nunc of the relationship to the doctor. How can we fail to see that, if the doctor here is armed with the parental drive* – however evolved we may assume him to be in terms of his educative position – there is absolutely nothing that differentiates the subject's normal response to the situation from what could be considered the repetition of a past situation?

There is no way to even articulate the analytic situation without positing, at least to some extent, the exact opposite requirement. See, for example, the third chapter of Beyond the Pleasure Principle. Freud, in taking up anew the kind of articulation at work in analysis, distinguishes there between remembering and reproducing – repetition compulsion, Wiederholungszwang. He considers the latter to be a partial failure of the aim of remembering in analysis – indeed, a necessary failure. He even goes so far as 241 to chalk up the function of repetition to the structure of the ego – sensing at this stage of his elaboration a need to characterize the ego as largely unconscious – certainly not the whole of the function of repetition, since the entire work is designed to show that there is something more, but the majority nonetheless. Repetition is chalked up to ego defense, while the remembering of the repressed is considered to be the true or ultimate endpoint of the analytic operation, even though it is perhaps considered to be inaccessible at that precise moment.

Remembering, as the ultimate aim, encounters a resistance situated in the unconscious function of the ego. Following out this line of thinking, Freud tells us that we must tread this path:

> the physician cannot, as a rule, spare the analysand this phase, but must let him relive anew a bit of his forgotten life. He [. . .] must see to it that a certain dose of Überlegenheit, superiority, be preserved, thanks to which the apparent reality, die anscheinende Realität, can always nevertheless be recognized anew by the subject as a reflection, a mirror effect of a forgotten past.

God knows to what misguided interpretations this indication of Überlegenheit has lent itself. The whole theory of the alliance with the so-called healthy part of the ego was built around it. Yet there is nothing of the kind in these pages. I can highlight what must have struck you in passing, namely, the in some sense neutral character of this Überlegenheit, which is situated neither on the one side nor the other. Where is this superiority? Is it on the part of the doctor who, let's hope, doesn't lose his head? Or on the part of the patient?

In the French translation, which is just as bad as those that were done in other languages, it is oddly translated: "he must simply ensure that the patient preserve a certain degree of serene superiority" – there is nothing like that in the text – "which nevertheless allows him to note that the reality of what he reproduces is merely apparent."

This Überlegenheit, which can no doubt be required, must be situated in an infinitely more precise way than all the elaborations that claim to compare the current abreaction of what is repeated in treatment with a situation that is made out to be perfectly well known.

242 Let us thus begin with an examination of the stages, and the demands or requirements of the subject as we broach them in our interpretations. And let us start, following the diachrony known as the stages of the libido, with the simplest demand, the one to which we refer so frequently: oral demand.

2

What is an oral demand? It is the demand to be fed. To whom or what is it addressed? It is addressed to the Other who hears [entend], and who, at this primal level of the enunciation of demand, can truly be designated as what I call the "locus of the Other" – the Other-on [l'Autre-on] or "Otron," I would say, to make it rhyme with those designations familiar to us from physics. Thus we see that the demand to be fed is addressed by the subject, more or less unbeknown to himself, to this abstract Otron.

I have stated that every demand, due to the fact that it is [articulated in] speech, tends to be structured in the following way: it calls for an inverted response from the Other. Owing to its very structure, demand evokes its own form transposed according to a certain inversion. Due to its signifying structure, the demand to be fed is thus responded to, in a way that one can state to be logically contemporaneous with that demand, in the locus of the Other – that is, at the level of the Otron – with the demand to let oneself be fed.

We are very familiar with this in our practice. It is not a refined elaboration on a fictitious dialogue. It is what is at work every time the least little conflict breaks out in the relationship between a child and its mother which seems to be designed to form a circle [se boucler] in a strictly complementary way. What could, on the face of it, respond better to a demand to be fed than a demand to let oneself be fed? Yet we know that it is in the very way in which these two demands meet that lies the tiny gap* or tear into which discordance – the preformed failure of the meeting – usually creeps. This failure consists in the fact that it is not a meeting up of tendencies, but rather a meeting up of demands.

In the first conflict that breaks out in the nursing relationship, in the encounter between the demand to be fed and the demand to let oneself be fed, the following become clear: [1] a desire goes beyond 243 [déborde] this demand; [2] the demand cannot be satisfied without the desire being extinguished; [3] it is so that the desire which goes beyond demand not be extinguished that the subject who is hungry does not let himself be fed – owing to the fact that a demand to let himself be fed responds to his demand to be fed – and refuses in some sense to disappear qua desire by being satisfied qua demand; [4] the extinction or crushing of demand through satisfaction cannot happen without killing desire. All sorts of discordances derive therefrom, the most intriguing of which is the refusal to let oneself be fed in the form of anorexia that is said, with more or less good reason, to be nervosa.

We find here a situation that I cannot better translate than by playing off the equivocations authorized by sounds in French phonemics. One cannot admit to the other what is most primordial, namely, "you are [what I] desire" [tu es le désir], without at the same time saying to him, "desire has been killed" [tué le désir] – in other words, without conceding to him that he kills desire, without abandoning desire as such to him. The primal ambivalence characteristic of all demand is that it is equally implied in every demand that the subject does not want the demand to be satisfied. The subject aims at safeguarding desire in and of itself, and attests to the presence of unnamed, blind desire.

What is this desire? We know, and can respond in the most classic and elementary way. Oral demand has another meaning beyond that of the satisfaction of hunger. It is a sexual demand. It is cannibalism at its root, as Freud tells us right from the Three Essays on the Theory of Sexuality, and cannibalism has a sexual meaning. He reminds us – although this is veiled in his first formulation – that to feed oneself is, for man, linked to the goodwill of the Other, and linked to it by a polar relationship.

The fact, too, is that it is not on the bread alone of the Other's goodwill that the primitive subject must feed, but on the body of the person who feeds him. We must call a spade a spade – a sexual relationship is that by which the relationship with the Other gives rise to a union of bodies. And the most radical union is that of the earliest absorption in which we can glimpse the outlines of cannibalism, which characterizes the oral stage as it is presented in analytic theory.

Let us note what is at stake here. I approached things from the most difficult angle by starting at the beginning, whereas it is always 244 by backing up, by proceeding retroactively, that we must figure out how things are constructed during real development.

There is a theory of the libido that you know I get up in arms about, even though it was proposed by one of my friends, Franz Alexander. Indeed, he makes libido into the surplus energy manifested in a living being once its needs related to self-preservation have been satisfied. It is a convenient theory, but nonetheless false. That is not sexual libido. Sexual libido is indeed a surplus, but a surplus that renders vain any satisfaction of need wherever libido is situated. And if need be – that's the word for it! – libido refuses the satisfaction of need to preserve the function of desire.

All of this is self-evident and confirmed in every quarter, as you will see by backing up and starting anew with the demand to be fed. You can immediately put your finger on it in that, owing to the very fact that the tendency of a hungry mouth is expressed in a signifying chain by the very same mouth, this mouth becomes able to designate the food it desires. Which food? The first thing that results therefrom is that the mouth can say, "Not that kind." Desire's negation or gap, its "I like this and nothing else," already enters into the picture here, the specificity of the dimension of desire bursting onto the scene.

Hence the extreme care we must take in our interpretations at the level of the oral register. For, as I have said, oral demand forms at the same point, at the level of the same organ, at which the tendency arises. This is precisely where the problem lies. It is possible to produce all sorts of equivocations in responding to this demand. Of course, the response made to demand nevertheless leads to the preservation of the field of speech, and thus to the possibility of ever finding anew the place of desire in this field, but it is also the possibility of all subjections – one attempts to force the subject, his need being satisfied, to simply be content with that. And on this basis one turns compensated frustration into the end-all [terme] of analytic intervention.

I am going to go further, and I truly have, as you will see, my reasons for doing so today. I'm going to move on to the so-called "anal libido" stage. For it is concerning the latter that I think I can touch on and refute a certain number of confusions that are very often made in analytic interpretation.

3

245

What sort of demand is made in the anal stage?

I think you all have enough experience that I need not illustrate any further what I will call the demand to hold it, to hold in excrement, insofar as it no doubt founds something: the desire to evacuate. But it is not as simple as all that, for evacuation is also demanded [exigée] at a certain point by the educating parent. The subject is demanded to give something that satisfies the expectation of the educator, in this case, the mother.

What results from the complexity of this demand warrants that we dwell upon it, for it is essential. Let us note that it is no longer a question here of the simple relationship of a need to its demanded form, linked to surplus sexuality [excédent sexuel]. Something else is at work. It is a matter of disciplining need, and sexualization is produced only in the movement of a return to need. It is this movement which, so to speak, legitimates need as a gift to the mother, who expects the child to satisfy his functions and make something come out or appear that is worthy of everyone's approval.

The gift-like character excrement takes on has been well known and situated since the beginning of analytic practice. It is so clearly in the gift register that an object is experienced here that the child, in his occasional excesses, naturally uses it, one might say, as a means of expression. The excremental gift is part and parcel of psychoanalysis' oldest theme.

I would like, in this regard, to take as far as possible the extermination I am always trying to carry out of the myth of oblativity, by showing you what it is really related to here. The true field of oblativity is the field of the anal dialectic, and once you have perceived it, you will no longer be able to see it in any other way.

I have long been trying, in many different ways, to show you this road map. In particular, I mentioned to you that the very term "oblativity" is an obsessive fantasy. "Everything for the other person," the obsessive neurotic says, and this is indeed what he does, for being caught up in the perpetual giddiness [vertige] of destroying the other, he can never do enough to ensure that the other continue to exist. Here we see its root.

246

The anal stage is characterized by the fact that the subject satisfies a need only in order to satisfy the other. He has been taught to defer this need, so that it may be founded or instituted solely as an occasion for satisfying the other as educator. The satisfaction of playing the doting parent [pouponnage], which involves the wiping of tushies, is first and foremost the other's satisfaction. It is insofar as it is a gift that is demanded of the subject that one can say that oblativity is linked to the sphere of anal-stage relations.

Note the consequence thereof: the room that remains for the subject – in other words, desire – is symbolized in this situation by what is flushed away in the process. Desire, literally, goes down the tubes. The symbolization of the subject as that which disappears into the chamber pot or down the hole is encountered in our practice as related most profoundly to the nature [position] of anal desire.

This is what makes for both its attraction and also, in many cases, its avoidance. We are not always able to get the patient to see this. You can nevertheless tell yourself that, insofar as the anal stage is involved, you would be wrong not to distrust the relevance of your analysis if you have not encountered this on every occasion. As long as you have not located at this point the basic, fundamental relationship of the subject as desire with the most disagreeable object, I assure you that you will not have made great strides in the analysis of the conditions of desire.

This precise point is key. It is certainly as important, given the weight it has in analytic practice, as all the primitive oral objects, whether good or bad, that people comment on so much. You cannot deny that we are constantly being reminded of them in the analytic literature. If you have remained deaf [to this key point] for so long, it is because things are not indicated in the literature in their fundamental topology, as I am attempting to do for you here.

But then, you will ask me, what of sexuality and the infamous sadistic drive that, thanks to a dash, is conjugated to the term "anal," as if it were quite simply self-evident?

An effort is necessary here, an effort that we can call "understanding" only insofar as it involves a liminal understanding.
247 Sexuality can only come into the picture violently. This indeed is what happens, since it is sadistic violence that is involved. Yet it harbors within itself more than one enigma, and it makes sense for us to dwell on it.

It is in the anal relationship that the other as such becomes truly dominant. This is precisely why sexuality is manifested in the register characteristic of this stage. We can catch a glimpse of it by recalling its antecedent, which is qualified as oral-sadistic.

In effect, to speak of the oral-sadistic stage is, on the whole, to recall that, at its very foundations, life is devouring assimilation as such. In the oral stage, it is the theme of devouring that is situated in the bit of room [marge] occupied by desire; it is the presence of the gaping maw of life.

This fantasy is somehow reflected in the anal stage. The [imaginary] other, being posited as the second term, must appear as an existence offered up to this gap [béance]. Will we go so far as to say that suffering is implied therein? [If so] it is a very peculiar kind of suffering. To mention a sort of fundamental schema that will situate for you the structure of sadomasochistic fantasy as well as possible, I will say that what is involved is suffering that is expected [attendue] by the other. Suspending the imaginary other over a chasm [gouffre] of suffering forms the apex and axis of sadomasochistic eroticization. What is no longer merely the sexual pole, but what is going to be the sexual partner, is instituted at the anal level in this relationship. We can thus say that there is already a sort of reappearance of sexuality here.

What constitutes something like sadistic or sadomasochistic structure in the anal stage marks – starting from a maximal eclipsing of sexuality, from a point of pure anal oblativity – the re-ascension toward what will be achieved at the genital stage. The genital stage – human Eros, desire in its normal fullness, which is situated neither as tendency or need, nor as pure and simple copulation, but as desire – finds its outlines or beginnings and has its point of re-emergence in the relationship to an other who is subject to the expectation of this suspended threat, this virtual attack that characterizes and founds for us what is known as the sadistic theory of sexuality, whose primitive character we are aware of in the vast majority of individual cases.

Moreover, what is at the origin of the sexualization of the other is based on a situational trait: in the first mode of its apperception, the other as such must be delivered over to a third party in order to be constituted as sexual. This is the origin of the ambiguity owing 248 to which, in the original experience discovered by the most recent analytic theorists, sexuality remains indeterminate between this third party and the other. In the first form of libidinal apperception of the other, at the level of the point of re-ascension starting from a certain momentary eclipsing of the libido as such, the subject does not know what he desires most, the other or the intervening third party [i.e., the Other].

This is essential to the structure of any sadomasochistic fantasy. Indeed, if I have provided here a correct analysis of the anal stage, the stage that constitutes this fantasy, let us not forget that the witness who is subject to this pivotal point of the anal stage is what he is – as I just said, he is a piece of shit. And, moreover, he is a demand – he is a piece of shit that demands nothing more than to be evacuated.

This is the true foundation of the whole of a radical structure that you will encounter in the fundamental fantasy of the obsessive neurotic in particular. He devalues himself, and locates the whole game of the erotic dialectic outside of himself – he pretends, as the man said, to be its orchestrator. He bases the entirety of his fantasy on his own evacuation.

Things here are rooted in something which, once recognized, allows you to elucidate even the most banal points. Indeed, if things are truly fixated at the point of the subject's identification with little excremental a, what are we going to see? Let us not forget here, nevertheless, that the job of articulating this demand is no longer assigned, at least in theory, to the organ that is involved in the dramatic knotting of need with demand. In other words, one does not speak with one's derrière – except in Hieronymus Bosch's paintings. And yet we observe the curious phenomena of cuts followed by explosions, which allow us to glimpse the symbolic function of the excremental flow in the very articulation of people's speech.

A long time ago, and I think no one present today can remember it, there was a little character beloved by children, as there always have been – significant little characters in an infantile mythology that is, in reality, of parental origin. In our times, people talk a lot about Pinocchio, but at a time that I am old enough to remember there was Bout-de-Zan. The phenomenology of the child as a precious excremental object is altogether contained in this name, in 249 which the child is identified with the sweetish element of licorice, glukurriza, meaning "sweet root," which seems to be its Greek origin.

It is probably not insignificant that the word "licorice" provides us with one of the sweetest examples – that's the word for it! – of the utter ambiguity of signifying transcriptions.

Allow me this brief parenthetical remark. I came across this gem – which I found for you along the roadside of my trajectory – not just recently, by the way, as I have been saving this one for you for a long time. But since I came across it concerning Bout-de-Zan, I will give it to you now. "Réglisse" ["Licorice"] was originally "glukurriza." Naturally, it does not come directly from the Greek, but when Latin people heard it they turned it into "liquiritia," basing it on the word "liquor." This gave rise in old French to "licorice," and then "ricolice" by metathesis. "Ricolice" collided with "règle" [rule or ruler], regula, and that led to rygalisse. You have to admit that the encounter between "licorice" and "règle" is superb.

But that's not all, for the conscious etymology at which all of that ends up, and to which the most recent generations have confined their attention, is that "réglisse" should be written "rai de Galice" because licorice is made with a sweet root that is found only in Galicia. The rai de Galice is where we wind up after having started with the Greek root – in more ways than one!

I think that this little demonstration of signifying ambiguities will have convinced you that we're barking up the right tree.

In the final analysis, as we have seen, we must be reserved about understanding the other at the anal level even more so than elsewhere. Every understanding of his demand, in effect, implicates him so profoundly that we must look twice before broaching it [aller à sa rencontre]. What am I telling you, if not something that coincides with what you all know, at least those of you who have done a little bit of therapeutic work – namely, that one must not give the obsessive neurotic the slightest encouragement or absolution of guilt, or even give him any interpretive commentary that goes a bit too far. If you do, then you will have to go much further, and will wind up acceding – and yielding, much to your own detriment – to the precise mechanism by which he wants to make you eat, so to speak, his own being in the form of a piece of shit.

Your practice teaches you that this is not a process by which you 250 render him a signal service – quite the contrary.

It is elsewhere that symbolic introjection must be situated, insofar as it must restore in him the place of desire. Since – to get ahead of ourselves regarding the following stage – what the neurotic most commonly wants to be is the phallus, it is certainly to unduly short-circuit the satisfactions to be given him by offering him this phallic communion against which I have already formulated the most precise objections in my seminar on Desire and Its Interpretation [1958–9]. The phallic object as an imaginary object cannot, in any case, help completely reveal the fundamental fantasy. In fact it cannot help but respond to the neurotic's demand with what we might refer to approximately as an obliteration. Stated otherwise, it paves the way for the subject to forget a number of the most essential elements that played a part in his bumpy accession to the field of desire.

To pause for a moment at this point in the trajectory I have traced out today, I will say that if the neurotic is [constituted by] unconscious desire – in other words, repressed desire – it is above all insofar as his desire is eclipsed by a counterdemand; that the locus of the counterdemand is strictly speaking the same as the locus in which everything the outside world can add by way of a supplement to the construction of the superego – a certain way of satisfying this counterdemand – is placed and built up afterward; and that any premature mode of interpretation can be criticized inasmuch as it understands too quickly, and does not perceive that what it is most important to understand in the analysand's demand is what is beyond that demand. The space occupied by not understanding [la marge de l'incompréhension] is the space occupied by desire [la marge du désir]. It is to the extent that this is not perceived that an analysis ends prematurely and is, quite frankly, botched.

The catch is, of course, that by interpreting, you give the subject something speech can feed on, even the very book that is behind it. Speech nevertheless remains the locus of desire, even if you provide it in such a way that this locus is unrecognizable, I mean even if it still cannot be inhabited by the subject's desire.

Responding to the demand for food or to frustrated demand with a nourishing signifier, leaves elided the fact that, beyond all nourish-251 ing speech, what the subject truly needs is to signify metonymically, and this is situated at no point in such nourishing speech. Thus, every time you introduce metaphor – and you are probably obliged to do so – you remain on the very path that gives the symptom consistency. It is no doubt a more simplified symptom, but it is still a symptom, in relation, in any case, to the desire that must be brought out [dégager].

If the subject has this singular relationship to the object of desire, it is because he himself was initially an object of desire that became incarnate. Speech as the locus of desire is the Poros in which all resources reside. And desire, as Socrates originally taught us to articulate it, is above all lack of resources: aporia. This absolute aporia approaches sleeping speech, and gets herself knocked up with its object. What does this mean, if not that the object was [already] there, and that it was the object that was demanding to be brought to light?

Plato's metaphor of the metempsychosis of the wandering soul that hesitates before knowing where it is going to live, finds its medium, truth, and substance in the object of desire, which is there prior to its birth.

And when Socrates delivers a eulogy, épainei, of Agathon, he unwittingly does what he wants to do – namely, brings Alcibiades back to his soul – by bringing to life the object that is the object of his desire.

This object – which is the aim and end for each person, and undoubtedly limited because the whole lies beyond it – can only be conceptualized as beyond the end of each person.

March 15, 1961

XV

ORAL, ANAL, AND GENITAL

The jouissance of the praying mantis.
The Other, depository of desire.
Desire's dependence on demand.
The privilege of the phallus as an object.

We are going to wander, I have the urge to say, yet again through the labyrinth constituted by the nature [position] of desire. A certain returning to or rehashing of the topic – a certain working through,* as it's called – seems to me to be necessary for an exact positioning of the function of transference. I already indicated this last time and said why.

This is why I will return to it today in order to emphasize the meaning of what I said to you in re-examining the so-called stages of the migration of the libido to the erogenous zones. It is important to see to what extent the naturalist view implied by this definition can be articulated and resolved in our way of enunciating it, which centers it on the relationship between demand and desire.

1

Right at the outset of my discussion of them, I pointed out that there is a place for desire in the margins of demand as such; that it is these margins of demand that constitute desire's locus in a beyond and shy of, a twofold hollow that is already sketched out as soon as the cry of hunger gets articulated; and that, at the other extreme, the object known in English as the "nipple," the tip of the breast, ends up taking on its value as ágalma, marvel, and precious object in human eroticism, becoming the medium [support] of the pleasure and sensual delight of nibbling, in which what we might call a sublimated voracity is perpetuated, insofar as it takes this Lust, this pleasure.

254 Moreover, these Lüste, these desires – you are aware of the equivocation contained within the German term, the slippage of signification produced by the shift from the singular to the plural – the pleasure and covetousness the oral object brings with it stems from something else. It is in this respect, through a reversal in the use of the term "sublimation," that I am justified in saying that we see here a deviation in aim occurring in a way that does not happen when it comes to the object of need.

Indeed, the erotic value of this privileged object does not draw its substance here from primal hunger. The Eros that inhabits it comes Nachträglich, retroactively, only after the fact [après coup]. The place for this desire is prepared [creusée] in oral demand. Were there no demand, with love as the beyond [l'au-delà d'amour] it projects, there would be no place for desire shy of it, which is constituted around a privileged object. The oral stage of sexual libido requires the existence of a place that is hollowed out [creusée] by demand.

It is important to examine whether or not this presentation of things does not involve, through my own doing, some specification that one might consider overly biased. Mustn't we take Freud literally when he presents us, in one of his statements, with the pure and simple migration of an organic – or, might I say, mucosa-based – erogeneity? Couldn't one say that I am neglecting natural facts? Namely, for example, the instinctive devouring motions we find in nature that are related to the sexual cycle.

It is a fact that female cats [sometimes] eat their kittens, and if the great fantasmatic figure of the praying mantis haunts the analytic classroom, it is precisely because it presents a sort of main [mère] image or model of the function attributed to what people so brazenly, and perhaps so incorrectly, call the castrating mother. Yes, of course, in my own initiation to analysis, I willingly relied on this rich image, which echoes in the natural realm what presents itself in unconscious phenomena. By presenting this objection, you could suggest to me the need for an adjustment in the theoretical line with which I think I can satisfy you along with me.

I have spent some time dwelling on this image and what it represents. A simple glance at the diversity of animal ethology shows us, in effect, a rich variety of perversions. My friend Henri Ey looked at it closely, and even devoted an issue of L'Evolution psychiatrique 255 to the topic of animal perversions, which go further than anything human imagination has been able to invent. Taken in this sense, aren't we simply brought back to the Aristotelian view that situates the foundation of perverse desire in a realm lying outside of the human realm?

I will ask you to dwell on this for a moment and to consider what we do when we go no further than the fantasy of natural perversion. In asking you to follow me on this ground, I am not underestimating the extent to which such reflection may seem persnickety and speculative, but I think that it is necessary to isolate both what is founded and what is unfounded in this reference [to animals]. As you will immediately see, we will thereby meet up with what I designate as fundamental in subjectivization, as an essential moment of every instating of the dialectic of desire.

To subjectivize the praying mantis in this case is to make an assumption which is not excessive – that it has sexual jouissance. We, of course, know nothing about it. The praying mantis is perhaps, as Descartes would not have hesitated to say, a pure and simple machine, in the sense that machines take on in his terminology, which presupposes the elimination of all subjectivity. But we ourselves have no need to remain at the stage of minimalist positions. We can grant her this jouissance.

Is this jouissance – here is the following step – jouissance of something insofar as this jouissance [elle] destroys it? For it can indicate nature's intentions to us only on this basis.

To immediately point out what is essential, so that it may serve us as some kind of model of what is at issue – namely, our oral cannibalism and our primordial eroticism – we must imagine here that this jouissance is correlated with the decapitation of the partner that the praying mantis is supposed to know [connaître] to some degree as such.

I have no aversion to going this far. For, in fact, animal ethology is our major reference insofar as it maintains the dimension of knowing [connaître] that all progress in knowledge [connaissance] renders so vacillating for us in the human world because it is identified with the dimension of misrecognition [méconnaître] or Verkennung, as Freud says. It is the field of living beings that allows one to observe imaginary Erkennung [recognition], and the privileged status of a species' fellow beings [semblable] which goes so far, in certain cases, as to lead to organogenic effects. I won't go back over the old examples around which my exploration of the 256 imaginary revolved at the time at which I began to articulate something, my doctrine of analysis, which has been coming to fruition over the years before your eyes – namely, the female pigeon that does not fully develop into a female pigeon until she sees a pigeon-like image, a small mirror placed in her cage sufficing to produce this effect, and also the migratory locust that does not go beyond a certain stage [i.e., solitary] unless it encounters another migratory locust.

There is no doubt but that what fascinates not only us, but also the male praying mantis, is her standing-erect posture, a posture that looks to us like that of prayer, from which the praying mantis derives its name, not without finding some kind of vacillating echo [retour] in us. We observe that it is when the male is face-to-face with this fantasy – this incarnated fantasy – that he yields and is taken, called, aspirated, and captivated in an embrace that will be fatal to him.

It is clear that an image of the imaginary other as such is present in this phenomenon, and it is not excessive to assume that something is revealed therein. But does this mean that it already somehow prefigures an inverted replica of what presents itself in man as a sort of remainder and repercussion of a definite possibility, of the variations or play of natural tendencies?

While we may value this monstrous example, we must nevertheless note its divergence from what presents itself in human fantasy. In the latter, we can with certainty start with the subject, the only thing we are sure of, insofar as he is the prop [support] of the signifying chain. We thus cannot fail to remark that in what nature presents us with here, there is – from the [sexual] act to its excess, to what overflows it, to what leads it to a devouring surplus – something that signals to us that another structure, an instinctual structure, is being exemplified. The signal is that synchrony is involved. It is at the very moment of the [sexual] act that this complement [i.e., devouring] comes into play, exemplifying for us the paradoxical nature [forme] of instinct.

Isn't a limit thus sketched out here that allows us to strictly define in what sense the example of the praying mantis can be useful to us? This example serves only to provide the form of what we mean when we speak of a desire.

257 If we speak of the jouissance of the praying mantis as an other, if the praying mantis interests us in this case, it is because she either gets off [jouit] where the male's organ is, or she gets off elsewhere as well. But wherever she gets off – something we'll never know anything about, but so what? – the fact that she may get off elsewhere only takes on meaning on the basis of the fact that she gets off (or does not get off, it makes no difference) there. The fact that she may get off wherever she likes has no meaning – for the value taken on by this image – except in relation to a there of a virtual getting off. Whatever is at work, synchrony implies that it will never be anything but copulatory jouissance, even if it is indirect.

We can easily find, in the infinite natural variety of instinctual mechanisms, evocative forms, including, for example, those in which the copulatory organ is lost in loco, during consummation itself. We can just as easily consider devouring to be one of the many forms of the primacy given to the individual female partner in copulation – as organized in accordance with its specific end – to constrain her to engage in an act that must be allowed to occur. The exemplary character of the image we are presented with thus only begins at the exact point to which we have no right to go.

Let me explain this. The female praying mantis devours the cephalic extremity of her male partner with her mandibles. Now, this part of her anatomy shares as such the property that constitutes, in living nature, the cephalic extremity – namely, a certain uniting of the individual tendency, and the possibility, in whatever register it is exercised, of discernment and choice. Otherwise stated, this leads us to believe that the praying mantis prefers it [ça], her partner's head, to anything else. We see here an absolute preference. That [ça] is what she loves.

It is insofar as she loves that [ça] – which looks to us like jouissance at the other's expense – that we begin to read into natural functions what is at stake: namely, moral meaning. In other words, we enter into the Sadean dialectic.

To prefer jouissance to the other turns out to be the essential dimension of nature, but it is only too plain to see that we are the ones who supply this moral meaning. We only supply it to the extent that we discover the meaning of desire as a relation to the partial 258 object in the other, and as a choice of that object.

Let us pay closer attention here. Can this example altogether validly illustrate for us the preference for the part over the whole, a judgment that can be illustrated by the erotic value given to the nipple I mentioned earlier? I'm not so sure. In the case of the praying mantis, it is less the part that is preferred to the whole – in the most horrible way, and in a way that would already allow us to short-circuit the function of metonymy – than the whole that is preferred to the part.

Indeed, let us not overlook the fact that, even in an animal structure as apparently far removed from us as that of the insect, the value of concentration, reflection, and totality somehow represented by the cephalic extremity assuredly functions. In any case, in fantasy, in the image that captivates us, the partner's acephalization appears with a particular emphasis. To go as far as we can, let us not overlook the fable [fabulatoire] value of the praying mantis, underlying what it represents in a certain mythology, or more simply in a kind of folklore, in everything Roger Caillois has highlighted in the register of Myth and Man. It was his first book, and it seems that he did not sufficiently indicate that, at this level, it is a matter of poetry. This image does not simply derive its savor from a reference to the relation with the oral object such as it is traced out in the koine or common language of the unconscious. It involves a more accentuated feature, which designates for us a certain link between acephalia and the telos of the transmission of life, between acephalia and the handing of the torch from one individual to another in a signified eternity of the species – namely, that Gelüst [sexual desire or craving] does not involve the head [ne passe pas par la tête].

This is what gives tragic meaning to the image of the praying mantis, which has nothing to do with preference for the so-called oral object, which in human fantasy is never, on any occasion, related to the head.

Something altogether different is at work in the link between human desire and the oral stage.

259

2

What can be glimpsed by way of a mutual identification between the subject and the object of oral desire goes toward a constitutive fragmentation [morcellement], as psychoanalytic practice immediately shows us.

During our recent convention in the provinces, these fragmenting images were said to be related to some kind of primitive terror that seemed, though I don't know why, to take on some kind of value as a worrisome designation for certain speakers, whereas it is clearly the most fundamental, widespread, and common fantasy, at the origin of all of man's relations with his soma. The panoply of anatomical morsels that fill Carpaccio's famous Saint George and the Dragon – hanging in the little church known as Saint Mary of the Angels in Venice – have appeared in everyone's dreams, whether they've been in analysis or not. And in the same register, the head that goes about all by itself, as in Cazotte's work, has no trouble telling its little stories.

But that is not what is important.

The discovery made by psychoanalysis is that the subject does not merely encounter images of his own fragmentation in the Other's field, but already, and right from the outset, encounters objects of the Other's desire – namely, the mother's objects, not simply in a state of fragmentation, but with the privileged status granted them by the mother's desire. In particular, as Melanie Klein tells us, one of these objects, the paternal phallus, is encountered right from the subject's first fantasies, and it is at the origin of the fandum, "it is going to speak, it must speak." The paternal phallus is perceived – in the internal realm of the mother's body, into which the first imaginary formations are projected – as something that is distinguished as very highly accentuated or even dangerous.

In the field of the Other's desire, the subjective object already encounters identifiable occupants, against whose yardstick he must already be measured, against whom he must already be weighed. I am thinking of the little weights of various shapes that are used by primitive African tribes, where you see little twisted-up animals, or even clearly phalloform objects.

At the fantasmatic level, the privilege of the image of the praying 260 mantis derives solely from the fact – which is not, after all, all that well assured – that the praying mantis is supposed to eat a whole series of males, one after another. The shift to the plural is the essential dimension in which the praying mantis takes on fantasmatic value for us.

We have thus defined the oral stage. It is only within demand that the Other is constituted as a reflection of the subject's hunger. The Other is thus not merely hunger, but articulated hunger – hunger that demands. And the subject is thereby open to becoming an object, but the object of a hunger that he chooses, as it were.

The transition from hunger to eroticism is made by means of what I was earlier calling a preference. She likes something especially – that – out of gluttony for special treats [d'une gourmandise], so to speak. Thus we find ourselves back in the register of original sins. The subject places himself on the à la carte menu of cannibalism, which everyone knows is never absent from any communional fantasy.

Read on this score a treatise by an author I have spoken to you about over the years with a sort of periodic insistence, Baltasar Gracián. Obviously, only those of you who know Spanish can find it fully satisfying, unless you have it translated for you. For, although Gracián was translated very early on, as works were translated almost instantaneously in all of Europe at that time, several of his books have remained untranslated. I am referring here to his treatise on communion, El Comulgatorio, which is a fine text in the sense that something rarely avowed is revealed therein: the delights of consuming Christ's body are detailed in it and we are asked to dwell upon this exquisite cheek, this delicious arm – I will spare you all the other tidbits on which spiritual concupiscence dwells, thus revealing to us what is always implied in even the most elaborate forms of oral identification. You see here the earliest tendency being deployed by virtue of the signifier, in a whole field that is already created in order to be secondarily inhabited.

In opposition to this, I tried to show you last time a meaning of anal demand that is hardly ever or only poorly articulated.

Anal demand is characterized by a complete reversal of initiative, to the Other's advantage. It is there (in other words, at a stage which, in our normative ideology, is neither very advanced nor 261 mature) that lies the source of the discipline – I did not say "duty," but "discipline" – of toilet training [propreté], a word whose association with propriety the French language so prettily indicates, with what is proper to it: education and good manners. Here the demand is external, it comes from the Other, and it is posited as articulated as such.

The strange thing is that we must see here – and recognize in what has always been said and whose import no one seems to have truly grasped – the point at which the object as a gift is born. In this metaphor, what the subject can give is precisely correlated with what he can withhold – namely, his own scrap, his excrement. It is impossible not to see something exemplary here, which must indispensably be designated as the radical point at which the projection of the subject's desire onto the Other occurs.

There is a point in this stage at which desire is articulated and constituted, at which the Other is, strictly speaking, its depository. Furthermore, we are not surprised to see that idealists, enamored of the theme of a hominization of the cosmos or, as they are forced to express themselves in our times, of the planet, neglect that one of the manifest stages, since the beginning of time, of the hominization of the planet is that the human animal turns the planet into a garbage dump. The oldest evidence that we have of human agglomerations are enormous piles of shell debris which go by a Scandinavian name [Kjökkenmödding].

This is no accident. Moreover, if we are to some day reconstruct how man entered into the field of signifiers, we would have to designate it in those first piles.

The subject designates himself here in the evacuated object. It is, so to speak, the starting point of an aphanisis of desire. It is entirely based upon the effect of the Other's demand – the Other makes the decision. The root of the neurotic's dependence clearly lies here. This is the tangible note by which the neurotic's desire is characterized as pregenital. It depends so much on the Other's demand that what the neurotic demands of the Other in his neurotic demand for love, is that he be allowed to do something.

The place of desire manifestly remains, up until a certain degree, dependent upon the Other's demand.

3

262

What meaning can we, in effect, give to the genital stage? The only meaning that we can give it is the following.

Desire should someday reappear as something that could rightfully be called natural desire, but, given its noble antecedents, it can never be such. In other words, desire should appear as what is not demanded, as aiming at what one does not demand.

Don't rush ahead and conclude, for example, that desire is what one takes. Whatever you say will never do anything more than make you fall back into the petty mechanics of demand.

Natural desire has the characteristic of not being able to be spoken in any way whatsoever, which is why you will never have any natural desire. The Other with a capital O – that is, the Other in which signs are situated – is already instated in that spot [place]. And signs suffice to institute the question "Che vuoi?" to which the subject has at first no response.

A sign represents something to someone and, as the subject does not know what the sign represents, faced with this question when sexual desire appears, he loses the someone to whom desire is addressed – in other words, himself. Thus is born little Hans' anxiety.

Here we glimpse what, prepared by the subject's fracturing owing to demand, is instated in the mother/child relationship, which we are going to keep – as it often remains – separate for a moment.

Little Hans' mother, and every other mother as well – "I call upon all mothers," as someone once said – defines her position by proffering the words, "That's terribly dirty," concerning what begins to arise in Hans by way of a little quivering or unambiguous stirring during the first awakenings of genital sexuality. That desire – he cannot even say what it is – is disgusting. But her words are strictly correlated with a no less recognizable interest in the object to which we have learned to give its full import – namely, the phallus.

In an undoubtedly allusive, but not ambiguous way, how many mothers, [if not] all mothers, faced with little Hans' or some other boy's little faucet, or whatever they call it, come out with remarks like, "My little boy is very well endowed" or "You will have 263 many children"? In short, the appraisal of the object – the object clearly remaining partial at this stage – still contrasts here with the refusal of desire, at the very moment of the encounter with what solicits the subject in the mystery of desire. The division is instituted between, on the one hand, the object that becomes the mark of special interest – which becomes ágalma, the pearl at the heart of the individual that trembles here around the pivotal point of his accession to living plenitude – and, on the other hand, a debasement of the subject. He is esteemed as an object, but disparaged as desire.

It is around this that tallies will be made [vont jouer les comptes] and that the instating of the register of having revolves. It is worth our while dwelling upon this and I will go into greater detail here.

I have been announcing the theme of having to you for a long time with formulations such as, "Love is giving what you don't have." Of course, when a child gives what he has, it's at the preceding stage [i.e., the anal stage]. What doesn't he have, and in what sense? One can, certainly, make the dialectic of being and having revolve around the phallus. But it is not from that angle that you must look in order to understand things correctly.

What is the new dimension that is introduced by entry into the phallic drama? What he doesn't have at his disposal at the moment of the birth and revelation of genital desire is nothing other than the (sexual) act [son acte]. He has nothing but a promissory note. He institutes this act at the level of a project.

I beg you to notice here the power of linguistic determinations. Just as desire has, in many Romance languages, taken on the connotation of desiderium – of mourning and regret [for something lost] – it is not inconsequential that the early forms of the future tense were abandoned in favor of a reference to having. Je chanterai (I will sing) is exactly what you see written here: Je chanter-ai (I have to sing). This in fact comes from cantare habeo. The decadent Roman tongue found the surest path to rediscovering the true meaning of the future: Je baiserai plus tard, J'ai le baiser à l'état de traite sur l'avenir, Je désirerai [I'll fuck later, I have fucking in the form of an IOU, I will desire]. And this habeo introduces us to the debeo of the symbolic debt, to a revoked [destitué] habeo. This debt is conjugated in the future tense, when it takes the form of a commandment: Tes père et mère honoreras [Thou shalt honor thy father and thy mother], and so on.

Today I want to detain you to make a final point, at the mere threshold of what results from this articulation, which is no doubt slow, but which is precisely designed so that you do not get ahead of yourselves.

264 The object in question – the phallic object – separated from desire, is not the simple specification, homologue, or homonym of the little imaginary a to which the full Other is debased. It is not the specifying, which finally comes to light, of what had earlier been the oral object and then the anal object. As I mentioned earlier today, when I pointed out to you the subject's first encounter with the phallus, the phallus is a privileged object in the field of the Other, an object that is subtracted from the status of the Other with a capital O as such.

In other words, at the level of genital desire in the castration stage – to the precise articulation of which all of this is designed to introduce you – little a is the Other minus phi [$a = A - \varphi$]. In this sense, phi comes to symbolize what the Other is missing because it is the noetic A, the full-fledged A, the Other insofar as one can have faith in its response to demand. The desire of this noetic Other is an enigma. This enigma is knotted to the structural foundation of its castration.

It is here that the whole dialectic of castration begins.

Be careful now not to confuse this phallic object with the sign of the Other's lack of response [manque de réponse]. The lack at stake here [i.e., the lack related to the phallic object] is the lack constituted by the Other's desire [le manque du désir de l'Autre]. The function taken on by the phallus – insofar as it is encountered in the field of the imaginary – is not that of being identical to the Other as designated by the lack of a signifier, it is that of being the root of this lack. For it is the Other who is constituted in a relation to this object phi, which is certainly a privileged relation, but a complex one.

It is here that we will find the crux of what constitutes the dead end and problem of love – namely, that the subject can only satisfy the Other's demand by demeaning the Other, turning this Other into the object of his desire.

March 22, 1961

265

XVI

PSYCHE AND THE CASTRATION COMPLEX

Zucchi and Apuleius.
The tribulations of the soul.
The castration complex as a paradox.
The signifierness of the phallus.
The analyst's desire.

It is not because we are apparently fooling around with respect to your central concern that we do not find it anew at the extreme periphery. I happened to find it at the Borghese Gallery in Rome, almost without realizing it, in the most unexpected of places.

Experience has taught me to always look at what is near an elevator, as it is often significant and people never look there. This experience is altogether applicable to a museum and, applied to the museum in the Borghese Gallery, made me turn at the moment I left the elevator, thanks to which I saw something people never really pause to look at, and about which I have never heard anyone speak – a canvas by a painter by the name of Zucchi.

He is not a very well-known artist, although he has not entirely escaped the critics' notice. He is what is referred to as a Mannerist, from the first period of Mannerism, and he lived from approximately 1547 to 1590.

The painting I saw is called Psiche sorprende Amore, the latter being no other than Cupid [Eros]. It is the classic scene of Psyche casting light from her little lamp onto Cupid, who has for some time been her nocturnal lover and whom she has never seen.

You probably know a little something about this drama. Psyche, who is favored by an extraordinary love, for she is loved by Cupid himself, experiences happiness that could be perfect if she didn't become curious to see who Cupid is. It's not as if Psyche had never 266 been warned by her lover not to try to cast light upon him, though he is unable to tell her what sanction would result therefrom, but his insistence on remaining invisible is extreme. Nevertheless, Psyche cannot do otherwise than succumb [to her curiosity], and it is at this moment that her misfortunes begin.

I can't recount all of them to you. First I want to show you what is involved, as this is what is important in my discovery. I was able to secure two reproductions of this canvas, and I am going to pass them around the room. I am adding to them a sketch made by a painter whose style will be recognized, I hope, even by those who do not know my family connections. Given his desire to oblige me, he was willing to prepare this little sketch for you this very morning, which will allow me to indicate what is at stake in my demonstration.

You see that the sketch by André Masson corresponds, in its main outlines at least, to what I am now passing around the room.

Let me mention that the tone of my voice today can be explained by the fact that I felt a need to go to the place on the Palatine Hill that, about 50 years ago, Commander Boni thought he could identify with what Latin authors call mundus. I managed to go down into it, but I'm afraid it's nothing but a cistern, and I managed to catch a sore throat down there.

1

I don't know if you have ever seen the story of Cupid and Psyche portrayed in this way, even though it has been treated in countless ways in both sculpture and painting. I personally had never seen Psyche appear in a work of art armed as she is in this painting, with what is represented here very clearly as a small blade: a scimitar.

Moreover, you will notice what is significantly projected here in the form of a flower, the bouquet of which it is a part, and the vase in which it is inserted. You will see that, in a very intense and accentuated way, this flower is, strictly speaking, the visual, intellectual center of the painting. This bouquet and this flower are, in effect, in the foreground, and they are backlit, in other words, they form a black mass, which is treated in a way that gives the painting its Mannerist flavor. 267
The whole scene is drawn in an extremely refined way.

There are certainly things we could say about the specific flowers that are included in the bouquet. But around this bouquet, coming from behind it, shines an intense light cast on the extended thighs and stomach of the figure who symbolizes Cupid. It is truly impossible not to see designated here – in the most precise way and as if it were being directly pointed to – the organ that, anatomically speaking, must be dissimulated behind this mass of flowers: Cupid's phallus.

This can be seen in the very manner of the painting, accentuated in such a way that there is nothing in what I am telling you that is in any sense an analytic interpretation. The thread that links the threat of the blade with what is designated to us here cannot fail to come to mind.

This is worth emphasizing, as it is not frequent in art. Many representations of Judith and Holofernes have been made, but that is not what is involved here, since they concern beheading. Nevertheless, the position of Psyche's other arm, which is extended and holds the lamp, is designed to remind us of the paintings of Judith and Holofernes, for the lamp is suspended here above Cupid's head.

You know that in the story it is a drop of oil – spilt owing to an abrupt movement on Psyche's part, as she is quite startled – which wakes up Cupid, inflicting, moreover, so the story tells us, a wound from which he suffers for a long time. If you look closely, you will notice that in the reproduction you have before you, there is something like a shaft of light which runs from the lamp and goes straight toward Cupid's shoulder. Nevertheless, the angle of this shaft does not allow us to believe that it is a drop of oil, but rather a ray of light.

Certain people will think that there is something quite remarkable here, which represents an innovation on the part of the artist, and thus an intention that we can unambiguously attribute to him – that 268 of representing the threat of castration in an amorous context. Were we to try to interpret things in this direction, I think that we would quickly have to retrace our steps.

We would quickly have to retrace our steps because – I haven't yet indicated this fact to you, but I hope it already occurred to some of you – this story, despite the success it has had in the history of art, is told to us by but a single text, which is The Golden Ass by Apuleius.

I hope, for the sake of your own pleasure, that you have read The Golden Ass. It is an inspiring text, I must say. If certain truths or esoteric secrets are, as has always been said, included in the book, in a mythical and colorful form, they are packaged in the most shimmering – not to say tickling and titillating – of ways. At first glance, it is truly something that has not yet been superseded, not even by the most recent productions which have, over the last few years in France, been a treat for us in the most blatant erotic genre, with all the nuances of sadomasochism that are the most common fodder of erotic novels.

The Golden Ass tells the horrible story of a young girl's abduction, accompanied by the most terrifying threats to which the girl is exposed in the company of the ass, he who speaks in the first person in this novel. It is during an intermezzo included in this rather racy adventure that an old lady, in order to entertain the kidnapped girl for a moment, tells her at length the story of Cupid and Psyche.

Now it is due to the perfidious influence of Psyche's sisters – who constantly prod her to fall into the trap, to break the promises she has made to her divine lover – that she succumbs. The final means employed by her sisters are to suggest to her that Cupid must be a horrible monster or the most hideous of serpents, and that she must certainly be exposing herself to some serious danger by being with him. Following this, the mental short circuit occurs: she recalls the extremely insistent prohibitions imposed upon her by her nocturnal interlocutor in recommending that she in no case contravene his very severe prohibition not to try to see him, and she perceives only too clearly how his words intersect with what is suggested by her sisters. It is at this point that she takes the fatal step.

Prior to doing so, given what her sisters have suggested to her – in other words, what she thinks she will find – she arms herself. Which is why, despite the fact that the history of art gives us no other evi- 269 dence of this, to the best of my knowledge – I would appreciate it if someone, incited by my remarks here, could provide me with proof to the contrary – Psyche is represented as armed at this significant moment. It is clearly from Apuleius' text that the Mannerist in question, Zucchi, borrowed what constitutes the originality of the scene.

What does this imply? At the era at which Zucchi depicted this scene, the tale of Psyche and Cupid was widely known, and for all sorts of reasons. While it is attested to in but one literary text, it is attested to in many works in the plastic and figurative arts. I have heard, for example, that the sculpture group which is at the Uffizi in Florence represents a Cupid with a Psyche, but there both have wings. You will observe that in Zucchi's canvas, while Cupid has wings, Psyche does not.

Psyche is depicted with the wings of a butterfly [when she is depicted with wings]. I possess some Alexandrine objects in which Psyche is represented in several forms, frequently endowed with butterfly wings, which are, in this case, a sign of the immortality of the soul. You are aware of the stages of metamorphosis that the butterfly undergoes: it is born at first as a caterpillar or larva, then wraps itself in a sort of tomb or sarcophagus, in a way that reminds us of mummies, and stays in there until such time as it reappears in a glorified form. The theme of the butterfly as signifying the immortality of the soul had already appeared in Antiquity, and not simply in variously peripheral religions. It was even utilized in the Christian religion to symbolize the immortality of the soul, and it still is. It is very difficult to deny that what is at stake in the story is what one might call the trials and tribulations of the soul.

Only one mythological text transmitted this tale in Antiquity, that by Apuleius. Authors variously emphasize its religious and spiritual meanings, and willingly opine that we have in Apuleius' work but a degraded, Romanesque form, which does not allow us to grasp the original import of the myth. Despite their allegations, I, on the contrary, believe that Apuleius' text is extremely rich.

What is represented here by the painter is merely the beginning of the story. At a still earlier stage, we have what one might call Psyche's happiness, but also a first trial: Psyche is considered at the 270 outset to be as beautiful as Venus, and it is owing to a first persecution by the gods that she finds herself exposed on the peak of a rocky crag – another form of the myth of Andromeda – to a monster who was supposed to seize her. The monster turns out in fact to be Cupid, to whom Venus gave the task of delivering Psyche into the hands of he whose victim she was supposed to be. Cupid, who is slated to execute his mother's [Venus'] cruel orders, is seduced by Psyche, kidnaps her, and hides her in a deeply secluded place, in which she experiences, in short, the happiness of the gods.

The story would end there were poor Psyche not of a different nature than the divine nature, and did not prove to have the most deplorable weaknesses, among them family feeling: she spares no pains and never tires until she has obtained from Cupid, her unknown husband, permission to see her sisters again, and the entire remainder of the story stems from that. There is thus, before the moment represented in this little masterpiece, a brief earlier moment, but the whole tale unfolds afterward. I am not going to tell you the whole story, as that would get us off on a tangent.

This story is recounted, moreover, on the ceiling and walls of the charming Palazzo Farnese, having been painted by the brush of none other than Raphael himself. The scenes there are pleasant, almost too pleasant. We are no longer equal to the task of bearing such prettiness. It seems that what must have appeared as surprising beauty the first time the style sprang from Raphael's wonderful brush, has since become degraded for us. In truth, one must always keep in mind that a certain prototype or form must make, at the moment of its first appearance, an impression that is completely different from what it makes after having been, not simply reproduced thousands of times, but imitated thousands of times. In short, Raphael's paintings at Farnese sketch out for us the further development, scrupulously based on Apuleius' text, of Psyche's tribulations.

So that you will have no doubt that Psyche is not a woman, but rather the soul, suffice it to say that she appeals to Demeter, complete [as depicted in the Palazzo Farnese] with all the instruments and weapons of her mysteries, for it is clearly initiation into the Eleusinian Mysteries that is involved here. She is rebuffed by Demeter because the latter wants above all not to anger her sister-in-law, Venus. What happens is as follows: having fallen – having made at the outset a faux pas of which she is not even guilty, for Venus' jealousy derives merely from the fact that she considers 271 Psyche as a rival – the unfortunate soul finds herself buffeted about, rebuffed by all sources of succor, even religious succor. One could thus establish a whole detailed phenomenology of the unhappy soul, compared with the consciousness qualified by the same adjective.

Let us make no mistake about it: couples are not the theme of this very pretty story of Psyche. The tale is not about relations between men and women – it suffices to be able to read to see what is truly hidden merely by being presented in the foreground and as overly obvious, as in [Edgar Allan Poe's] "The Purloined Letter" – it is about nothing other than the relations between the soul and desire.

It is in this respect that we can say, without forcing things, that to us the extremely detailed composition of this canvas gives – in an exemplary fashion, through the intensity of the isolated image produced here – a tangible character to what a structural analysis of the myth of Apuleius could be, an analysis that remains to be carried out.

I have said enough to you about what the structural analysis of a myth is, for you to at least know that it exists. Since Claude Lévi-Strauss analyzes a certain number of North American myths, I don't see why one would not devote oneself to the same kind of analysis concerning Apuleius' fable. We are, strangely enough, not as well-served in matters closer to us than in others, which seem to us further removed as to their sources.

We have but one version of this myth, Apuleius' version. But it does not seem impossible to work in a way that allows us to bring out a certain number of significant pairs of oppositions. Yet without Zucchi's help, we would perhaps run the risk of overlooking the truly primordial and primal nature of this moment in the tale of Psyche.

It is, nevertheless, the best-known moment: everyone knows that Cupid flees and disappears because little Psyche was too curious and, on top of that, disobedient. This is what, in our collective memory, has remained of the meaning of the myth. But something is hidden behind that and, if we are to believe what is revealed to us here by the painter's intuition, it is no other than the decisive moment that he painted.

This is certainly not the first time that such a moment appears in an ancient myth. But its emphasis, crucial character, and pivotal function had to wait many long centuries before being situated at 272 the center of the psyche by Freud.

2

Having made this find, it didn't seem to me to be useless to talk with you about it, because the tiny image that will remain engraved in your minds – due to the very fact that I am spending time on it this morning – turns out to illustrate what I can designate today only as the point at which the whole instinctual dynamic converges, insofar as I have taught you to consider its register to be marked by the workings of the signifier.

This is what allows me to highlight how the castration complex must be articulated at this level. It can only be fully articulated if we consider the instinctual dynamic that is going to be structured by the mark of the signifier. At the same time, the image's value lies in showing us that there is a superimposing or superimposition, a common center, in the vertical sense, between the soul and the point of production of the castration complex with which I left you last time. We are now going to pursue this topic further.

I took up the theme of desire and demand in chronological order, but I underscored for you at every moment the divergence, splitting,* or difference between desire and demand that marks all of the initial stages of libidinal evolution. I showed you that it is determined by Nachträglich – retroactive – action, starting at a certain point where the paradox of desire and demand appears with minimal clatter [éclat], which is the genital stage – insofar as we should, it seems, be able to distinguish between desire and demand at that point at least.

Demand and desire bear the mark there of division and shattering [éclatement], which still poses a problem for analysts, if you read their work – a question or enigma that is more often avoided than resolved and that goes by the name of the castration complex.

Thanks to this painting, you must see that the castration complex is, in its structure and instinctual dynamic, centered in such a way that it coincides exactly with what we might call the point at which the soul is born.

273 If this myth has any meaning, it is indeed that Psyche only truly becomes Psyche – in other words, not simply someone endowed with an extraordinary initial gift which makes her the equal of Venus, or with a veiled and unknown favor which offers her infinite and unfathomable happiness, but the subject of a pathos which is, strictly speaking, that of the soul – at the moment at which the desire that fulfilled her slips away and takes flight. Psyche's adventures begin at that very moment.

Venus, as I once told you, is born every day, and as Plato's myth tells us, owing to this very fact Cupid is thus also conceived every day. But the birth of the soul is, in both the universal and the particular, for all of us and for each of us, an historic moment. It is from this moment on that the dramatic story with which we are faced unfolds in all its consequences.

One could, in the end, say that Freud went straight to this point. In closing, he stated that there is a final endpoint – this is articulated in "Analysis, Terminable and Interminable" – at which we arrive when we manage to eliminate in the subject every avenue for the resurgence or reviving of unconscious repetition, when we manage to make the latter converge with the bedrock – the term is in Freud's text – of the castration complex [SE XXIII, p. 252].

The castration complex is at work in men and in women – the term Penisneid [penis envy] is, in his text, one of the names of the castration complex. It is around this castration complex, and, so to speak, in starting anew on the basis of it, that we must put to the test once more everything that has, in a certain way, been discovered on the basis of this brick wall. Whether it is a matter of emphasizing the decisive and primordial effect of what pertains to knowledge's entreaties [instances du savoir], or a matter of operationalizing [mise en fonction] what is called the aggressiveness of primordial sadism or what has been articulated in the different possible views concerning the object – running the gamut from its decomposition [into partial objects] and its deepening, to the development of the notion of good and bad primordial objects – all of this can be resituated in an appropriate perspective only if we grasp where the divergence began. It began with this to some extent unsustainably paradoxical point: the castration complex.

The image that I am taking the time to show you today has the 274 benefit of incarnating what I mean by speaking of the castration complex as a paradox. Indeed, up until now, in the different stages we have studied, a divergence was present that was motivated by the distinction and discordance between what constitutes the object of demand – whether it be the subject's demand at the oral stage, or the Other's demand at the anal stage – and what, in the Other, is situated in the place of desire. This is what is masked and veiled to a certain degree in Psyche's case, although it is secretly perceived by the archaic, infantile subject. Now, would it not seem that, in what one might sweepingly call the third stage, and which is commonly known as the genital stage, the conjunction of desire – insofar as it can be involved in any of the subject's demands – must find its surety or carbon copy in the Other's desire?

If there is a point at which desire presents itself as desire, it is certainly at the point at which Freud's first accentuation was precisely made to situate it for us – in other words, at the level of sexual desire, revealed in its real consistency, and no longer in a contaminated, displaced, condensed, or metaphorical fashion. Here we are no longer dealing with the sexualization of some other function, but with the sexual function itself.

To help you gauge the paradox in question, I was looking for something to point to this morning with which to exemplify the awkwardness of analysts when it comes to the phenomenology of the genital stage, and I stumbled upon an article by René de Monchy devoted to the castration complex in the International Journal of Psychoanalysis.

What is an analyst who takes a renewed interest in our times in the castration complex – and there aren't many of them – led to in order to explain it? You'll never guess. I will summarize it for you very quickly.

There is a paradox which cannot fail to strike you, in the fact that the revelation of the genital drive is necessarily marked by the splitting* consisting in the castration complex.

The author, who has a certain knowledge base, mentions at the beginning of his article what are called "congenital reaction schemes."* They consist in the fact that, in small birds which have never had any experience of predators, it suffices to move a piece of paper in the approximate shape of a hawk over their cage to provoke all the fright reflexes. In short, the piece of paper serves 275 here as a decoy [leurre] or – as the author of this article expresses himself in French even though writing in English – attrape.

According to him, things are exceedingly simple. The primitive attrape in man must be sought out in the oral stage. It is the biting reflex – correlated with the well-known sadistic fantasies that the child may have, and which involve the sectioning of the object that is the most precious of all, the mother's nipple – that is the origin of what, in the later, genital stage, will be manifested (transformed into fellatio fantasies) as the possibility of depriving the sexual partner of his organ, of wounding or mutilating his genitalia. And this explains, not why your daughter is mute, but why the genital stage is marked by the possible sign of castration.

Such an explanation is telling as regards the present orientation of analytic thought, and of the reversal that has taken place in it that progressively places under the heading of primal drives, drives that become more and more hypothetical the more they approach the earliest moments of life. Which leads to the accentuation of the importance of constitution, of that je ne sais quoi that is innate in primordial aggressiveness.

Aren't we spelling things out correctly by dwelling instead on the problems that our practice commonly raises for us? I have already mentioned here the notion found in one of Ernest Jones' articles, in which he is stirred by a certain need to explain the castration complex. I am referring to aphanisis, a common Greek term that was put on the agenda in the articulation of analytic discourse by Freud, which means disappearance. According to Jones, what is at work in the castration complex is the fear aroused in the subject by the disappearance of desire.

Those of you who have been following my teaching for some time cannot, I hope, fail to recall – and those who do not remember can have a look at the excellent summaries made by Lefèvre-Pontalis – that I have already made headway on this topic in my Seminar by saying that, while this is one way of articulating the problem, there is also a singular reversal that clinical practice allows us to point to. This is why I commented at length for you on the well-known dream of Ella Sharpe's patient in my Seminar Desire and Its Interpretation, 276 a dream that revolves entirely around the theme of the phallus. I will ask you to look at that summary, because I cannot repeat myself and the things said then were essential.

The meaning of what is at issue here is, as I indicated, the following: far from it being the case that the fear of aphanisis is projected, so to speak, onto the image of the castration complex, it is on the contrary the necessity or determination of the signifying mechanism that, in the castration complex, makes the subject not fear aphanisis at all in the majority of cases, but, rather, take refuge in it, tucking his desire away in his vest pocket. What analytic practice reveals to us is that it is more precious to hold onto desire's symbol – the phallus – than to hold onto desire itself. This is the problem with which we are presented.

I hope that you have carefully observed the flowers that are located in front of Cupid's genitals in Zucchi's painting. They are characterized by such abundance only so that one cannot see that there is nothing behind them. There is literally no room for even the smallest genitalia. What Psyche is about to cut off has already disappeared.

Moreover, if something strikes us as being juxtaposed here to the fine, beautiful human form of this woman, who is in fact divine, it is the extraordinarily composite character of the image of Cupid. His face is a child's face, but his body is Michelangelo-like in nature. It is a muscle-bound body, which has almost begun to shows signs of aging, not to say sagging. In addition to that, there are his wings.

You are all aware that the sex of angels was a subject of endless discussion. If people debated about it for so long, it was probably because no one knew very well where to stop. In any case, the Apostle tells us that whatever joys there may be in the resurrection of the body, once the celestial feast has come, there will no longer be any sexual activity, whether active or passive.

The upshot being that what is at stake, and is concentrated in this image, is clearly the center of the paradox of the castration complex. It is that the Other's desire, insofar as it is approached at the level of the genital stage, can never in fact be accepted in what I will call its rhythm, which is at the same time its dissonance [fuyance].

This concerns first of all the paradoxes of the child's situation – namely, that we find in him a desire which is still fragile, uncertain, premature, and anticipated. But this observation hides from us what 277 is, in the final analysis, at stake: his psychical organization quite simply does not adapt, so to speak, insofar as it is psychical, to the reality of sexual desire, and this is true at every level. For the organ is brought in and approached only insofar as it is transformed into a signifier, and, in order to be transformed into a signifier, it is cut off.

Reread all that I taught you to read regarding little Hans. You will see that it is a question of nothing but this: does it have roots? Is it removable? In the end, Hans works it out – it can be unscrewed. It can be unscrewed and others can be put in its place. That is thus what is at stake.

What is shown to us here is this very elision, thanks to which it [the organ] is no longer anything but the very sign that I mentioned: the sign of absence. For what I taught you is the following – if Phi, the phallus as a signifier, has a place, it is precisely that of supplementing the Other at the point at which signifierness disappears – at the point at which the Other is constituted by the fact that a signifier is lacking somewhere. Hence the privileged value of this signifier, which can no doubt be written, but which can only be written in parentheses, by saying that it is the signifier of the point at which the signifying system [le signifiant] is lacking [S(Ⱥ)].

This is why it can become identical to the subject himself, at the point at which we can designate him as a barred subject [$] – in other words, at the sole point at which we analysts can situate a subject as such. I say, "we analysts," insofar as we are linked to the effects that result from the coherence of the signifier when a living being makes himself into its agent and its prop. If we accept this determination, this overdetermination as we call it, the subject then no longer has any other possible efficacy than on the basis of the signifier that makes him disappear. Which is why the subject is unconscious.

If people – even non-analysts – can speak of double symbolization, it is in the sense that the nature of the symbol is such that two registers necessarily stem therefrom: the one that is linked to the symbolic chain and the one that is linked to the problem or mess that the subject was able to bring to it. For it is there that, in the final analysis, he situates himself in the most certain way.

In other words, the subject asserts that the dimension of truth is original only at the moment at which he uses the signifier to lie.

3

278

I wanted to draw your attention this morning to the relation between the phallus and the effect of the signifying system [le signifiant], and to the fact that the phallus as a signifier – which means as given over to an entirely different function than its organic function – is the center of all coherent apprehension of what is at work in the castration complex.

But now I would like to introduce, not in a way that is already articulated and rational, but in a colorful way, what I will discuss next time.

It is, so to speak, beautifully represented thanks to Zucchi's Mannerism. Didn't it occur to you that by placing this vase of flowers in front of the phallus as lacking – and as such raised to major signifierness – the artist managed to anticipate by three and a half centuries (and unbeknown to me, I assure you, up until a few days ago) the very image I used to articulate the dialectic of the relations between the ideal ego and the ego-ideal?

I discussed it a very long time ago, but I completely reworked it in an article that will come out soon. I tried to fit the different pieces of the relation to the object as an object of desire – as a partial object with all the necessary focusing [accommodation] – into a system, in an amusing physics experiment that I called the inverted vase illusion.

What I hope to get you to realize is that the problem of castration, the center of the whole economy of desire such as analysis has developed it, is closely related to another problem, which is the following. How is it that the Other – which is the locus of speech, the legitimate subject, and the one with whom we have relations of good and bad faith – can and must become something precisely analogous to what can be encountered in the most inert object: namely, a, the object of desire? It is this tension, difference in altitude, or fundamental drop in level that becomes the essential regulation of everything that is problematic about desire in man. This is what must be analyzed, and I think that I can articulate it for you next time quite clearly.

I ended what I taught you about Ella Sharpe's dream with the following: "This phallus" – I said, speaking of a subject caught up in the most exemplary neurotic situation, insofar as it was that of aphani-

279

sis brought on by the castration complex – "he is it and he is not it. Language allows us to perceive the interval between to be it and not to be it in a formulation into which the verb 'to be' slips: 'he is not without having it.' It is around the subjective assumption between being and having that the reality of castration is played out. And the phallus," I wrote at that time, "serves as an equivalent in the relation to the object. It is to the extent that he gives up the phallus that the subject is able to possess the plethora of objects that characterize the human world." In an analogous formulation, one might say that "a woman is without having it." Which can be experienced very painfully in the form of Penisneid, but which is – I am now adding this to what I said before – also a great strength. This is what Ella Sharpe's patient is not willing to perceive. He shelters the phallus as a signifier. And, I concluded, "there is undoubtedly something more neurosis-inducing than the fear of losing the phallus, which is not to want the Other to be castrated."

But today, now that we have examined the dialectic of transference in the Symposium, I am going to propose another formulation. If the Other's desire is essentially separated from us by the mark of the signifier, don't you now understand why Alcibiades, having perceived that the secret of desire lies in Socrates, demands in an almost impulsive way – with an impulsivity that is at the origin of all the false pathways of neurosis and perversion – to see Socrates' desire, which he knows exists since he acts on its basis, to see it in the form of a sign?

This is also why Socrates refuses. For this is but a short circuit. To see desire in the form of a sign is not, for all that, to accede to the course by which desire is taken up in a certain dependency, which is what one wishes to know.

You see here the beginning of the path that I am attempting to open up toward what the analyst's desire must be. In order for the analyst to have what the analysand lacks, he must have nescience qua nescience. He must be in the mode of having it; he too must 280 be not without having it; he must be but one short step away from being as ignorant as his analysand.

In fact, he too is not without having an unconscious. He is no doubt always beyond everything the analysand knows, without being able to tell him. He can only give him a sign. Being that which represents something to someone is the definition of the sign. Having on the whole nothing else that stops him from being the subject's desire, than the very fact of having it, the analyst is doomed to false surprise. But get it into your heads that he is only effective when he gives himself over to true surprise, which is untransmittable, and of which he can give only a sign.

*

Representing something to someone is precisely what must be disrupted. For the sign that is to be given is the sign of the lack of a signifier. It is, as you know, the only sign that cannot be borne, because it is the one that induces the most unspeakable anxiety. It is nevertheless the only one that can make the analysand accede to the unconscious – to the "science without consciousness [science sans conscience]" concerning which you perhaps understand today, being presented with this painting, in what non-negative, but positive sense Rabelais says that it is "the demise of the soul."

April 12, 1961

281

XVII

THE SYMBOL Φ

Arcimboldo and persona.
The lack of a signifier and questioning.
The signifier that is always veiled.
The phallus in hysteria and obsession.

I am recommencing my difficult discourse for you, which is ever more difficult owing to its aim.

It would, nevertheless, be inappropriate to say that I am leading you into unknown territory today. If I begin to lead you into a certain territory today, it is clear that I already began doing so right from the outset.

To speak, moreover, of unknown territory as concerns our territory, which is called the unconscious, is still more inappropriate. For what makes for the difficulty of this discourse is that I can tell you nothing about it which does not take on all its importance from what I don't say about it.

The idea is not that one mustn't say everything and that in order to speak accurately we cannot say all that we could formulate. There is something in this formulation that, as we realize at every moment, immediately casts the matter into the imaginary, which is essentially what happens due to the fact that human subjects are, as such, prey to the symbol.

But let's be careful here – at the point we have reached, should we put "to the symbol" in the singular or the plural? In the singular, assuredly, insofar as the one that I introduced last time is, strictly speaking, an unnamable symbol – we will see why and in what respect – the symbol uppercase Phi [Φ].

It is here that I must recommence my discourse today, to show you in what respect this symbol is indispensable to us if we are to understand the impact of the castration complex on the mainspring of transference.

1 282

There is, in effect, a fundamental ambiguity between Φ and φ, between uppercase Phi as a symbol, and lowercase phi.

Lowercase phi designates the imaginary phallus insofar as it is concretely involved in the psychical economy at the level of the castration complex where we first truly encountered it, where the neurotic experiences it in a way that represents his particular mode of operating and maneuvering, with the radical difficulty that I am trying to articulate for you through the use I make of the symbol capital Phi.

Last time, and already many times before that, I designated this symbol, Φ, briefly, I mean in a quick and abbreviated manner, as a symbol [that arises or responds] in the place where the lack of a signifier occurs.

I once again unveiled, right at the beginning of the last class, the image that served us last time as a prop by which to introduce the paradoxes and antinomies related to various slippages, which are so subtle and difficult to recall in their various stages, and which must nevertheless be maintained if we wish to understand what is involved in the castration complex. They are, namely, the displacements, absences, levels, and substitutions in which the phallus intervenes, in its multiple and virtually ubiquitous formulations. In analytic work, it springs up constantly – at the very least in theoretical writings, that is undeniable – being reinvoked in the most various forms, even in studies of infancy concerning the very first pulsations of the soul. You see it identified, for example, with the force of the earliest aggressiveness, insofar as the phallus is the worst object [that is] eventually encountered in the mother's breast, and as it is also the most noxious [anal] object. Why this ubiquity?

I'm not the one who is suggesting it, for it is manifest in every attempt to formulate analytic technique, whether at an old, new, or revamped level. So let us try to introduce some order into things here, and see why I must emphasize this ambiguity or polarity, as it were. The polarity concerning the function of the phallus as a signifier involves two extremes: the symbolic and the imaginary.

I said "signifier," insofar as it is used as such. But when I pre- 283 sented it earlier, I called it a "symbol," and it is indeed, perhaps, the only signifier that, in our register, absolutely deserves to be called a symbol.

I thus unveiled anew for you this image of Zucchi's canvas, which is not a simple reproduction of the original from which I began as if from an exemplary image, laden in its composition with all the riches that a certain painterly art can produce, and whose Mannerist mainspring I examined. I'm going to quickly pass around the image again, if only for those who were not able to see it last time. I would simply like, as a complement, to clearly stress, for those who were perhaps unable to grasp it precisely, what I intend to emphasize here concerning the importance of what I will call the Mannerist application. The word "application" must be used both literally and figuratively.

You see the bouquet of flowers in the foreground. Its presence is designed to cover over what must be covered over, which, as I told you, is less Cupid's threatened phallus – Cupid who is caught by surprise and discovered here owing to Psyche's question, "Who is this guy?" – than the precise point of an absent presence, an absence rendered present. The history of that era's painting technique requires us to draw a parallel here – not via my path, but via that of [art] critics who begin with premises that are altogether different from those that could guide me here.

Indeed, we have a few indications that the flowers were probably not painted by Jacopo, but by a brother or a cousin, Francesco, who, due to his technical prowess, was asked to come create this brilliant flourish – the flowers in their vase – in the suitable spot. Owing precisely to this probable collaborator, critics have emphasized the parallel between the technique employed here and that employed by someone I hope a certain number of you know, who was brought, several months ago, to the attention of those of you who stay somewhat abreast of various revivals in interest in phases of the history of art that are sometimes overlooked, veiled, or forgotten – namely, Giuseppe Arcimboldo.

Arcimboldo, who worked in part at the court of the infamous Rudolph II, King of Bohemia – who left behind other traces in the tradition of rare objects – is known for a singular technique which 284 sent out its most recent shoot in the work of my old friend Salvador Dalí in what he called paranoiac drawing. Having, for example, to represent the face of Rudolph II's librarian, Arcimboldo did so using an ingenious construction made of the primary tools of the librarian, namely, books, arranged on the canvas in such a way that the image of a face is much more than suggested – it truly forces itself upon the viewer. Similarly, the symbolic theme of a season, incarnated in the guise of a human face, was materialized by the fruits in season then, the assembling of which was carried out in such a way that a face in the form created is also forcibly suggested to the viewer.

In short, this Mannerist procedure consists in creating the essence of a human image through the coalescence, combination, or accumulation of a pile of objects, the sum total of which is given the task of representing what is thus manifested both as substance and illusion. At the same time that the appearance of a human image is sustained, something is suggested that can be imagined in the ungrouping of the objects. These objects, which in some sense serve as a mask, simultaneously demonstrate the problematic [nature] of this very mask.

This is, in short, what we are dealing with every time the highly essential function of the persona comes into play, which is always in the foreground in the economy of human presence. For if there is a need for a persona, it is because, behind it perhaps, all form slips away and vanishes.

Assuredly, a persona results from a complex grouping [of objects]. Here indeed lies the illusion [leurre] and the fragility of its subsistence. Behind it, we know nothing of what can be sustained, for it is a twofold appearance that is suggested to us, a redoubling of appearance that leaves unanswered the question of what there is there in the end.

It is clearly in this register that we see, in the composition of this canvas, the way in which the question of what is at stake in what must concern us here – namely, Psyche's act – is sustained.

Psyche, who is fulfilled, wonders whom she is dealing with, and it is this precise special moment that captured the artist's attention, perhaps well beyond anything he himself could have put into words. He did write a discourse on the gods of Antiquity – I took the trouble to look at it, without having any great illusions about 285 it – and, in effect, there is not much to be gleaned from it. But his painting speaks loudly enough for itself.

In this image, the artist has grasped what last time I called the moment of the appearance or birth of Psyche – the sort of exchange of powers whose effect is that she becomes embodied. What follows is a whole string of misfortunes that befall her before she comes full circle, and finds anew what, at that instant, will disappear the instant thereafter for her, what she wanted to unveil and grasp: the face of desire.

2

What justifies my introducing the symbol capital Φ, since I designate it as what arises in the place of the missing signifier [signifiant manquant]? What does it mean for a signifier to be missing?

How many times have I told you that once the battery of signifiers is given – beyond a certain minimum which remains to be determined, but at the very least four should be able to suffice for all significations, as Jakobson teaches us – nothing is missing. There is no language, however primitive it may be, in which everything cannot in the end be expressed, with the exception that – as the Vaudois proverb has it, "Everything is possible for man; what he cannot do he leaves aside" – what cannot be expressed in that language is, quite simply, neither felt nor subjectified.

For it to be subjectified would be for it to take up a position in a subject as valid for another subject – in other words, to shift to the most radical point where the very idea of communication is possible. Any signifying battery can tell you that what that battery cannot say signifies nothing in the locus of the Other. Now, everything that is signifying to us always occurs in the locus of the Other.

In order for something to signify, it must be translatable in the locus of the Other. Let us assume there is a language that does not have such and such a figure of speech – then it simply does not express it. Yet it signifies it nevertheless, for example, through the use of "shall" or "have." This is in fact what happens: I pointed out to you how, in French and English, the future tense is expressed. In 286 je chanterai, it is perfectly well attested that it is originally the verb "to have" [avoir] which is declined [j'ai]. "I shall sing" also indirectly expresses the future tense that English does not have.

There is no such thing as a missing signifier [Il n'y a pas de signifiant qui manque]. At what moment can a lack of a signifier possibly begin to appear? In the dimension that is subjective and that is called questioning.

I brought out, on an earlier occasion, the fundamental character of the appearance in the child of questioning as such. It is an already well-known fact, noted by the most ordinary observation. It is a particularly embarrassing moment [for adults] because of the nature of the child's questions. As soon as he knows how to work with and get around with the signifier, he enters a dimension that leads him to ask his parents the most inopportune questions which, as everyone knows, give rise to the greatest confusion in his parents and to answers by them that are almost necessarily impotent.

"What is running?" "What does 'stamping your foot' mean?" "What is an imbecile?" What makes us so unable to satisfactorily answer such questions? Something obliges us to answer in a way that is so especially inept, as if we did not know that to say, "Running means walking very quickly," is truly to botch it up; that to say, "'Stamping your foot' means that you're angry" is truly to proffer an absurdity; and I won't go into the definition we might provide of an imbecile. What is involved in this moment of questioning, if not that the subject distances himself from his use of the signifier itself, and is unable to grasp what it means for there to be words, what it means to speak, and what it means to designate something so close to him with that enigmatic something known as a word or a phoneme?

The inability experienced at that moment by the child is formulated in questions that attack the signifier as such, at a moment at which the signifier's action is already indelibly etched into everything. Everything that later presents itself as a question in the aftermath of his pseudo-philosophical meditation, can, in the final analysis, but fall short. By the time the subject arrives at the question "What am I?" he will be still less far along – except, of course, if he undergoes an analysis. But if he does not – and it has not been within his power to do so for very long – by calling himself into question in the form "What am I?" he veils from himself that, to ask himself what he is, is to go beyond the stage of doubt concerning whether he is, for merely by formulating his question in this way, he immediately slips into metaphor – he simply does not realize it. The least we analysts can do is remember this ourselves in order to spare 287 him from once again making this age-old error, which threatens his innocence in every form, and to stop him from answering the question, for example – even with our consent – by concluding "I am a child."

This is, of course, the new answer given to him by the updated form of indoctrination supplied by psychologizing suppression. And along with that, in the same package, it sells him, without him realizing it, the myth of the adult, who is supposedly no longer a child – spawning once again the kind of ethics that props up a supposed reality in which he, in fact, allows himself to be led around by the nose by all sorts of social claptrap. We didn't have to wait for analysis or Freud in order for the formulation "I am a child" to be introduced as a corset designed to straighten up what finds itself in a somewhat skewed position for whatever reason.

People go so far as to say that behind every artist is a child and that the artist represents the child's rights to people who are considered to be serious, who are not children. As I told you last year in my classes on The Ethics of Psychoanalysis, this conception dates back to the beginning of the Romantic period, starting more or less at the time of Coleridge in England, to situate it in a tradition, and I don't see why we would assume the task of taking up the torch.

I would like to get you to see, in this context, what I alluded to during our recent conference in the provinces.

The lower level of the Graph of Desire, with the two intersections of each of its two arrows, is designed to draw attention to the fact that simultaneity is not synchrony. Let us assume that the two tensors or vectors in question, that of intention and that of the signifying chain, unfold simultaneously. You see that what occurs here by way of an inchoation [i.e., origin or beginning] in this succession – the succession, for example, of the different phonemic elements of the signifier – unfolds substantially before encountering the line on which what is called into being (namely, the intention to signify, we might even say need, as it were) assumes its place, a place that is hidden there. Similarly, this intersecting simultaneously takes place a second time. If Nachträglich indeed signifies something, it is the fact that meaning crystallizes out at the very instant at which a sentence ends. A choice has no doubt already been made along the way, but meaning is only grasped once the signifiers successively 288 piled up have, each in its turn, assumed their places, and unfolded in an inverted form – "I am a child" appearing on the signifying line in the order in which its elements are articulated.

What happens when meaning draws to a close [s'achève]? What happens is something that is always metaphorical in any and every attribution. I am nothing other than me who is speaking, and currently I am a child. By saying it, by asserting it, a hold or qualification of meaning is realized, thanks to which I conceptualize myself as having a certain relationship to objects that are infantile objects. I make myself into something other than what I could in any way think of myself as at first. I become incarnate, I crystallize, I make myself into an ideal ego, and I do so very directly in the process of this simple signifying inchoation, in the fact of having produced signs that can refer to the very moment of my speaking. The point of departure is in the "I," and the endpoint is in the "child" ["I am a child"].

What results here – whether I see it or not – is the enigma of questioning itself. This is what must next be taken up anew at the level of capital A. The result of what I am appears in the form in which it remains a question. This result is for me the point aimed at or the correlative point at which I ground myself as an ego-ideal. It is on the basis of this point that the question has importance to me. It is here that the question summons me in the ethical dimension, and supplies the very form that Freud conjugates with the superego.

But what is the status of this noun [nom] which directly links up, as far as I know, with my signifying inchoation, and which qualifies the subject in an only partly legitimate way as a child? This answer is hurried and premature. With it, I basically elide the whole central operation that has occurred. What makes me rush headlong toward concluding I am a child is avoidance of the true answer, which must begin much earlier than any endpoint [terme] of the sentence. The answer to "What am I?" is nothing other that is articulable – in the same sense in which I told you that no demand can be borne – there is no other answer to "What am I?" at the level of the Other than "Let yourself be." And any hurrying in giving this answer, whatever it may be at the level of dignity, child or adult, is but something whereby I flee the meaning of this "Let yourself be."

What this adventure means, at the degraded point where we grasp it, is that what is at stake in every question formulated is not situated at the level of "What am I?" but at that of the Other, in the form that analytic practice allows us to unveil – namely, "What do you 289 want?" What is involved at this precise point is to figure out what we desire by raising the question. This is how the question must be understood. It is here that the lack of a signifier at stake in the phallus as Φ intervenes.

As we know, psychoanalysis has found that what the subject is faced with is the object of fantasy insofar as it presents itself as alone able to determine a special point in what must be called, alongside the pleasure principle, an economy regulated by the level of jouissance. Analysis also teaches us that by shifting the question to the level of "What does he want?" – of "What does the old coconut want?" – we encounter a world of hallucinated signs, and analysis represents reality testing to us as a way of sampling what? – the reality of the signs that arise in us in a necessary order, which is precisely what constitutes the dominance of the pleasure principle in the unconscious.

What is thus at stake in reality testing, let us observe, is assuredly to verify a real presence, but it is a presence of signs – as Freud emphatically stressed. The goal of reality testing is not to verify whether our representations correspond to something real – we have known for a long time that we don't succeed any better at this than philosophers do – but to verify that our representations are truly represented, in the sense of Vorstellungsrepräsentanz. The point is to ensure that the signs are there, but qua signs – since they are signs – of a relation to something else. This is what Freud means when he says the unconscious gravitates around a lost object that can only ever be refound – in other words, never truly refound.

290 The object can never be anything but signified, due to the very fact that the pleasure principle is a chain. The true, authentic object at stake when we speak of objects is in no way grasped, transmittable, or exchangeable. It is at the horizon of that around which our fantasies gravitate. And it is nevertheless with this that we must create objects that are exchangeable.

The problem is very far from working itself out. I sufficiently stressed last year what is at stake in utilitarian ethics. It plays a fundamental role in the recognition of objects constituted in what one might call the market for objects. These are objects that can be of use to everyone, and in this sense so-called utilitarian ethics is more than founded – there is no other. And it is precisely because there is no other that the difficulties that it supposedly entails are in fact perfectly well resolved.

Utilitarians are quite right when they say that whenever we are dealing with something that can be exchanged with our fellow men, the rule of this exchange is utility – not ours, but the possibility of use, utility for all and for the greatest number. This is clearly what creates the gap between the constitution of the extraordinary object that arises in fantasy and every kind of object in the so-called social world – that is, the world of conformity.

Indeed, the world of conformity is already coherent with a universal organization of discourse. There is no utilitarianism without a theory of fictions, and to claim that we can resort to a natural object, that we can even reduce the distances by which the objects of common consent are sustained, is to introduce a confusion or an additional myth into the problematic of reality. On the contrary, the object involved in the analytic relation to the object must be mapped at the most radical point at which the question of the subject's relation to the signifier is raised.

What is the subject's relation to the signifier? We deal, at the level of the unconscious chain, solely with signs. It is a chain of signs. Consequently, there is no end to each sign's deferral to the one that follows it. For the essence of communication with signs is to make a sign of that very other whom I address in order to incite him to aim in the same way as me at the object to which a certain sign refers.

291 The imposition of the signifier on the subject freezes him in the position characteristic of the signifier. The point is to find the guarantor of the chain that, transferring meaning from sign to sign, must stop somewhere – to find what gives us the sign that we have a right to operate with signs.

It is here that the privilege of Φ among all signifiers arises. Perhaps it will seem overly simple, almost childish, to you if I emphasize what is at stake in this particular signifier.

This signifier is always hidden and veiled – to the extent, good gracious, that one is astonished, that one takes it to be a peculiar and almost exorbitant enterprise, to see its form in some obscure representation or artwork. It is more than rare, though of course it happens, to see it brought into a hieroglyphic chain or into a prehistoric rupestrian painting. We cannot say that it plays no role in human imagination, even prior to analytic exploration, and yet it is, of all our fabricated, signifying representations, the one most often elided or eluded. What does that imply?

Of all possible signs, isn't it the one that brings together in itself the sign and means of action along with the very presence of desire as such? If we allow the phallus to come to light in its real presence, isn't that apt to put a stop to the deferral that takes place in the chain of signs and, furthermore, to push the signs back into some kind of a shadow of nothingness? There is no surer sign of desire, on the condition that there is no longer anything but desire.

An either/or relationship becomes established between this signifier of desire and the entire signifying chain. Psyche was very happy in a relationship with what was not in any way a signifier, but the reality of her love for Cupid. But there you have it – she was Psyche and she wanted to know. She asked herself the question, because language already exists, and one does not spend one's life simply making love, but also chatting with one's sisters. Chatting with her sisters, she wanted to possess her happiness, which is not as simple as all that. Once one has entered into the order of language, to possess one's happiness is to be able to show it, to account for it, arrange its flowers – it is to be as good as her sisters by showing that she has something that is better than what they have, and not simply that she has something different. This is why Psyche showed up in the middle of the night with her lamp, and also with her little chopper.

There was absolutely nothing for her to chop, as I told you, 292 because the deed had already been done. There was nothing for her to cut, although she would have done well to cut the lights at the earliest possible occasion. She saw nothing but a great blinding light, followed, much to her dismay, by a prompt return to the shadows, concerning which she would have done better to take the initiative before her object was definitively lost. Cupid was wounded by this, and for a long time thereafter. He was only refound by Psyche after a long series of trials that she was made to undergo.

In the painting, Psyche is the one who is illuminated, and – as I have been teaching you for a long time concerning the slender form of femininity, at the border between puberty and prepubescence – she is the phallic image to us. Because of this, we realize that it is neither the woman nor the man who, in the final analysis, is the medium of the castrating action; it is this [phallic] image itself insofar as it is reflected – reflected onto the narcissistic form of the body.

The unnamed relationship – unnamed because it is unnamable, because it is unspeakable – between the subject and the pure signifier of desire is projected onto the localizable, precise organ, which can be situated somewhere in the whole of the bodily edifice. Hence the specifically imaginary conflict that involves seeing oneself as deprived or not deprived of this appendix.

It is around this imaginary point that the symptomatic effects of the castration complex develop.

3

I can only begin here to analyze the symptomatic effects of the castration complex. But I would like to remind you, by way of a summary, of what I have already said on this subject in a much more developed way when I spoke about something I have very often discussed – in other words, the neuroses.

What does the hysteric do? What, in the final analysis, does Dora do?

I have taught you to follow the pathways and detours of the labyrinth of complex identifications by which Dora finds herself confronted with something – with what? Freud himself stumbles and loses his way here. You know that he is mistaken concerning the 293 object of her desire, precisely because he seeks to situate Dora as an hysteric, first and foremost, with regard to her choice of object, an object that is no doubt little a.

It is quite true that, in a certain sense, Mr. K. is her little object a, and that, in fact, this is her fantasy, inasmuch as fantasy is what props up desire. But Dora would not be an hysteric were she content with this fantasy. She aims at something else, at something better, at A. She aims at the absolute Other.

I have been explaining to you for a long time that, for Dora, Mrs. K. incarnates the question, "What is a woman?" And because of this, at the level of fantasy, we do not see the relation of the fading* of the subject with respect to little a, but, as she is an hysteric, something else.

That something else is an uppercase A as such, in which she believes, unlike a paranoiac. "What am I?" has a meaning for her, which is not the meaning mentioned earlier, deriving from ethical or philosophical blunders, but a full and absolute meaning. And she cannot but encounter here, without knowing it, the sign Φ which corresponds to it, which is perfectly hermetic [clos] and always veiled. This is why she resorts to all kinds of substitutes, the closest forms, let it be noted, she can find for this sign, Φ. If you follow Dora's operations, or those of any other hysteric, you will see that what is always involved is an intricate game by which she can, so to speak, complicate the situation by slipping φ, the lowercase phi designating the imaginary phallus, where it is needed.

Her father is impotent with Mrs. K? Well, what difference does it make – she will serve as the copula herself. She will pay the price personally. She is the one who will sustain their relationship. And since that is still not enough, she will bring into play the image – which takes her place, as I showed you a long time ago [Écrits, pp. 221–2] and demonstrated – of Mr. K. She casts him into the abyss, into the darkest shadows, at the moment at which the beast says to her the only thing that he should not have said, "My wife means nothing to me." Namely, she doesn't excite me. "But if she doesn't get you hard, what good are you to me?"

For the only thing that matters to Dora, or to any other hysteric, is to be the procurer of this sign in an imaginary form. The hysteric's devotion, her passion to identify with all kinds of sentimental dramas, to be there, to sustain in the wings everything that can happen which is exciting and which is nevertheless none of her business – this is the mainspring or resource around which all of her 294 behavior revolves and proliferates.

She always exchanges her desire for this sign – we needn't look elsewhere for the reason for her so-called mythomania. There is one thing that she prefers to her own desire – she prefers to let her own desire go unsatisfied and have the Other hold the key to her mystery.

This is the only thing that is of importance to her, which is why, identifying with love's drama, she endeavors to reanimate, reinsure, recomplete anew, or repair that Other. We clearly must distrust this, with the whole of the reparative ideology of our initiative as therapists, of our analytic vocation. But it is not here that my warning can take on the most importance, for the path that reveals itself to us most easily is certainly not that of the hysteric.

There is another path, that of the obsessive, which is, as you all know, far more intelligent in its way of operating.

The formula for the hysteric's fantasy can be written as follows:

$$\frac{a}{(-\varphi)} \diamond A$$

Here we have a, the substitutional or metaphorical object, over something that is hidden – namely, minus phi, one's own imaginary castration – in one's relation to the Other. Today I will merely introduce the formula of the obsessive's fantasy, which is different. But before writing it on the board, I must provide a certain number of hints and indications that will set you on the right course.

We are aware of the difficulty encountered in handling the symbol Φ in its unveiled form. As I told you earlier, what is unbearable about it is that it is not simply a sign and a signifier but the presence of desire. It is the real presence [of desire].

I am asking you to grab hold of the thread that I am extending to you and that, given the time left us, I can only offer here as an indication to be taken up next time. At the root of fantasies and symptoms, of the points of emergence where we see the [hysteric] labyrinth let its mask slip off in some sense, we encounter something that I will call an insult to real presence. The obsessive, too, deals 295 with the mystery of the phallic signifier, Φ, and it is also of importance to him to make it manageable.

An author about whom I shall have to speak next time has broached – in a way which is certainly instructive and fruitful to us if we know how to critique it – the function of the phallus in obsessive neurosis. He took up the subject for the first time in a report on a case of obsessive neurosis in a woman, in which he stressed certain sacrilegious fantasies – in which the figure of Christ, and even Christ's phallus, were trampled underfoot – from which the patient derived a noticeable and avowed erotic aura. The author then immediately dove into the topic of aggressiveness and penis envy, in spite of the patient's protests.

Don't a thousand other facts that I could enumerate show us that it is appropriate for us to dwell far more on the phenomenology of this fantasizing that is all too quickly termed "sacrilegious"? We might recall here the fantasy of the Rat Man imagining that, in the middle of the night, his dead father is resuscitated and comes knocking at the door, the patient showing himself to his father as the patient is masturbating [SE X, pp. 204–5]. This too is an insult to real presence.

What we call aggressiveness always presents itself in obsessive neurosis as aggression toward the form of the Other's appearance that, on another occasion, I called "phallophany," the Other insofar as he can present himself as the phallus. To strike the phallus in the

Other, to strike it at the imaginary level, in order to heal symbolic castration is the pathway chosen by the obsessive neurotic to try to abolish the difficulty that I designate as "the parasitic nature of the signifier in the subject," and to try to restore primacy to desire, at the cost of degrading the Other, which makes the Other essentially a function of the phallus' imaginary elision.

At the precise point in the Other where he is in a state of doubt, suspension, loss, ambivalence, or fundamental ambiguity, the obsessive's relation to the object – to an object that is always metonymic, because for him the object is essentially interchangeable – is essentially governed by something that is related to castration, which takes on a directly aggressive form here: absence, depreciation, rejection, or refusal of the sign of the Other's desire. Not abolition or destruction of the Other's desire, but a rejection of its signs. This is what determines the exceedingly odd impossibility that the obsessive's own desire ever manifest itself. 296

Assuredly, to point out to him – insistently, moreover, as did the analyst to whom I was referring earlier – his relation to the imaginary phallus in order, so to speak, to familiarize him with its impasse – well, we cannot say that the solution to the obsessive's difficulties does not lie along this path. But how can we fail to note in passing that, after a certain stage of the working through* of imaginary castration, the subject was in no way relieved of his obsessions, but simply of the guilt attached to them?

What else is new! Such a therapeutic approach is thereby seen to be flawed. Where does it bring us? To the Φ function of the phallus as a signifier, as a signifier in the transference itself.

How does the analyst situate himself in relation to this signifier? If the question is essential here it is because it is already illustrated for us by the forms and impasses demonstrated to us by a certain therapeutic approach that is oriented as we just saw.

This is what I will try to take up for you next time.

April 19, 1961

297

XVIII

REAL PRESENCE

The contemporary farce.
The obsessive's phallicism.
The signifier that is excluded from the signifying system.
Phobia and perversion.

On Saturday and Sunday I happened to open, for the first time, notes taken at different points of my Seminar over the last few years, to see whether the mile markers I gave you under the heading The Relation to the Object, and then Desire and Its Interpretation, converge without too much of a gap with what I am trying to articulate for you this year under the heading of Transference.

I realized, in effect, that in everything I discussed with you, and which is there, so it seems, in one of our Society's filing cabinets, there is a lot that you will be able to find anew at a time when people have the leisure to bring it out – at a point at which you will say to yourselves that, in 1961, someone was teaching you something.

It will not be said that I never allude to current events in my teaching – there would be something excessive about saying so. To corroborate this, I will thus read to you a little bit of what I also came across on Sunday, in the work of Jonathan Swift. I had far too little time to speak with you about him when I took up the symbolic function of the phallus, though the question is so ubiquitous in his work that one could say that, if we take his work as a whole, it is articulated in it.

Jonathan Swift and Lewis Carroll are two authors whom, while I don't have the time to make a regular commentary upon them, you would do well to consult in order to find a great deal of material that is very closely related, as closely related as possible, as closely as is 298 possible in literary works, to the topic I am currently broaching the most nearly.

In Gulliver's Travels, which I was perusing in a charming little edition dating back to the middle of the nineteenth century, illustrated by Granville, I found a passage in the third part, "A Voyage to Laputa," which is characterized by the fact that it is not limited to the trip to Laputa.

It is thus to Laputa, a formidable anticipation of space stations, that Gulliver heads, crossing several kingdoms about which he shares with us a number of significant viewpoints that have lost none of their savor. In particular, he has a discussion with an academic, and tells him that in the kingdom of Tribnia, known as Langden by its natives, where he had resided,

> The Bulk of the People consisted wholly of Discoverers, Witnesses, Informers, Accusers, Prosecutors, Evidences, Swearers; together with their several subservient and subaltern Instruments; all under the Colours, the Conduct, and pay of Ministers, and their deputies.

But let us not dwell on that theme.

Gulliver explains to us how the informers operate [regarding their enemies].

> Then, effectual Care is taken to secure all their Letters and other Papers, and put the Owners in Chains. These Papers are delivered to a Set of Artists, very dextrous in finding out the mysterious Meanings of Words, Syllables and Letters.

This is where Swift really gets going. And as you will see, it's quite pretty concerning the heart of the matter [substantifique moëlle].

> For Instance, they can decypher a Close-stool to signify a Privy-Council; a Flock of Geese, a Senate; a lame Dog, an Invader; the Plague, a standing Army; a Buzzard, a Minister; the Gout, a High Priest; a Gibbet, a Secretary of State; a Chamber pot, a Committee of Grandees; a Sieve, a Court Lady; a Broom, a Revolution; a Mouse-trap, an Employment; a bottomless Pit, the Treasury; a Sink, a C---t; a Cap and Bells, a Favourite; a broken Reed, a Court of Justice; an empty Tun, a General; a running Sore, the Administration.
>
> When this Method fails, they have two others more effectual; which the Learned among them call Acrosticks and Anagrams. First, they can decypher all initial Letters into political Meanings. Thus, N, shall signify a Plot; B, a Regiment of Horse; L, a Fleet at Sea. Or, secondly, by transposing the Letters of the Alphabet, 299 > in any suspected Paper, they can lay open the deepest Designs of a discontented Party. So for Example, if I should say in a Letter to a Friend, Our Brother Tom has just got the Piles; a Man of Skill in this Art would discover how the same Letters which compose that Sentence, may be analysed into the following words: Resist, ----- a Plot is brought home ----- The Tour.

I find it not unfitting to reconstruct, with the help of this text which is not so very old, the paradoxical ground of contemporary events, this paradoxical ground being so blatant in so many respects. For in truth, having been untimely awakened last night by someone who told me something that more or less all of you have heard – incorrect news, as it turns out – my sleep was momentarily troubled as I wondered whether I had failed to recognize the tragic dimension of recent events. This posed a problem for me after what I explained to you last year about tragedy, for nowhere could I see the appearance of what I then called the "reflection of beauty."

This effectively stopped me from falling back asleep for a while. I later fell asleep, leaving the question in abeyance. Upon waking this morning, the question had lost a bit of its hold [prégnance] over me. It seemed to me that we are still at the stage of farce. And the problem that I was raising suddenly vanished.

Having said that, we are going to take things up where we left them last time.

1

Last time, I put up on the board the following formula for the obsessive's fantasy:

$$\not{A} \Diamond \varphi\,(a, a', a'', a''', \ldots)$$

Thus presented in algebraic form, it is clear that it can but be opaque to those who were not present at my earlier discussions. So I will try, in speaking about it, to fill in the missing dimensions.

You know that this formula is juxtaposed to that of the hysteric, which I wrote for you last time as follows: a over minus phi, in relation to the Other with a capital O [uppercase A]. This relation can be read in several ways. "Desire for A" is one way of putting it.

300

$$\frac{a}{(-\varphi)} \Diamond \mathrm{A}$$

It is thus important that I indicate the respective functions attributed in my symbolization to uppercase Phi and lowercase phi – that is, to Φ and φ.

I'll ask you to try not to run headlong toward the analogies to which it is always easy and tempting to yield, saying to yourselves, for example, that Φ is the symbolic phallus and φ the imaginary phallus. This is perhaps true in a certain sense, but if you content yourselves with it you risk overlooking the interest of these symbolizations, symbolizations that, believe me, I do not take pleasure in uselessly multiplying in order to provide superficial analogies and intellectual aids. This is not the goal of a teaching, strictly speaking.

The point is to see what I intend these two symbols to represent, and all sorts of indications allow you to already foresee their importance and appreciate their usefulness.

For example, the year began with a very interesting lecture by my friend Georges Favez who, speaking to you about what the analyst is, and about his function for the analysand, concluded that, in the final analysis, the analyst takes on a fetishistic function for the patient. This was the formulation – around which he had grouped all sorts of converging facts in a certain way – with which his lecture ended. This is clearly a highly subjective view. Certainly, it does not leave him completely isolated, for this formulation was prepared by all sorts of things found in various articles on transference, but, nevertheless, one cannot deny that it takes a somewhat astonishing and paradoxical form. I told him that the things that I was going to articulate this year would not fail to respond in some way to the question raised by his talk.

Let us turn now to an author who has tried to articulate the unusual function of transference in obsessive neurosis. He has bequeathed us a body of work, which is now finished, which began with a discussion of the therapeutic impact of the recognition of 301 penis envy in obsessive neurosis among women, and arrived at a generalized theory of the function of the distance from the object in the handling of the transference, especially elaborated on the basis of his experience conducting analyses with obsessive neurotics. The main, active, and efficient mainspring of a subject's increased possession of the meaning of his symptom, especially when he is obsessive, is, according to this author, the imaginary introjection of the phallus – specifically insofar as it is incarnated in the imaginary fantasy of the analyst's phallus.

I have already sketched out for you my position regarding and critique of the work of this author, Maurice Bouvet, especially as concerns technique. Having more closely broached the topic of transference, we shall now be able to hone this critique still further. This requires that we enter into a precise articulation of what the function of the phallus is, particularly in the transference.

I will try to articulate this function with the help of the terms that are symbolized here, Φ and φ. I fully realize that we never proceed by deduction, from high to low, so to speak, when we develop analytic theory. Nothing begins more clearly from the particular than analytic work. This is why we can still find something worthwhile in an articulation like that of the author to whom I am referring. This is also why his theory of the function of the phallic image in transference begins from an altogether localized experience, which can, in certain respects, limit its scope, but is also precisely what gives it its importance.

It is because Bouvet based himself, in an acute and accentuated way, on work with obsessives, that we must consider and debate what he concluded. We will also begin today with obsessives, which is why, at the beginning of class, I put up on the board the formula by which I am trying to articulate their fantasy.

I have already said a great deal to you about obsessives, and I don't intend to repeat it all here. The idea is not simply to repeat what is fundamentally substitutional, and perpetually eluded, in a sort of sleight of hand that characterizes the way in which the obsessive proceeds in his way of situating himself in relation to the Other, and more exactly, of never being at the place at which he seems to designate himself at any particular moment.

302 The formulation of the second term of the obsessive's fantasy [the part to the right of the lozenge] alludes precisely to the fact that objects are for him, as objects of desire, situated as a function [mis en function] of certain erotic equivalences – something we are used to indicating by speaking of the eroticization of his world, and especially of his mental world. This "situating as a function of" [mise en function] can be noted by φ. It suffices in effect to reread an analytic case study, assuming it is well done, in order to perceive that φ is precisely what underlies the equivalence instituted between objects at the erotic level. This φ is, in some sense, the unit of measurement by which the subject accommodates the function of little a – namely, the function of the objects of his desire.

In order to illustrate it, I need but point to the first case study of obsessive neurosis. But you will also find it in all the others, assuming they are worthwhile case studies.

Why does Freud call him Rattenmann, the Rat Man or "man with the rats," "rats" being in the plural, whereas in his fantasy – in which Freud broaches for the first time a type of inner view of the structure of his desire in the "horror" seen on his face of "a jouissance of which he himself was unaware" [SE X, pp. 166–7] – there are not several rats, but only one, the one that figures in the well-known Turkish torture that I will have to come back to later? If Freud talks about the "man with the rats" with "rats" in the plural, it is clearly because the rat follows its path in a multiform manner in the whole economy of the peculiar exchanges, substitutions, and permanent metonymy of which the obsessive's symptomatology is the living example.

His formula concerning the payment of fees in analysis, "So many rats, so many florins" [SE X, p. 212], is but a specific illustration of the permanent equation of all the objects that are taken up into what is a sort of market – the metabolism of objects in symptoms. In a more or less latent fashion, it is part and parcel of a kind of common unit or gold standard. The rat symbolizes or occupies the place of what I call φ, insofar as it is a certain reduced form of Φ, even a degraded form of this signifier. We shall see what allows me to say so.

What does Φ in fact represent? The function of the phallus in its generality, for all subjects who speak. And the point is to perceive its status in the unconscious on the basis of the point that is given to us in the symptomatology of obsessive neurosis, where this function 303 emerges in forms that I refer to as degraded.

It emerges, you should observe, at the level of consciousness. This is what analytic work shows us very clearly in the structure of obsessive neurotics. Here the situating as a phallic function [mise en fonction phallique] is not repressed, in other words, profoundly hidden, as it is in the case of hysterics. The φ that is there in the position of situating all objects as a function of it, in the same position as the lowercase f of a mathematical formula, is perceptible and avowed in the symptom – it is conscious and utterly and completely visible. "Conscious," conscius, originally designates the possibility of the subject's complicity with himself, and thus also of a complicity with the Other who observes him. The observer has almost no problem being his accomplice. The sign of the phallic function emerges from every direction at the level of the articulation of symptoms.

It is in this context that the question can be raised of what Freud is trying, not without difficulty, to illustrate for us when he articulates the function of Verneinung. How can it be that things are both so obviously spoken and yet misrecognized? Were the subject but what is made of him by a certain psychologism, which continues to hold sway even at the very heart of our analytic societies, were the subject nothing other than the fact of seeing the other see you, how could one say that the function of the phallus is positioned in such a way as to be recognized by the obsessive? For this function is absolutely blatant. And nevertheless, one might say that even in this blatant form, it shares in what we call repression. However avowed it may be, it is not avowed by the subject without the analyst's help. Without the help of the Freudian register, it is neither recognized nor even recognizable. It is here that we put our finger on the fact that to be a subject is something other than to be a gaze faced with another gaze, according to the formulation that I called psychologistic, which also goes so far as to include among its characteristics the existing Sartrean theory.

To be a subject is to have one's place in the Other [A], in the locus of speech. Now, a vicissitude can arise here that is designated by the bar that strikes through the A – namely, that the Other's speech is lacking. It is at the precise moment at which the subject – manifesting himself as the phi function in relation to the object – vanishes and fails to recognize himself, it is at this precise point that, in the absence of recognition, misrecognition automatically occurs. At 304 this point of absence [défaut], at which the function of phallicism to which the subject devotes himself winds up being covered over, the mirage of narcissism – that I would call truly frenetic in the obsessive subject – is produced in its stead.

This sort of alienation of phallicism is visibly manifested in the obsessive, for example, in what are called his thought disturbances. These latter can be expressed by the subject in a perfectly clear, articulated, and avowed way, and experienced as such. "It is not so much because what I think," the subject says to you in his discourse – implicitly, but in enough detail that the line can be drawn and the addition carried out on the basis of his declaration – "is culpable that it is difficult for me to sustain myself and to progress thereby; it is because it is absolutely necessary that what I think come from me and never from my neighbor, never from someone else."

How many times have we heard this – not only in the obsessive's typical situations, but in what I will call the "obsessivized" relations that we produce artificially in a relationship that is as specific as that of analytic teaching?

2

In my lecture in Rome ["Function and Field of Speech and Language"], I spoke of what I called the "wall of language" [Écrits, p. 282]. Nothing is more difficult than to back the obsessive neurotic up against the wall of his desire.

There is something that I don't think has ever truly been highlighted before, even though it is rather enlightening. In order to situate it, I will use a term you are aware I have already used for more than one purpose, aphanisis, introduced by Ernest Jones, in a way all of whose ambiguities I have indicated, to designate the disappearance – that is the meaning of the word in Greek – of desire.

No one has ever, it seems to me, pointed out a very simple fact that is quite tangible in the stories told by obsessives. When an obsessive is following a certain path of autonomous research, or self-analysis, as it were, [or] when he is proceeding along the path of what is known as "realizing his fantasy," regardless of its form, it is truly appropriate to employ the term aphanisis. It is even impossible to avoid this function at that point.

When people use the term, it is generally in order to designate, 305 first of all, a natural and ordinary aphanisis, which concerns the limited power a subject has to maintain an erection. Desire has, in effect, a natural rhythm. Even without evoking the extremes of the inability to keep it up or the most worrisome forms of the brevity of the act, one can remark that the subject is dealing here with a sort of obstacle or stumbling block that is fundamental in his relation to his fantasy. What is at stake for him is the end of the line: erection and then the fall of desire. There is a precise moment at which the erection goes down. Nevertheless, on the whole, my goodness, the obsessive is endowed with neither more nor less than what we might call quite ordinary genitality, which is even rather wimpy, it seems to me. Indeed, even if what is at stake in the avatars and torments inflicted upon him by the hidden mainspring of his desire were situated at this level, it would be appropriate for us to bring our efforts to bear elsewhere.

I always counterpunctually mention what we do not concern ourselves with at all, but I am astonished that we never ask ourselves why we do not concern ourselves with it. We do not concern ourselves, in effect, with the perfecting of athletic exercises with which to train for sexual embraces, nor with bringing bodies alive in the dimension of nudity and public displays [la prise au ventre]. Apart from a few exceptions – you are aware how thoroughly one of those exceptions was condemned, namely Reich – I don't think it is a field to which analysts have ever devoted much attention.

The obsessive can more or less figure out how to handle his desire. It is, in short, a question of mores, in a situation in which things, with or without analysis, are maintained in the realm of the clandestine, and in which cultural variations consequently don't mean much. What is at stake is thus situated somewhere else altogether, namely, at the level of the discordance between his fantasy – insofar as it is precisely linked to the function of phallicism – and the act in which he aspires to incarnate it, which always falls short of the fantasy. And naturally, it is owing to the effects of the fantasy, this fantasy which is all about phallicism, that all the symptomatic consequences develop that are designed to contribute to it. The fantasy includes everything that contributes to [the act], in the so very typical and characteristic form of isolation, whose mechanism has been highlighted in the birth of the symptom.

306 If one thus finds in the obsessive the fear of aphanisis highlighted by Jones, it is insofar as, and solely inasmuch as, it is the putting to the test – which always turns into defeat – of the Φ function of the phallus. Its result is that the obsessive has no greater fear, in the end, than of what he imagines he aspires to: to act freely and to live in the state of nature, if I may put it thus. Natural tasks are not his thing, nor is anything else that leaves him master of his own ship, so to speak, along with God – namely, functions where he has extreme responsibility, pure responsibility, the responsibility one has toward the Other in which what I am articulating is inscribed.

The point I am designating is nowhere better illustrated, let me say in passing, than in the analyst's function, and specifically at the moment at which he proffers an interpretation. You see that in the course of my talk today, I haven't stopped situating the field uncovered for us by analytic action correlatively with the field of the neurotic's experience. It is necessarily the same, as it is there that one must go for it.

At the root of the obsessive's experience, there is always what I will call a certain fear of deflating related to phallic inflation. In a way, the Φ function of the phallus in obsession can be no better illustrated than by [La Fontaine's] fable of the frog that wanted to become as big as an ox. "The puny ninny," as you know, "swelled so much that it burst."

This is a moment of experience that is constantly renewed in the real dead end to which the obsessive is brought at the limits of his desire. It is, it seems, worth emphasizing, not simply in the sense of stressing a pathetic phenomenology, but also to allow you to articulate what is at stake in the Φ function of the phallus, insofar as it is hidden by having been exchanged for the φ function.

3

I began to articulate the Φ function last time by formulating a term: "real presence." I think your hearing is keen enough to realize that 307 I was putting it in quotes. Thus I did not introduce it alone: I spoke of the insult to real presence, in such a way that no one could be mistaken on this point. It has nothing to do with a neutral reality.

If real presence fulfills the radical function toward which I am trying to steer you here, it would be very odd if it had not already been identified somewhere. And I suspect that you have all already perceived that it is a homonym, identical to what goes by that name in religious dogma, the dogma to which, in our cultural context, we accede from birth, so to speak. We have for a long time been more or less used to hearing this pair of words, "real presence," insofar as it constitutes a signifier, murmured in our ears concerning the Apostolic and Roman Catholic dogma of the Eucharist. Well, I assure you that there is no need to look far to realize that it is right at the surface of the obsessive's phenomenology.

Since I spoke earlier of the work of someone who endeavored to focus research about obsessive structure on the phallus, I am going to take up his first article, whose title I mentioned earlier when I spoke of the "Therapeutic Impact of the Recognition of Penis Envy in Obsessive Neurosis among Women." I will quote a few passages from the introduction, and you will see that right from the very first pages, all sorts of possibilities for a critical commentary present themselves:

> Like the male obsessive, the female needs to identify regressively with a man in order to be able to free herself from anxieties dating back to early childhood; but while the male can prop himself up on this identification, in order to transform the infantile love object into a genital love object, she, basing herself first on the very same identification, tends to abandon the first object [the mother] and to move toward a heterosexual fixation, as if she could proceed to a new feminine identification, this time based on the person of the analyst.

Further along, we read,

> Shortly after the desire to possess the phallus, and correlatively to castrate the analyst, is brought to light, and, because of this the aforementioned loosening up has occurred, the male 308 > analyst's personality is associated with that of a well-meaning mother.

Three lines further on, we come across the well-known "initial destructive drive that targets the mother" – in other words, we come across the major coordinates of the analysis of the imaginary that characterizes the way treatment is currently conducted.

I have only highlighted this topic in order to convey to you in passing the difficulties that this general interpretation – summarized here in the introduction to the article, which the whole of what follows supposedly illustrates – assumes to have been overcome. Yet I need but go half a page further on to enter into the phenomenology of what is at stake, and into what this author, who was a clinician, this being his first paper, decides to tell us about the fantasies of his patient, who is viewed as an obsessive.

The first thing that jumps out at us is the following: "She imagined to herself that there were male genitalia in the place of the communion wafer."

And then it is indicated, "without there being any hallucinatory phenomena involved." I don't doubt it. Everything that we see and articulate has gotten us used to seeing that what is involved is something else altogether. She superimposed male organs in a signifying form. Onto what, if not onto what to us is, in the most identifiable, symbolic way, real presence? The point is to eliminate this real presence, to break it or mash it up in the mechanism of desire. The sacrilegious fantasies that I borrowed last time from a little further on in the same case study highlight this well enough.

Don't imagine that this case study is unique. I will cite for you – among dozens of others, because the experience of an analyst in a field never goes beyond a hundred – the following fantasy, which an obsessive [I worked with] had at one point in his analysis.

The attempts to incarnate desire can go to an extreme of erotic acuteness in obsessives, at times when they encounter in a partner some willingness, whether deliberate or gratuitous, to go along with the degrading of the Other with a capital O into the other with a lowercase o, in the field in which their desire develops. At the very moment at which the subject in question thought he could maintain 309 a type of relationship – which is always accompanied in obsessive neurotics by everything correlated with extremely threatening guilt, which can be counterbalanced, in some sense, by the intensity of his desire – he formed the following fantasy with a partner who represented for him, at least momentarily, such a satisfying complement: having the communion wafer play a role in coitus, in such a way that, placed in the woman's vagina, the host would wind up serving as a hat atop the subject's penis at the moment of penetration.

Don't think that this is the kind of peculiarity found only in a specialized literary genre. It is very common in the register of fancy [fantasie], especially obsessives' fancies.

How can we stop ourselves from casting all of this into a banal register like that of the so-called distance from the object, insofar as the object in question would be defined objectively? This is nevertheless what is described to us: the objectivity of the world, as it is recorded by the enumeration and the more or less harmonious combination of typical imaginary relationships; the objectivity of form, as it is specified by human dimensions; and the frontiers of the apprehension of the outer world, threatened by the difficulty of delimiting the ego with the objects of everyday communication. How can we not think, on the contrary, that there is something else, another dimension?

The point is nevertheless to situate this real presence somewhere, and in a register other than that of the imaginary. Let us say that it is inasmuch as I am teaching you to situate the place of desire in relation to the function of man as a subject who speaks that we can glimpse the fact that desire comes to inhabit the place of real presence and populates it with its ghosts.

But then what does Φ mean? Do I summarize it by designating the place of real presence insofar as it can only appear in the intervals between what the signifier covers (over)? Is it on the basis of these intervals that real presence threatens the whole signifying system? Yes, there is some truth to that. The obsessive shows it to you at every point of what you call his mechanisms of projection and defense, or more precisely, phenomenologically, of conjuring. The way he has of filling in everything that can present itself as a gap in the signifying system [dans le signifiant] – the way in which, for example, Freud's Rattenmann makes himself count up to so many between the flash of lightning and its thunder – is designated here in 310 its veritable structure. Why this need to fill in the signifying interval? Because something might be introduced there that would dissolve all of the phantasmagoria.

Apply this key to 25 or 30 of the symptoms with which the Rattenmann literally overflows and to all the case studies of obsessives, and you will put your finger on the truth of the matter. Moreover, you will situate at the same time the function of the phobic object, which is nothing other than the simplest form of this filling in.

What last time, concerning little Hans, I called the "universal signifier" realized by the phobic object is precisely that and nothing else. It is at a distant outpost, well before the hole – that of the gap brought about in the interval where real presence threatens – that a single sign stops the subject from approaching. This is why the mainspring of and the reason for phobia are not, as those who have but the word "fear" on their lips believe, a genital or even narcissistic danger. Owing to certain exceptional developments in the position of the subject with respect to the Other, as is the case in little Hans' relationship to his mother, what the subject is afraid of encountering is precisely a certain sort of desire that would be such as to immediately make the whole signifying system fall back into the nothingness prior to creation.

But then why is the phallus situated at this place and in this role? It is regarding this point that I would like to proceed far enough today to get you to realize what I might call the suitability of this formulation. I am not saying that it is the product of a deduction, for it is experience – that is, empirical discovery – that assures us of it; but there is also something here that makes us perceive that, qua experience, it is not irrational. Thus it is experience that shows us the phallus. But the suitability of the formulation that I want to point out is determined by the fact that the phallus, as experience reveals it to us, is not simply the organ of copulation, but is taken up in a perverse mechanism.

Try to catch my drift here. I am now stressing that the phallus, Φ, can function in such a way as to signify the structural point that represents a lack in the signifying system [le défaut du signifiant]. What does this mean? What defines as a signifier something about which I have just said that, by hypothesis, by definition, from the very outset, it is the signifier that is excluded from the signifying system [c'est le signifiant exclu du signifiant]? Is it that it can only enter the signifying system by artifice, contraband, and degradation, which is 311 why we never see it except as a function of imaginary φ? But then what allows us to talk about it, nevertheless, as a signifier, and to isolate Φ as such? It is what I call the perverse mechanism.

Let us schematize the phallus, which is in some sense natural, as follows. What is the phallus? The phallus, as we see it in the organic function of the penis, is not a universal organ in the animal kingdom. Insects have other ways of hooking onto each other, and without going so far afield, the relations between fishes are not phallic relations. The phallus presents itself at the human level, among others, as the sign of desire. It is also the instrument and presence of desire, but I am highlighting here its quality as a sign to ask you to dwell on something we must keep in mind – is it simply because it is a sign that it is a signifier? We would be too quickly crossing a border were we to say that it all comes down to this, for there are nevertheless other signs of desire.

We observe, phenomenologically, the easier projection of the phallus, owing to its imposing form [sa forme prégnante], onto the female object, for example; this is what has led me to articulate many times, in the phenomenology of perversion, the famous equivalence "girl=phallus"* in its simplest form: the erect form of the phallus. But this does not suffice, although I consider this profound choice, whose consequences we encounter everywhere, to be sufficiently motivated.

A signifier – is it simply about representing something to someone? Is that even the definition of a sign? It is, but that's not all. I added something else last time when I reminded you of the function of the signifier, which is that the signifier does not simply serve to make a sign to someone but, at the same moment of the signifying mainspring or instance, to make a sign of someone – to make the sign assimilate the someone to whom the sign designates something, such that this someone also becomes this signifier.

It is in the moment that I explicitly designate as perverse that we find the instance of the phallus. The fact that a phallus that is shown also produces an erection in the subject to whom it is shown is not, in any sense whatsoever, a condition that satisfies any sort of natural requirement.

It is here that we see what we call, in a more or less confused way, the homosexual instance. And it is not for no reason that we always situate the etiology [of homosexuality] at the level of the male sexual 312 organ [sexe]. It is inasmuch as the result is, in short, that the phallus as a sign of desire is manifested as an object of desire, as an object that attracts desire. In this mainspring lies its signifying function, and it is thus that it is able to operate at this level, in this zone or sector, where we must both identify it as a signifier and understand what it is thus led to designate.

What it designates is nothing that is directly signifiable. It is what is beyond all possible signification, and namely the real presence to which I wanted to draw your attention today, as we will continue to work on it in this year's Seminar.

April 26, 1961

THE OEDIPAL MYTH TODAY

A COMMENTARY ON THE COÛFONTAINE TRILOGY BY PAUL CLAUDEL

XIX

SYGNE'S NO

. . . where we are supposed to know.
Contemporary tragedy.
Twitching on the part of life.
